"But in the hot races, the competitive races where we're working, they remain as competitive as they were. So I believe the Gallup numbers showing a tightening in the generic polls can be true, even as the truly competitive races remain so," he said.

However, another Democratic campaign adviser, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the Republicans' stronger poll numbers in the part- preference surveys could make the Democrats' efforts to win back the House "a steeper climb."

"I expect things to tighten up," the campaign adviser said.

These concerns were confirmed last week by a top election forecaster who closely monitors the House's most competitive races.

"There has been a slight uptick in national GOP numbers, and that could help in a number of tight races, particularly in Republican-leaning districts that have been regarded as in play," campaign analyst Stuart Rothenberg told his newsletter subscribers.

Mr. Rothenberg said he thinks that "Democrats are now poised to net 15-20 seats, which would narrowly return the House to their control." But, he added, "they don't have much of a margin for error."

Mr. Secrest doesn't see the Democratic erosion that Gallup found last month in its national poll of likely voters ,which showed the party preference vote in a "dead heat."

"In the competitive races we are working in, the Democratic opportunity [to take back the House] is undiminished," he said.

Ace Of Base (NYT)

By Mark Halperin

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

BILL and Hillary Clinton have been known to cite a quip widely attributed to Einstein: “The definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result.” George W. Bush and Karl Rove live by an alternative dictum: Why do things differently when you like the results you have been getting?

In the 2002 and 2004 national elections, the president and his top political adviser won by margins provided by conservative voters who shared the White House’s view that the country should continue to move right. Although the president is not on the ballot in November, the Bush-Rove model animates the Republican Party’s election strategy for 2006.

Yet two years of controversy over the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina, and the perils of high gas prices and low poll numbers, have led many to believe that the Republicans’ strategy of fighting from the base has worn out its welcome. Therefore, this view holds, a campaign that appeals to moderates, one waged from the center, is the only way for the party to maintain control of the House and Senate.

Interesting theory, but it probably won't work. If the Republicans want to keep their majorities in the midterm elections, their best chance is to stick with the old, base-driven Bush-Rove electoral strategy.

Why? In the eyes of the Bush team, America is a polarized country, one where there are fundamental divisions worth fighting over. A president — and a party — should not worry about slender margins of victory or legislative control. The goal is to accumulate just enough power to use the energies and passions of the base to effect ideological change in the nation's laws and institutions, even if — sometimes especially if — those changes might be at odds with majority public opinion.

For the Republicans, this brand of politics works because the United States in many ways remains a fundamentally conservative nation. Polls consistently indicate that there are more staunchly conservative Americans than liberal ones. Republican politicians, therefore, have the advantage of being able to proudly announce what they really think. They can go on offense.

The party is helped, of course, by superior financial resources. And the Republicans have mastered micro-aiming rousing messages to ideologically sympathetic voters. These messages, generally on hot button issues like gay marriage and abortion, stir the kind of emotion and anger that provide the energy in Bush-Rove politics.

It's important to note, though, that this strategy depends on something else: the inability of Democrats to play by the same rules, to go on offense.

If Democrats in Congress took a secret ballot, it is safe to say there would be overwhelming support for a variety of positions that, in theory, could rally the party's base: a timely withdrawal of American troops from Iraq; a tax increase for the wealthy; universal health care; and increased rights for homosexuals. These are all positions in line with the activist wing of their party. And yet most Democrats will not openly espouse such policies, concerned that backing them could hurt their chances in 2006.

If they actually articulated what was in their hearts, Democrats worry that they would be marching into a buzz saw of negative political commercials and White House-led attacks. Democrats rightly believe that such attacks would energize the conservative base and also eat into their support among centrist voters. But their chosen alternative — in which they swallow their true beliefs on important national issues — demoralizes their own base.

If you have any doubts about the confusion of the Democrats, just look at the party's midterm strategy. On the one hand, Democrats are reluctant to push for liberal policies that would motivate their base. But the core of their enunciated message — both vowing to stop the president's right-wing policies and blurring their differences with Republicans on highly charged issues — has in recent elections been a recipe for defeat. Such equivocation is the kind of themeless pudding that does not match up well with the conviction of the White House message and is uninspiring to both the Democrats' base and the center.

For months, the president was in severe political peril, with approval ratings regularly hovering around 30 percent, in large measure because he was missing the support of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents that is essential to his majority. Despite conservative disaffection with the White House over the past year on issues like spending (and even, in some cases, on Iraq), the latest polls show the G.O.P. base is coming home — and just in time. Base support is headed toward 90 percent, just about where it was before the 2002 and 2004 elections.

The speeches the president gave about national security leading up to the fifth anniversary of 9/11 re-engaged the base and raised his overall approval rating to around 40 percent. He also has shifted the debate back to his favored playing field: national security.

Although some Democrats are energized by the aggressive posture struck last week by Bill and Hillary Clinton on national security, the couple's visibility seems to be energizing the Republican base as well, perhaps more so.

As in 2002 and 2004, the Democrats have been baited into a heated discussion on terrorism and Iraq, blocking out debates that would be more favorable to their cause, like Social Security, the economy and gas prices. The Clintons have whipped up Democrats into a frenzy to fight back, but on Capitol Hill and on television they are largely fighting back on Republican terrain.

This is exactly what happened in the last two elections: Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove fired up the base on national security, taxes and social issues and found a way to win a majority of the electorate, even as they lost the allegiance of a majority of the country over all. The national security debate, the visibility of the Clintons and the momentum the Republicans gain from Mr. Bush's rising poll numbers — all of these echo previous election cycles.

Critics of the Bush administration assert that the politics of the base has run its course, and that the Iraq war, the partisan zealousness and the conservative social policies of the administration have made voters yearn for a more centrist, bipartisan government. But Mr. Bush's opponents may be imprudently lulled by the current storyline and broad national polls, both of which miss the power and consequence of a Republican base that may have one more victory to give.

Parties For Pay Fill D.C. Calendar (KCS)

By Matt Stearns

The Kansas City Star, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON | Lonely lobbyist: The oxymoron of the season.

Every day, faxes and e-mail pour across lobbyists' desks, requesting the pleasure of their company — and that of their checkbooks — at dozens of campaign fundraisers.

Breakfast invitations. Lunches. Cocktails. Dinners. Even hunting and golfing trips.

The Kansas City Star asked one lobbyist for a Fortune 500 company to save a week's worth of fundraiser invitations in the final days of the current congressional session in the heated run-up to the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

How many invitations did he get? About 200. How many of the events did he attend? Eleven.

Did he feel like an ATM sometimes? You bet.

The lobbyist was offered the chance to nibble sushi and stone crabs with Rep. Connie Mack, a Florida Republican. Join the Mooseburger Oktoberfest with Rep. Don Young, an Alaska Democrat. Listen to bagpipes at Scotch Tasting Reception (kilt optional) hosted by Rep. John Campbell, a California Republican. And "dove shoot, sporting clays, bow and rifle deer hunting, fishing, horseback riding and golf" over a weekend on a 6,000-acre South Carolina plantation, courtesy of Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham.

That the party-and-pay carousel continues unabated shows that the lobbying scandal that rocked Washington earlier this year has changed nothing, said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group.

And because lawmakers require ever greater piles of money to finance their campaigns — PAC cash given to congressional candidates this election cycle totaled about a quarter-billion dollars by July — they don't have much interest in real reform, she said.

"What has driven me nuts about lobbying reform is all the onus has been put on lobbyists, as if members of Congress are these babes in the woods," Sloan said. "That is so not the case."

Fundraising invitations often list members' committee assignments right under their names, Sloan said.

"It's intended to say, 'Do you have any clients with interests in front of me?' "

Attendees come with checks because they support a member of Congress' work and agenda, said Chuck Knapp, a spokesman for U.S. Rep. Todd Tiahrt, a Kansas Republican.

In September, the congressman was host of the second Todd Tiahrt European Driven Pheasant Hunt at the Flint Oak Hunting Resort near Fall River. The event was a benefit for Tiahrt's leadership PAC.

Cost: $2,500 per attendee.

Leadership PACs help a member gain influence within the caucus," Knapp said. "That's beneficial to the congressman in his work representing the district."

Graham's hunting, fishing and golfing extravaganza, to benefit his political action committee, was even pricier: $5,000. It was limited to 25 participants.

To Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for Common Cause, a nonpartisan government watchdog group, such weekend trips are particularly troubling.

"They're meant to be sold as this opportunity to get real snuggly-close with a member of Congress," Boyle said. "That's what lobbyists are buying: access and influence."

The more typical events in Washington, where animals are not ducking for cover, cost a lobbyist at least $500, or $1,000 from his employer's PAC.

DOJ_NMG_0072352

At least no lobbyist will go hungry.

On one typical September weekday, there were seven fundraising breakfasts and two lunches held at restaurants, Capitol Hill town houses owned by members of Congress or big companies and clubs associated with the Democratic and Republican parties.

The evening hours offered more than a dozen receptions and dinners around Capitol Hill and downtown Washington. Among them: the second fundraiser of the day for Sen. Jim Talent, a Missouri Republican.

Tiahrt also had his annual Fall Steak Out, that day, and U.S. Rep. Kenny Hulshof, a Missouri Republican, offered an "intimate dinner" at Bobby Van's Grill.

Perhaps most intriguing of all: "Pirates of Key West Night" at the Capitol Hill home of Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican.

As Common Cause might say: Arrghh!

Presidential Hopefuls Boost Florida Candidates, Look To Help Themselves (FLSUNSEN)

By Anthony Man

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 1, 2006

Presidential candidates are flocking to Florida, hoping to boost their parties' candidates for governor and Congress -- and their own dreams of reaching the White House.

Two of the most prominent prospects, Democrat John Kerry and Republican Rudolph Giuliani, just completed South Florida swings. Even though the 2008 election is more than two years away, Broward and Palm Beach counties will be filled with presidential candidates in the five weeks between now and Election Day.

"We're going to be seeing more of them. We've gotten a lot of calls and e-mails from their staffs," said Shane Strum, Broward Republican chairman. "They're going to crop up real quick."

The interaction between national and state candidates is the ultimate symbiotic relationship, like the tickbird feasting on insects from the back of cattle. While the presidential candidates garner publicity and build networks of supporters for their own campaigns, the gubernatorial and congressional candidates also enjoy the publicity and use the visitors to help attract donors to fundraising events.

Kerry, the Massachusetts senator who lost the 2004 presidential election, stopped in five cities Saturday for four candidate fundraisers and two news conferences. Most of his events weren't big, public gatherings.

It was different with Giuliani, the former New York mayor who was propelled to superstar status for his leadership after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He has the ability to attract far more television cameras than even a candidate for governor might get on his own.

Outside a fire station in Dania Beach on Wednesday, Giuliani was the big draw for a rally at which he endorsed fellow Republican Charlie Crist's campaign for governor. As the event wound up, retired Miami-Dade firefighter George Carbonell of Miramar yelled out his political hope: "Giuliani for president."

Carbonell, a registered Democrat, said his cry of support wasn't premeditated or planted by political operatives. Giuliani demurred, saying later he wouldn't make any decisions until after the November elections.

Kerry said Saturday that he would make a decision in late 2006 or early 2007.

He said his mission Saturday was to help elect Democrats, but said he hopes there is some political benefit. "Of course you hope that it's positive, but I can't predict. I can't tell you what's going to happen," he said.

Average voters like Carbonell aren't the motivation for visits by prospective presidential candidates.

More important is winning the support of people such as Mitchell Berger and William Scherer, both Fort Lauderdale lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0072353

Berger is a prominent national political fundraiser and finance chairman for Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis. Scherer is a prominent Republican fundraiser, reaching pioneer status for raising at least $100,000 for George W. Bush's 2000 campaign. In 2004 Scherer was a Bush ranger, raising at least $200,000.

Scherer, who said he won't pick a presidential candidate until after the gubernatorial election, is raising money for Crist this fall. The presidential candidate visits provide opportunities for people like Scherer and Berger to see the prospects up close, helping them evaluate whom they want to work for.

Bryan Miller, a lawyer who works in Fort Lauderdale and West Palm Beach, leads the Democratic Professionals Council, a regional group of moderate and business-oriented Democrats.

Miller said the presidential hopefuls are working with gubernatorial and congressional candidates and appearing before his group because Broward and Palm Beach counties are full of wealthy donors who can help fund their campaigns.

"They're down here to build fundraising bases," Miller said.

Miller and Mitch Ceasar, the Broward Democratic chairman, said Florida's role in determining the presidency is another factor.

"Of all the big states in the country, there's only one swing state," Miller said. "Just do the math and Florida is the juggernaut in any presidential election."

California and New York are solidly Democratic and Texas is solidly Republican. Neither Republican red nor Democratic blue, Florida can go either way, and the state's 27 electoral votes are a tenth of what's needed to win the presidency.

"Florida is the only swing mega-state in the country," Ceasar added.

Another reason national figures in both parties want to help elect a governor is the value of the governorship in the presidential contest in two years, Berger said.

Berger said Bill Clinton almost won Florida in 1992, despite devoting little effort or money on the state, because Democrat Lawton Chiles was governor. In 2000 and 2004, President Bush benefited from his brother, Gov. Jeb Bush.

"Florida is a pivotal state," Scherer said. "Having the governor and the Legislature would make it far more friendly for a Republican candidate for president than it would be the other way around."

Democrats see it the same way. "The national party thinks that having a Florida governor is worth about five points in a presidential race," Miller said.

It's part of the way candidates build their networks of supporters.

"As long as it stays a purple state, that's a place the presidential candidates have to come," Miller said. "We're talking about a very crowded presidential field in 2008, and that makes it all the more important to be out early."

Romney Directs GOP Cash To Campaign States (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As chairman of the Republican Governors Association, Mitt Romney has directed the organization's largest contributions to candidates in three states that are key to any presidential run, enhancing his exposure in politically important precincts as he prepares for a 2008 run for president.

The heavy investment in those three states -- Florida, Michigan, and Iowa -- underscores the extent to which Romney is using the governors ' association to build his presidential résumé. Romney is traveling the nation under the auspices of the association and getting to know the deep-pocketed donors who play crucial roles in presidential candidacies.

Romney, as chairman, plays the primary role in recommending which races receive funding, though all decisions are approved by an executive committee of the governors' association.

Florida, Michigan, and Iowa each have competitive governors' races, and Romney said in an interview that each funding decision was based on the merits.

Still, in a year in which even Romney concedes that Republicans are highly likely to suffer significant losses in governor's races nationally, some of the choices of where to send the association's money have raised eyebrows in political circles.

Two weeks ago, Romney traveled to Florida to deliver a $1 million check to Republican gubernatorial nominee Charlie Crist, even though polls have shown Crist holding a steady lead.

Even without the governors' association's contribution, Crist had nearly tripled the fund-raising kitty of his opponent, Democrat Jim Davis, suggesting the association's money might be better spent in other contests.

Also getting $1 million is Dick DeVos, who is running for governor in Michigan, a closely divided state that holds early presidential primaries -- and where Romney's father served as governor.

Though DeVos's race against Democratic Governor Jennifer Granholm is tight, DeVos is hardly strapped for cash, since he has already pumped more than $16 million of his Amway fortune into the race.

``We laughed at the Michigan money," said Jennifer Duffy, who tracks governors' races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. ``It's like Romney's third home state, after Utah and Massachusetts."

Romney is directing about $750,000 to Iowa, where Representative Jim Nussle, the chairman of the House budget committee, is locked in a campaign that's widely considered a toss-up.

While the tightness of the election makes the state a good target for governors' association money, the donation is noteworthy for its size, given that Iowa is a sparsely populated state with low advertising costs.

Romney has paid frequent visits to Iowa, which has the first presidential nominating contest in the nation, including a series of stops last week.

``If Nussle wins, it gives [Romney] a friend in the governor's seat here, which can be useful as you look forward to the caucuses," said Peverill Squire , a political science professor at the University of Iowa. ``Even more important than that, it gives him a presence here, and elevates his profile among party activists. That's how you put together a campaign organization."

Romney said each contribution represents a strategic decision based on the 2006 races, not his own ambitions. Some states, including Michigan and Florida, were given more money in part to reward major donors in those states, Romney said. Iowa, he added, represents perhaps the GOP's best chance for replacing a Democratic governor with a Republican.

``States that have provided a lot of money to the RGA have generally gotten more money back," Romney said. ``I'm sure when this is over, people will say, `Why did you send it there?' But we're sending money where we think it can best be spent."

Though the association declined to release its full spending figures, Romney himself has identified Florida, Michigan, and Iowa as the top three recipients so far. As a 527 organization, the RGA is required to file quarterly reports with the IRS, and third-quarter fund-raising and spending won't be released until mid-October.

RGA officials said the association also has spent heavily in states that don't figure as prominently in presidential campaigns. Romney said the group is making sizable investments in Wisconsin, Oregon, Colorado, and Maryland, among others.

By the end of the election cycle, Romney said, between 10 and 12 states will have received cash infusions of roughly similar amounts, though he declined to name the states or the amounts so as not to reveal strategy. He said he hopes those states include Massachusetts, where his lieutenant governor, Kerry Healey, is running to succeed him, but he has recused himself from decisions involving his home state.

At the same time, the governors' association has essentially written off governors' seats in New York and Ohio, and given little attention to Illinois. The association has passed up the chance to make big donations to Republican efforts to unseat Democratic incumbents in states that are historically friendly to the GOP. These include Kansas, Oklahoma, Wyoming, Tennessee, and Arizona.

The organization has given virtually nothing to Republican candidates in New Hampshire and South Carolina, two of the most important states in the presidential calendar, but where incumbents have big leads. Republican Governor Mark Sanford of South Carolina appears safe, as does Democratic Governor John Lynch of New Hampshire.

Despite Romney's efforts, polls and analysts say Republicans are likely to have a net loss of between four and eight governorships this year. If they lose four or more, they'll lose their majority status among governorships for the first time since 1994.

``The math would suggest we lose quite a few governorships," Romney said. ``We hope to do better than that, obviously."

By contrast, Romney's counterpart at the Democratic Governors Association, Bill Richardson of New Mexico, is predicting a banner year for Democrats in the 36 governor's races that will be decided Nov. 7. Richardson, like Romney, hopes to use the platform of the governors' association to boost his 2008 presidential prospects

Citing the most recent public polls, Richardson said Democrats are in a position to turn a 22-28 deficit in governorships into at least a 28-22 advantage. Richardson said Democratic pickups are likely in Massachusetts, New York, Maryland, Ohio, Arkansas, and Colorado. He said Democrats also stand good chances to take over from Republicans in Nevada, Alaska, Minnesota, and others.

``Two-thirds of the country is at stake, and we will get to a majority of governorships," Richardson said.

The factors driving the major trends in the governors' races are beyond Romney's control. Low approval ratings for President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress are harming Republicans up and down the ballot. Romney has also been hampered by a rash of retirements among Republican governors -- including his own.

It all suggests an inauspicious debut on the national stage for Romney, who has become an increasingly public face on behalf of GOP gubernatorial candidates this year. But analysts say the losses are unlikely to significantly harm his presidential chances.

The most important task of a governor s' association chairman is raising money, and Romney has maintained Republicans' historic cash advantage in governors' races, with the RGA raising $25.9 million -- a record for a nonpresidential year -- compared with the DGA's $17.9 million.

Because of his success bringing in money, Romney is unlikely to face recriminations for his leadership, even if the election turns out to be a bloodbath for Republicans, said Jeffrey Berry , a political science professor at Tufts University.

``Elephants have short memories, I suppose," he said.

Since taking over last November, Romney has retooled the RGA to eliminate its policy functions, allowing him to focus exclusively on fund-raising.

Even if Republicans falter on Election Day, Romney will end up glad he took on the RGA job, predicted Mickey Edwards, a former Republican representative who now teaches at Princeton University.

The travel has given Romney national exposure, and kept him in close contact with the moneymen and GOP powerbrokers who are crucial to the presidential nominating process, he said.

``It's been a big plus for him," Edwards said.

Romney Says He Must Obey Law On Marriage For Out-of-state Gay Couples (BOS)

By Michael Levenson

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. -- Governor Mitt Romney all but admitted defeat yesterday in his effort to appeal a Suffolk Superior Court ruling that allows gay couples from Rhode Island to get married in Massachusetts.

``I have to follow the law," a resigned Romney said in an interview at the Republican State Convention in Concord, N.H., where he delivered the keynote address. ``This is a nation of laws, even if I don't like them."

The governor's concession was made a day after Attorney General Thomas F. Reilly said he would not appeal the decision, despite a letter Romney had sent urging him to do so. The decision disappointed Romney as he looks to solidify his conservative credentials for a potential 2008 presidential run.

For the first time, the ruling makes it possible for gay couples from outside Massachusetts to come to the state and be granted marriage licenses. Issued Friday by Judge Thomas E. Connolly , the decision said Romney and Reilly cannot use a 1913 law to block Rhode Island couples from marrying in Massachusetts because Rhode Island's laws do not explicitly ban gay marriage.

Romney, who has said he does not want Massachusetts to become ``the Las Vegas of gay marriage," said the only option left is for Congress to approve a Constitutional amendment to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The amendment would then need the approval of three-fourths of the states.

President Bush has also called for such an amendment, but Congress has not approved it. Romney yesterday reiterated his call for a similar amendment to the Massachusetts Constitution, which he hopes to place on the ballot in November 2008.

``Let the citizens decide," Romney said. ``And I'm confident that if the citizens decide it in the privacy of a voting booth, they'll protect traditional marriage."

At the convention, held at the Capital Center for the Arts, several hundred Republicans enthusiastically applauded Romney, who delivered a speech in which he spoke about his experience managing the 2002 Winter Olympics, urged the nation to produce more scientists to compete with Asian nations, and expressed support for the ``sanctity of marriage and the foundational nature of the family."

``You and I agree on something about that, and that is my Supreme Judicial Court made a monumental error in saying that our Constitution in Massachusetts requires people of the same gender to marry," Romney said as Republicans cheered. ``I disagree with them on that. I think John Adams would disagree with them on that, as well."

Marriage, he said, is not a relationship ``just about adults."

``Marriage is primarily about the development and nurturing of children, and every child deserves a mother and a father," Romney said to more cheers and applause.

Romney has been trying to lock up support in New Hampshire, where the early primary makes it an important state in presidential elections. Last week, the Commonwealth PAC, a political committee Romney is using to help lay the groundwork for a possible presidential run, signed up Tom Rath , a former New Hampshire attorney general, as its senior adviser. The committee has also doled out more than $100,000 to the New Hampshire GOP.

Wayne Semprini , the party's chairman, told delegates yesterday that Romney gave $60,000 to the state party this summer, when money was so tight ``the lights were flickering" at party headquarters. He also reminded delegates that Romney owns a home in New Hampshire, on the shores of Lake Winnipesaukee.

``We do love the state, as you all know," Romney's wife, Ann , said in brief remarks to the convention.

Delegates said yesterday that they were impressed with Romney.

``I think his message was excellent," said Norm Olsen , 54, of Portsmouth . ``He has some real experience in solving big problems."

Democrats Work The Factory Floor (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Hillary Clinton is the front-runner for the next Democratic presidential nomination, but suddenly this is John Edwards's party. If you look across the states where the party is being defined in 2006, you find candidates who sound a lot more like him than her.

Democrats are running strong Senate campaigns in the upper South (James Webb in Virginia, Harold Ford in Tennessee), in the big job-loss states (Bob Casey in Pennsylvania, Sherrod Brown in Ohio, Claire McCaskill in Missouri) and even in a few places out West (Jon Tester in Montana). And in each case, the candidates are running as factory-floor populists who would throw up if they had to sit through a Renaissance Weekend.

Senator Clinton is a well-educated professional who was influenced by the values politics of the 1960's and 70's. But most of today's strong Democratic candidates are traditionalist manly men who give the impression that if they had been involved in the Chicago riots, they would have been on the side of the cops, not the hippies. The Claritas research firm segments the country into different psychodemographic clusters. Today's most prominent Democratic candidates are more Mines and Mills than Towns and Gowns.

The Democrats were once a free trade party. But Sherrod Brown wrote a book called "Myths of Free Trade: Why American Trade Policy Has Failed" and most of this year's strong Democratic candidates rail — like John Edwards — against outsourcing and trade agreements. Their core issue is the economic resentment of the struggling middle class. Brown recently explained the political strategy to a gathering of liberal journalists: "I know that trade issues work with white male, nonunion, culturally conservative voters because they know how anxious trade issues have made them and their families."

Many of this year's prominent candidates are also surprisingly nationalist on immigration, playing off concerns about declining wages. "I do believe we must gain control of our borders," Webb said during a debate. "We also must gain control over corporate America's use of illegals. This, along with the Iraq war, has been the major failure of this administration."

On social issues, most of them are not exactly singing from the hymnal of the highly educated coastal elites. "I believe marriage should only be between men and women," Ford declares on the stump. "I don't know any better; that's how I was brought up. We didn't have any choice. Where I grew up, when you awakened on Sunday, you went to church. ... I learned the faith thing the old-fashioned way."

On Iraq, most are leaning toward the Edwards position. Unlike Senator Clinton, Edwards has disavowed his earlier support for the war. He calls for an immediate withdrawal of 40,000 troops and complete withdrawal within a year or so. But several candidates are careful to show they are not in the pocket of the A.C.L.U. Both Sherrod Brown and Harold Ford voted with President Bush on the military tribunal bill.

In sum, their message is a long way from the globalized Third Way politics Bill Clinton and Tony Blair exemplified in the 1990's. It's also a long way from the secular, multicultural liberalism that has alienated religious voters in droves.

Will it work politically? There's some evidence that it can. Michael Barone of U.S. News & World Report has noticed that so far Democrats are doing surprisingly well in rural America, where this economically progressive, socially traditionalist populism goes down well. Moreover, if Brown's economic populism can't win in a factory-decimated state like Ohio in a political climate like the one we have now, then it can't win anywhere, ever.

And yet Democrats have reason to worry long term. This message is based on a sort of economic nostalgia, what The Economist called a "rose-tinted version of the 1950's and 1960's" — when the middle class prospered, families cohered, America dominated, unions thrived, Islam was invisible and immigrants were Irish and Italian.

This nostalgia is certainly common today. In their must-read book, "Applebee's America," Doug Sosnik, Matt Dowd and Ron Fournier quote an anxious Michigan voter: "This is going to sound silly, but I wish things were like they were when we were growing up. ... I wish I could go back in time. We had stable lives. Mom could stay home, and we could afford it. Life was slower."

But nationwide, and in the decades ahead, can a politics that evades the modern realities of Islamic extremism and the skill-based global economy really be the basis of a majority movement? I doubt it.

'08 Scrutiny Shines Unkind Light On Allen (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

It was always a tricky proposition for Sen. George Allen to balance his 2006 reelection campaign with his 2008 presidential ambitions, and now the increased scrutiny and criticism that came with his role on the national stage endanger both.

Allen's prominence in the Republican presidential contest is the main reason the controversies that have roiled his effort to win a second term to the Senate have emerged now, after a 23-year political career, according to campaign strategists.

"When people start mentioning you as a possible presidential candidate, everything is looked at," said Robert E. Denton Jr., a political communications professor at Virginia Tech and a close observer of Virginia politics. "This [scrutiny] is a whole different ballgame for Allen, and it's all about '08, not the Senate campaign."

It wasn't that many months ago that Allen was seen by political insiders as already in the top tier of prospective Republican presidential candidates. In April 2005, he finished first in a National Journal magazine survey of insiders asked to predict the 2008 GOP nominee. In May, Allen finished second behind Arizona Sen. John McCain.

But instead of laying the groundwork for a campaign in Des Moines and Charleston, S.C., Allen's renewed attention is on Winchester and Roanoke. His last trip to one of the early primary states was in July.

The tightening Senate race has even led him to showcase potential rival McCain in television ads aimed at veterans and the kinds of independent voters to whom the Arizona Republican appeals and who could be critical in Allen's race with Democrat James Webb.

Campaign manager Dick Wadhams, who was chosen to be Allen's Senate chief of staff specifically for his national political expertise, doesn't want to talk about anything but the present. "I'm concentrating on the Senate race in 2006," he said yesterday.

He said he doesn't know what role Allen's national profile has played in the campaign. "What I will say is the preponderance of scrutiny of Sen. Allen, as opposed to lack of scrutiny of Webb, suggests that one candidate is getting all the scrutiny, and the other is getting away with no scrutiny at all," Wadhams said.

He also said that Allen's leadership of Republican efforts to retain control of the Senate in 2004, when Democrats thought they had a chance for a takeover, "certainly made Sen. Allen a target."

The milestones in a campaign that recently turned on questions of Allen's character -- a New Republic story that mined Allen's longtime affection for the Confederacy, a piece in the Jewish newspaper the Forward that revealed the senator's unacknowledged Jewish heritage, the emergence of long-ago acquaintances who say Allen used racial epithets in the 1970s, a charge Allen vehemently denies -- have all come about, the participants say, because of his presidential ambitions.

Even the campaign-altering event for which Allen has taken responsibility and for which he has apologized -- his use of the word "macaca" to describe a dark-skinned volunteer for Webb's campaign and his "welcome to America and the real world of Virginia" remarks to the young Fairfax County native -- took flight nationally because of his prominence among Republican 2008 contenders.

Allen campaign officials and supporters have accused the national media, especially The Washington Post, of hyping the macaca story. So it was not a pleasant surprise last week when the influential conservative magazine the Weekly Standard illustrated its long story on Allen with a drawing of the senator with a monkey on his back. (Macaca is a genus of monkey.) The piece said Allen's campaign controversies "have almost eliminated him from the field of serious presidential candidates and even jeopardized his Senate seat."

Many GOP strategists believed that the combination of Allen's ideology and personality would make him one of the favorites among activist conservatives who play such a significant role in the nomination process. That view was not universally held, however. Some top strategists privately questioned whether Allen had the skills to make the long-distance run required of presidential candidates.

Today, in the wake of the problems Allen has encountered, the doubts have spread far more widely inside the party. More than anything, these strategists say, Allen must turn his reelection campaign around. Success, they say, is the best antidote to the reservations that his recent performance has engendered around the country.

"To use the football metaphors he is so fond of, he needs to quote [Oakland Raiders owner] Al Davis and 'Just win, baby,' " said Tom Rath, the New Hampshire Republican national committeeman who is leaving that position to help prepare Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney for a 2008 run.

Allen is trying to go on offense this week, using his vast financial advantage over Webb to flood the airwaves with an ad portraying as disrespectful an article that Webb wrote 27 years ago that criticized women in the Naval Academy and in combat roles. It is an issue that Allen advisers think will appeal especially in Northern Virginia, an area critical to both campaigns.

But those who are familiar with Allen campaigns of the past, such as Virginia Tech's Denton, say things feel different. For one thing, this is the first time that Allen has run statewide for reelection; his 1993 campaign for governor and his 2000 campaign against Sen. Charles S. Robb (D) were the kind of underdog campaigns he prefers. He has always liked to call his supporters "insurgents" and laments that the Iraq war has ruined the word for him.

"I've never seen an Allen campaign like this one, being so much on the defensive," Denton said. "It's like night and day from his previous campaigns."

Recent polls have shown the race to be a dead heat, with Webb still not terribly familiar to voters and Allen's negative ratings increasing. And according to a recent Mason-Dixon poll, a majority of Virginians say Allen should not run for president.

John Weaver, chief strategist for McCain, said it would be naive to suggest that Allen's national aspirations haven't also been damaged by what he has gone through the last few weeks. But, he added, "we've all been around to know that, if he comes back and wins the race after expectations are what they are today, stranger things have happened in politics. Perhaps he could come back. But that's the last thing they need to be thinking about at this time."

The fact that Allen is now tied down in Virginia puts him at a disadvantage to other prospective candidates who are rapidly assembling organizations in early primary and caucus states such as Iowa and New Hampshire.

"Allen's got to do two things that are very tough," said a GOP strategist outside Washington who spoke anonymously so he could talk more candidly about the senator's prospects. "Assuming he wins, he's got to get right in on the organizational side into four to eight states, he's got to raise money and he's got to put a team together."

Other strategists said fundraisers might be wary of helping Allen raise the tens of millions of dollars needed to compete for the GOP nomination. Contributors like to be with winners and often are risk-averse. Until Allen gets his Senate campaign on track, those fundraisers may stay on the fence.

In Iowa, assessments about the damage to Allen varied. Steve Scheffler, who heads the Iowa Christian Alliance, said few Iowa activists are paying attention to the Virginia Senate campaign. He said his organization hosted about 850 activists recently. "I don't remember even one person bringing it up." If that is the good news, the bad news is that Allen has no real profile in the state. A Republican strategist aligned with another candidate said, "I don't think he occupied enough space for it to make much difference."

Rath said he thinks Allen will defeat Webb in November.

"Then I think he's got a chance to say, 'I've dealt with this, and move on.' Whether he can or not will be up to not just him but others."

Allen's Run Of Problematic Press (WP)

By Deborah Howell

So is The Post out to get George Allen? That's what some folks have been angrily charging lately.

Suzanne Rosenberg of Manassas complained: "I want to cancel my subscription to your paper. I have absolutely had it. I don't know how many articles you had on the stupid macaca incident. And this big article in The Post . . . about his ancestry, it should not matter; it's ridiculous. It's obvious that your paper does not like George Allen, does not endorse him and you're doing everything . . . to make him look bad in the eyes of the public."

Several questions arise about the coverage of the Virginia Republican senator in his campaign against Democrat James Webb. Was the "macaca" incident worth reporting? Was it overreported? Is it news that he has some Jewish heritage? Was it fair to interview his mother? Why pick up a story from a liberal-leaning online magazine that said he used "the N-word"? And does the coverage hurt Allen's campaign?

First, let's go to the macaca tape. Watch it on washingtonpost.com. It was definitely a news story. Allen rightly apologized for a lapse in judgment.

Did The Post overplay the incident? Not initially, but the coverage went on for too long after he apologized. The news stories, handled by the paper's Virginia political reporters, did not go overboard. An editorial was well done. Then the columnists weighed in, along with Style reporters and editorial cartoonist Tom Toles. No one piece was over the line. But when you put it all together, it looked like piling on.

Then the matter of Allen's Jewish roots emerged.

There are reasons to ask a candidate, especially one who has presidential ambitions, as Allen does, about religion and ethnicity. Remember the controversy over John F. Kennedy's Catholicism? Or Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's support for abortion rights and whether that meant he could receive communion as a Catholic? Or the continuing importance of conservative evangelicals to the Republican Party?

Post reporters at an Allen-Webb debate did not ask Allen if he had Jewish roots and hadn't planned on asking. But a TV reporter did, based on a story in the Jewish Daily Forward that said Allen's mother, Henriette, was born into a Sephardic family in Tunisia. The question was not played up in The Post's story about the debate; it was dealt with in the last two paragraphs. But Dana Milbank focused on it in his Washington Sketch column.

Allen's sputtering response , in which he said the reporter was "making aspersions," made the story come alive. And his bad-joke comments a few days later about eating a ham sandwich and his mother making good pork chops added fuel. My talks with Post Virginia editors and reporter Michael D. Shear about campaign coverage, especially on the Jewish queries, make me think they gave Allen the benefit of the doubt.

The whole package of coverage prompted Dorothy Armistead of Sperryville, Va., to complain: "I'm not Jewish myself but believe you me, I think it is a repulsive way of handling this story. I just don't understand what is happening to the editorial policy of The Washington Post that they can allow that kind of thing to happen."

A number of readers, including Karin Mears of Centreville, were upset that Allen's mother was interviewed. "It was despicable of you to call George Allen's mother and grill her about her heritage. She's 83 years old and has a right to privacy, no matter what her reasons are. "

Shear's interview with Mrs. Allen -- which the senator's campaign staff did not want to take place -- told readers what happened from the point of view of Allen's mother. It was a needed and even sympathetic story. It was easy to empathize with her fear of revealing her Jewish background, especially because her father had been imprisoned by the Nazis during World War II. She said she told Allen about it only recently, asking him to keep it secret. Allen frequently mentioned that his grandfather was imprisoned by the Nazis; it would be logical to think his grandfather might have been Jewish.

This brings us to the story from Salon that said he used the N-word in his college days. Two people, including a college friend, made the accusation; others have said they never heard him say it. The Post couldn't ignore the story, but it should have noted that Salon is a liberal-oriented Web site.

John Burpo of Springfield asked: "Why did The Post violate its own guidelines and standards to allow anonymous sources to attack Senator Allen with unsubstantiated allegations?" Using quotes from two anonymous sources who said that Allen had used the racial epithet added nothing to the story.

Does all the coverage hurt Allen's reelection prospects? The stories -- six of them were on Page 1 -- don't help him, but there are five long weeks before Election Day. The Post has also reported stories that haven't helped Webb -- such as the front-page article about his remarks concerning women in the military and accusations that he also used the N-word and took part in racial harassment when he was young.

While this has nothing to do with news coverage, it has been noted that The Post's editorial board has never endorsed Allen. That is true, but it also did not endorse Webb in the Democratic primary.

I trust that Arlington reader David Tuma's wish will be fulfilled by Election Day. He wrote: "Frankly, I think more important (and responsible) reporting would be on what has shaped their views since then and what both have done to improve conditions for all people."

From 'Dull' Accountant To Determined Candidate (MINNST)

By Jay Weiner

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 1, 2006

Hailing from a family of public servants, he is self-deprecating and focused as he seeks to join the nation's most exclusive club.

Over dinner, on their first date, Mark Kennedy, the insurance salesman's son from Pequot Lakes, gazed into the eyes of Debbie Miller, the farm girl from Hawley.

Both of them have forgotten his exact words. But she remembers that he stated his intentions clearly: "One day I'm going to run for office."

She believed him. History shows she had reason to.

It was the summer of 1979. He was 22, a young Republican sporting a bushy hairdo and bursting with ambition.

They had met four years earlier at the Minnesota State Fair as 4-H high school leaders. No sparks flew. Then they reconnected at a 4-H reunion in St. Paul. Kennedy had a St. John's University degree -- he was the first boy in his family to graduate from college -- and was working for what he calls "the Marine Corps of accounting," the Arthur Andersen firm.

Debbie, a North Dakota State senior, was the 4-H youth director in Walker, 190 miles northwest of the Twin Cities.

"If I can get gas, I can take you out," Kennedy told her at the reunion, referring to a gas shortage triggered by that era's Iranian revolution.

DOJ_NMG_0072361

Kennedy drove his silver Toyota Celica the four hours to Walker, they went to dinner, and he revealed the desire that has propelled him to where he is now: in a nationally watched U.S. Senate race against Democrat Amy Klobuchar -- an election that's becoming more rough-and-tumble because it could decide who controls Congress.

"He talked about public service, of giving back," Debbie Kennedy said of the man she married in 1980; they have four children. "He had this inner feeling, this inner calling. He just knew."

Fifteen hours on message

Even at 5:29 a.m. on an August morning, Mark Kennedy is poised to be on message. For the next 15 hours.

A rented Winnebago RV awaits him outside his Watertown rambler. He plunks his lanky 6-foot-2 frame into the swiveling captain's seat of the RV's living room. Ahead are 547 miles, six campaign stops, hundreds of handshakes.

He's dressed in his standard campaign outfit: plaid shirt, neatly creased Eddie Bauer khakis and dark shoes. Members of Kennedy's campaign staff affectionately describe him as "dorky."

He stokes that image in self-deprecating jokes, in a campaign ad featuring family members (he has six siblings) making fun of his lack of charisma, even in interviews.

"Some people say they are what they're not," Kennedy said. "I know who I am. I'm a dull, boring accountant."

There's more than that on his résumé. First, his precocious climb through the corporate world -- he was senior vice president of a $7 billion company, Federated Department Stores, by the time he was 30. Then there's his six years in Congress, serving as a staunch ally of President Bush.

Now, undaunted by polls that show him trailing Klobuchar, Kennedy begins many of his campaign days by opening a blue three-ring binder. It's crammed with single-spaced briefing notes that he types on issues he plans to tackle in his speeches.

As he campaigns, Kennedy, 49, speaks knowledgeably about energy and the economy, education or the war in Iraq. But with notebook in hand on the summer day his RV rumbled to Winona, the one-time St. Cloud Community Theater actor kept studying lines he would repeat over and over to voters down the road.

A family legacy of politics

In a sense, Kennedy has been revving up for this political ride since he was knee-high to a lawn sign.

"It had just been assumed," said his brother Steven Kennedy, a Minneapolis lawyer.

Their great-grandfather was a county commissioner. Their grandfather? A mayor. Their father, Eugene, the insurance salesman, was on the school board for 27 years.

By 2000, back in Minnesota after working out of state for nearly a decade, Mark Kennedy ran for Congress against Democratic incumbent David Minge.

Beforehand, Kennedy spent months examining Minge's voting record. He hunkered down alone in his Watertown basement office, surrounded by ancestral photos, mementos of his corporate deals, and his collection of books on Democrat John F. Kennedy, his political hero. (He notes that JFK cut taxes.)

To campaign full time, he quit his $277,000-a-year job as vice president and chief financial officer of Department 56, the Eden Prairie holiday collectibles company.

He had already joined Toastmasters to spend more time with friends. But the speakers club also helped improve his sometimes robotic oratorical style. To build a political network, he helped form a local group of conservatives in business, a sort of alumni association of Young Republicans that became known as "The Rough Riders" in homage to Teddy Roosevelt.

After "shaking every hand in the Second District," Kennedy beat Minge by 155 votes. "I'm lucky enough to come from a large Irish family," is one of Kennedy's favored quips on the stump, "and I have 155 relatives."

On the campaign trail, Kennedy tirelessly tries to tell jokes. He waits like a vaudevillian for the crowd's laughs after he uncorks a line about growing up in Pequot Lakes -- a town "so small that a lot of folks visiting thought it was called 'Resume Speed.' "

He also sticks relentlessly to his talking points and tosses an array of political jabs at prosecutor Klobuchar, asking, "Do we really need more lawyers in Washington?" and saying that she hails from the "liberal fringe."

And as he rushes from town to town, he is almost incapable of passing a Dairy Queen without stopping. He is an unrepentant DQ freak.

'Could be the decisive vote'

As the sun set in Willmar, Kennedy, a devout Catholic who strongly opposes abortion, talked about values.

A crowd of about 50 volunteers and supporters gathered at a picnic grove and listened to him as he let rip on subjects such as keeping "God" in the Pledge of Allegiance and questioning why judges should be ruling on "redefining marriage," thus potentially allowing gays and lesbians to wed.

The accountant-turned-pol was now jabbing his index finger at the crowd.

"The U.S. Supreme Court, we've got four folks that definitely think the Constitution was a pretty good thing and ought to be read," Kennedy said. "And four that have a different viewpoint. And one that just happens to have a name similar to mine [Justice Anthony Kennedy] ... "

He went on, "Our president may have an opportunity to nominate a justice. If we don't have a majority in the Senate to help him get it through, then shame on us."

Then Kennedy made a pitch for his supporters to make phone calls, to write letters to the editor, to get out the vote.

"This could be the decisive vote in the U.S. Senate," he said.

The crowd exploded in applause. Kennedy, smiling broadly, rocked his entire body.

He returned to the RV as buoyant at 9 p.m. as he'd been at 5:29 a.m. It had been a long, good day.

A hardball ally

Mingling with voters, Kennedy is polite and engaging. He says his sensibility is "Big Ten, not Ivy League," a subtle dig at Klobuchar's Yale pedigree.

Ford Bell, a former DFL Senate candidate who disagrees mightily with Kennedy on most issues, said that his rival was always cordial. "When I got out of the race, he said he enjoyed having me in it," Bell said.

So how does Kennedy reconcile that image with his decision to hire a hardball political consultant named Scott Howell to produce his campaign ads?

Howell is famous, or infamous, for producing attack ads against his clients' opponents. He helped orchestrate the "Swift Boat" ad campaign against John Kerry during the 2004 presidential race.

Kennedy's campaign began with rosy ads about his family life. But last week, still trailing in polls, he unveiled ads with a much different focus and tone.

One features images of guns and drugs, suggesting that Kloubuchar, Hennepin County's chief prosecutor, is soft on crime. Another ad suggests she is two-faced on issues.

Kennedy is unapologetic about the tactic. He says the ads about Klobuchar's record are "100 percent factual" and necessary because the media, including the Star Tribune, is not critiquing her and is imposing a "near blackout on anything positive" he has done.

"It's necessary to review each candidate's record," Kennedy said. "If one's record is viewed as negative, that's unfortunate."

'All Kennedys get along'

"What Would Paul Do?" reads the green Wellstone bumper sticker on the bulletin board.

This is Peg Kennedy's office at the Roseville Area Schools, where she manages youth development and bilingual services.

"I'm maybe not the biggest Bush fan in the world," she says. But she's going to vote for her brother anyway.

At 45, she's the sister closest in age to Mark Kennedy and, perhaps, the furthest away in politics.

On abortion and the amount of money needed for education, they agree to disagree.

But Peg Kennedy points out that Mark voted against Bush's signature education initiative, No Child Left Behind. He's also struck a relationship with parts of Minnesota's Somali community. That's close to her heart because she oversees the needs of students who speak 52 different languages.

"All Kennedys get along," said Mark when asked of Peg.

All Kennedys rib each other, too. She likes to tell him, "You know, for four of your first six years [in the Senate] you'll be working with a Democratic president."

DOJ_NMG_0072363

That taunt presumes that in 2008 a Dem will succeed Bush and that her brother will win in November. But polls are projecting election-day gloom for Kennedy, who has felt few defeats.

"The polls do not reflect reality," he said.

Still, Kennedy is seizing on hope where ever he finds it, as he did two Saturdays ago. Four of his favorite sports teams -- Michigan (his business school alma mater), Notre Dame (which two of his children have attended), St. John's (his college) and the Twins -- all were behind in their respective games.

But each fought back hard and won. A sign?

"I'm being providential," Kennedy said.

Cardin, Steele Share Views On Key Issues (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

Maryland's U.S. Senate candidates have more in common on key issues than either candidate is willing to admit.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee, both demand an exit strategy for troops in Iraq. They also want to preserve Social Security benefits for current retirees, but give workers more choice in retirement planning, and they say government should help provide more affordable energy, health care, prescription drugs and college education.

However, on the stump the two men sound worlds apart and likely will continue to emphasize their differences in their first debate Tuesday night at the Greater Baltimore Urban League.

"There is a big difference in the agenda Ben Cardin and Michael Steele will take to the United States Senate," Mr. Cardin said last week at a campaign rally in College Park. "Michael Steele will not hold George Bush accountable for trying to privatize Social Security."

Mr. Steele, a Prince George's County native who formerly ran the state Republican Party, never took a position on President Bush's plan to partially privatize Social Security. The administration shelved the plan last year after it ran into opposition from retirees.

Mr. Cardin, 62, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore, wants workers to have an easier time putting money into private retirement accounts to supplement Social Security.

Mr. Steele, 47, supports giving workers "some ownership" of their retirement savings, perhaps putting a portion of Social Security withholdings into private accounts.

However, Mr. Cardin has supported Social Security privatization plans in the past. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, he helped draft plans in 2002 and in 1998 that would have diverted FICA taxes to private accounts or market investments.

Republicans are criticizing Mr. Cardin for reversing his stance.

"Maryland voters deserve leaders who tells them exactly where they stand on important issues like Social Security, not a lifetime politician who talks out of both sides of his mouth and does one thing while saying another," Maryland Republican Party Chairman John M. Kane said.

The Cardin campaign did not return a call seeking comment.

The candidates do have opposing political ideologies.

Mr. Cardin is a liberal who in the Senate can be expected to vote consistently with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat. Last year, he received a 95 percent rating from the liberal Americans for Democratic Action. Mr. Steele is a conservative, but with an independent streak that at times could put him at odds with his party.

The starkest contrast is on abortion. Mr. Steele is pro-life; Mr. Cardin is pro-choice.

Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye thinks the candidates share no common policy views. "Their approaches are entirely different," he said. On health care, for example, Mr. Heye said Mr. Steele does not agree with Mr. Cardin's support of socialized medicine. Mr. Cardin has often called for universal health coverage.

"I support universal health coverage," Mr. Cardin said at the rally. "[Mr. Steele] does not. There's a big difference."

Still, Mr. Cardin never has advocated socialized medicine. He proposes "building on the current employer-based system of health care" and wants the government to help small businesses pay for employee health benefits.

Mr. Steele also wants the government to help expand access to health care.

The lieutenant governor notes his work with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican seeking re-election, dedicating state grants to increase access to 12 community health centers.

In a recent TV ad, Mr. Steele says Mr. Cardin is part of the "Washington crowd" and that his vote is for sale to special interests.

"Congressman Cardin took money from drug companies and voted against cheaper medicine," Mr. Steele says. "Ben Cardin has taken money from special interests for 20 years. I want to ban gifts from special interests."

Mr. Cardin has accepted campaign contributions from pharmaceutical companies and voted against allowing the reimportation of cheaper drugs from Canada. However, he has proposed several bills aimed at lowering drug prices, including one that would allow the government to haggle for lower prices by using the buying power of its 40 million Medicare recipients.

Mr. Cardin also has proposed ethics reforms, including a streamlined ethics-complaint process and tighter restriction of lobbyists' gifts.

Challenger Known For Zest And Freewheeling Style (SLPD)

By Virginia Young

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

Losing her lifelong dream of becoming Missouri's first woman governor didn't slow Claire McCaskill down.

Months after that 2004 defeat, she decided to challenge Republican Sen. Jim Talent. Such resiliency and zest for battle have marked her career as a legislator, prosecutor and auditor for nearly 24 years.

Some of McCaskill's friends say this race could be her "up-or-out" campaign.

"She knows if she loses, this is it for her," says her longtime friend, political consultant Steve Glorioso of Kansas City.

McCaskill, 53, doesn't dwell on the possibility of losing. She's too busy calling potential donors and canvassing the state in a bright blue RV. Polls show Talent and McCaskill in a dead heat.

The race is one of a handful nationwide that will determine whether Republicans will keep control of the Senate.

To win, McCaskill must woo rural voters, who sided with Republican Gov. Matt Blunt in 2004 and overpowered her margin in urban areas.

So she's spending time in places like Springfield and Joplin, Poplar Bluff and Caruthersville. That's where the radio airwaves are loaded with Republican spots painting her as anti-gun, pro-tax, close to environmentalists and soft on illegal aliens.

"They work very hard at making me Satan's sister," she quips.

Her theme is that Talent votes in lockstep with the president and listens to corporate America. She promises to be a senator "on our side."

People often stop her to express regret for not backing her for governor, she says. Many are upset about Blunt's cuts in Medicaid, the government health care program for the poor.

"There's a real sense the government has become more and more about the powerful and the wealthy," McCaskill says.

On a recent Saturday afternoon, McCaskill take her message to Poplar Bluff. She and her husband, developer Joseph Shepard, board the rented RV for the three-hour trek from St. Louis to the 41st Annual Truman Day Rally.

McCaskill says she is more relaxed during this campaign. She doesn't have to fight her own party, like she did in 2004 when she toppled Gov. Bob Holden for the Democratic nomination.

She enjoys taking the RV instead of the family-owned twin-engine aircraft. She can work at the table on her wireless laptop. Sometimes, her mother, sisters or children — Austin, 19, Maddie, 17 and Lily, 14 — tag along.

Wearing a pink suit and pearls, she settles in. She brought Thomas E. Ricks' book about the war, "Fiasco," that she saw President Bill Clinton carrying during his recent fundraiser for McCaskill in St. Louis. Foreign policy is not her forte so she crams to catch up.

She advocates a two-year phased pullout in Iraq, with American troops eventually replaced by a multinational force.

"This isn't about throwing in the towel," she says. "It's about being smarter."

She jokes about the trackers who slip into meetings and secretly record her. With her tendency for pithy lines, her words instantly find their way to the Internet's blogs.

Some have drawn heat, such as when she said President Bush let people die on rooftops in New Orleans or when she called state senators Neanderthals. But McCaskill says she won't drop her freewheeling style.

When the RV arrives in Poplar Bluff, she stands to stretch a bad knee that needs replacing as soon as the election is over. She tries not to limp.

Inside, the Elks hall is bustling. The Butler County Democratic Central Committee has sold 325 tickets for the steak-and-baked-potato feed. Some in the crowd wear stickers that proclaim: "Had enough? Vote Democrat."

McCaskill takes the podium after dinner, at 8:55 p.m. She says Republicans are calling the shots in both Washington and Jefferson City so they should be held accountable for everything from immigration problems to gas prices to pork barrel projects.

She promises to work to ease the "middle class squeeze" by pushing tax breaks for first-time home purchases, child care and college tuition.

"Let's take some of those tax breaks for multimillionaires and give them to the middle class," she says, drawing applause.

Voters such as Carol McManaman of Cape Girardeau like her pitch. "The current government is not supportive of everyday people," McManaman says.

Politics in her veins

McCaskill's roots are in rural Missouri.

Her family lived in Houston in south-central Missouri when she was born. They moved to Lebanon and later Columbia when her father, the late Bill McCaskill, got a promotion in his insurance company.

Politics was the family pastime. In the early 1970s, her father oversaw insurance regulation for Gov. Warren Hearnes.

Her mother, Betty McCaskill, was the first woman elected to the Columbia City Council. She was known for her outspokenness, walking out of improper closed meetings and telling reporters what was going on.

Claire McCaskill says she reached a "fork in the road" when she failed to make cheerleader at Hickman High School her senior year. She was devastated until the assistant principal suggested she try the debate team.

She credits the experience with giving her the self-confidence and tools to go into politics. She learned to think on her feet. She says she never gives the same speech twice.

Her younger sister, Lisa Finn, says McCaskill has always dealt with setbacks by forging ahead.

"Claire just has always been able to see the big picture," Finn says. Disappointments are "not something she needs to carry around like baggage."

After she got her bachelor's and law degrees from the University of Missouri in Columbia, McCaskill split for Kansas City.

First, she worked as an assistant prosecutor, handling sexual abuse cases. Winning a House seat at age 29, she established a reputation as a straight-shooter.

"She will say what's on her mind," says Jan Marcason, who worked on McCaskill's first campaign. "She doesn't try to be all things to all people."

McCaskill helped found the Greater Kansas City Women's Political Caucus, which Marcason says began with 30 women in a church basement. It now draws 1,000 people to its annual awards dinner.

McCaskill left the House to become the first female Jackson County prosecutor. She set up a drug court and stepped up domestic violence prosecutions.

Subject of criticism

She won the auditor's job in 1998 on a promise to do "performance audits" that tracked whether programs were effective.

Her hard-hitting reports the past eight years have attacked hundreds of wasteful practices, even when her own party controlled the governor's office. Critics say she oversteps her authority and hypes findings to get media attention.

"It's fine to say 'This is bad,'" said Senate Majority Leader Charlie Shields, R-St. Joseph. "The next question is, 'What are you doing to fix it?'"

Shields says that unlike other statewide officeholders, McCaskill has never been in his office to push for any legislative action.

Talent contends McCaskill has a liberal record and is reinventing herself to gain votes in rural Missouri. He is hammering her on three volatile issues: guns, taxes and abortion.

Radio spots allege that McCaskill supports gun restrictions, the "death tax" and "abortion on demand at any time up to nine months." The Republican National Committee is paying for the spots, which are running everywhere in the state except St. Louis and Kansas City.

McCaskill calls the ad misleading. While she opposed bills allowing people to carry concealed weapons, "she's not taking anyone's gun," says her communications director, Adrianne Marsh.

The "death tax" refers to the estate tax, which McCaskill opposes repealing. But she favors exempting the first $10 million, which would help family farmers and small businesses.

As for abortion, McCaskill has supported a ban on partial-birth abortion, but only if it contains a provision to protect the life of the mother.

Mansion minus airs

Though she's running on her platform for the middle class, McCaskill is married to a multimillionaire.

She and Shepard, who wed in 2002, recently built a mansion in Kirkwood. It includes a swimming pool and an apartment for McCaskill's mother over the garage.

The sprawling complex dwarfs the modest houses in the neighborhood, some of which have been there for more than half a century.

But McCaskill has made friends on the block. She attends neighborhood meetings and hosted the Christmas potluck dinner. She loves to cook.

Samuel M. Taft, 90, owns a ranch house up the street, though he recently moved to a senior apartment complex. He says neighbors thought the mansion "was a little much, but they are accepting it because the people are genuine."

McCaskill has "a lot of charisma, a lot of ability and talent," Taft says.

Historically, the party that's out of power gains congressional seats midway through a president's second term. Uneasiness with the war in Iraq could add to the Democrats' momentum.

"People have had enough," McCaskill declares. "They want a different voice. They want balance."

So is this her last race? She says no, because she's going to win and could seek re-election after a six-year term.

"It's my last campaign for six years," she says.

Incumbent Senator Is Intense And Restless (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON

When Sen. Jim Talent decided to re-examine his position on stem cell research, he took a quiet, methodical approach to the politically explosive question.

He read scholarly journals and opinion pieces. He delved into the details of human biology. He met with scientists and had long debates with his staff. And he talked over the political implications with his wife.

The freshman senator took an entire year to come to his new conclusion: that he should withdraw his support for a human cloning ban that critics said would also outlaw stem cell research. Instead, Talent decided to back a still-developing alternative procedure.

To some, the decision seemed out of character, a politically motivated switch aimed at blunting his conservative edges for his re-election campaign.

But Talent's soul-searching was not unusual for the low-key lawmaker, who approaches nearly every issue with a zeal for detail. He doesn't rush into anything, taking a deliberative, careful tack. And although he is staunchly conservative, he is also deeply pragmatic.

DOJ_NMG_0072367

"He's not a firebrand by any stretch," says Julie Dammann, ex-chief of staff to Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo., who has known Talent for nearly 15 years. "He's principled but pragmatic. His approach is, 'Let's see if there's a way to accommodate everyone'."

Staircase sleeper

Among his Senate colleagues, Talent is known as astute, affable, and intense. He is driven and ambitious, but not splashy or sharp-elbowed. He's a policy wonk who avoids the Sunday talk shows and is rarely found at the center of any Washington media throng.

"He's very steady, reliable, thoughtful and practical," said Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., who often runs into Talent in the evenings at the Capitol Hill gym, where they make plans to go out for buffalo chicken wings at a nearby pizza place. "He's a guy who understands the parameters of what you can accomplish."

Tall and lanky, Talent, who will turn 50 this month, even wins praise from some Democratic colleagues.

In politics, "you see a lot of ceremony and posturing and phony baloney," but there's none of that pomp with Talent, said Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., who teamed up with Talent on a transportation initiative. "He's just very easy to work with."

Although Talent's financial disclosure shows that his family's net worth is between $1.1 million and $3.9 million, he shares a one-bedroom apartment near the Supreme Court with Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas. He sleeps on a landing at the top of a staircase, where he has just enough room for a clothes rack and a bedside table.

He confesses to occasionally sleeping in his Senate office if he's working late. A big night out for Talent means going out for wings, or perhaps watching a baseball game with staff at a nearby restaurant.

Brownback said they don't get into a lot of deep policy debates most evenings, and not just because they agree on most issues. "There's a camaraderie of dads that miss being around their kids and husbands that miss being around their wives. That concentrates a lot of our discussion," Brownback said.

Back in Missouri, Talent rarely gets any down-time now that his campaign is in full swing. When he does, he says he often spends it playing foosball with his 10-year-old daughter, Chrissy, fishing with 16-year-old son, Michael, or taking the family's new Great Dane puppy for a walk near his home in Chesterfield.

Mixing it up

At a late-August campaign stop in Farmington, Mo., Talent checked his Blackberry and reviewed his talking points, written out on a crumpled business card stashed in his pocket, as he waited to give his pitch to the clutch of GOP voters.

In the warm morning sun, Talent's low-key delivery didn't rev the crowd into a frenzy. But his soft sell worked all the same, with voters cheering him on and vowing to rally their neighbors to the polls in November.

But behind Talent's pleasant persona lies a sharply conservative philosophy.

He came to Congress in 1993 as part of a vanguard of hard-charging GOP conservatives who wrested control of the House from the Democrats the next year. In the Senate, he almost always lines up with his party's leaders, supporting the Republican agenda on everything from tax cuts to the Iraq war to gay marriage.

Talent's own legislative record is more mixed. Many of the top proposals he has pushed in the last four years were driven more by pragmatism than ideology—and most involved working with liberal Democrats:

He teamed up with Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., to pass a new anti-methamphetamine law that put cold remedies behind the pharmacy counter.

He worked with Wyden to win approval of $15 billion in federal bonding authority to build or rebuild highways and bridges.

He and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., pushed legislation creating 40 sickle-cell treatment and research centers around the country.

He joined several Democrats in pressing for a new national fuel requirement that doubles the use of ethanol over the next seven years.

Intense, relentless

His approach centers on being deliberate and quiet.

One example: his efforts on behalf of ethanol, a popular issue among Talent's base of supporters in rural Missouri.

DOJ_NMG_0072368

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said Talent was direct and relentless in winning the panel's approval.

"He's a go-getter," Domenici said. "He isn't a hollering-and-screaming go-getter. He just gets his target set, comes to see you, tells you what he wants to do, and then he works like hell at it."

When the bill reached the House, Talent used his old contacts to keep the pressure on.

"He called me every single day, saying 'Can you talk to so-and-so'?" said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, R-Cape Girardeau. Emerson was not on the House negotiating committee, but Talent wanted her to call her friends who were.

"He drove me crazy," she said. "He's very deliberate and gets very intense."

Talent has softened his conservative edges since coming to the Senate, and even more so since it became clear he would face a difficult election challenge from state Auditor Claire McCaskill. Democratic critics say voters should not be fooled. Rep. Lacy Clay Jr., D-St. Louis, who has known Talent for 20 years and counts him as a friend, says Talent is no moderate.

"There's no way around his voting record. The proof is in the pudding," Clay said. Of Talent's stem cell switch, Clay quipped, "That's just shrewd political calculation."

In 2004, Talent voted with his party 96 percent of the time and with the president 94 percent of the time. Last year, those figures dipped to 84 percent and 91 percent respectively. In 2004, he won a 96 percent rating from the American Conservative Union, based on 25 votes ranging from federal spending to gun control to judicial nominations. Last year, his rating fell to 84 percent.

Talent says he's always been driven by pragmatism and the desire to find consensus, even in the mid-1990s when he was among those leading the GOP charge to reform welfare. That effort, he notes, eventually resulted in a dramatic attitude shift, in both parties, toward the federal poverty program.

"What I often will do on issues that have provoked a lot of controversy is to try and understand them on a detailed level," he said. "If you do, you'll often find ways to either eliminate, or at least narrow, the differences."

Conservative roots

The day after Talent won the election in 2002, defeating Sen. Jean Carnahan, D-Mo., he said he hoped to be like Sen. John Danforth, the Missouri Republican known for his independent streak.

Danforth was one of his mother's favorite politicians, Talent recounted at the time, because she knew he was "calling each one as he sees them." Talent said he wanted to be seen as a senator who did that too.

It was a striking aspiration for someone then known as a rock-ribbed conservative.

In his first years in the House, Talent aligned himself closely with the GOP leadership, becoming a top lieutenant to House Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas, and even flirting briefly with a bid for House Speaker.

He took a leading role on welfare reform and argued for even tougher restrictions than GOP leaders had embraced, including a proposal to deny federal benefits to young unwed mothers.

His voting record was unabashedly conservative: he voted against a minimum wage increase, against campaign finance reform, and against the Family and Medical Leave Act. He voted in favor of school vouchers, repealing the assault weapons ban, and impeaching President Bill Clinton.

Steven Smith, a political science professor at Washington University, said Talent is among a group of Republican senators who entered politics at a time when conservatism was on the rise. "They all came in and first ran as fairly strong partisans, sometimes with a deliberate conservative edge," he said. "And they are all deserting it now. Senator Talent is, too."

Smith and others say Talent is no Danforth.

"What's clearly true here is Talent has been a team player for the Republican Party and for the Bush administration since he was elected," Smith said.

"... Danforth stood out for being an independent voice ... and Talent really has not been a strong independent voice."

Talent says his guiding philosophy has never changed: that government should only do a few things, but it should do them very well.

His work, he says, has focused on both sides of that equation; he looks for ways to lighten government's "oppressive" hand when it comes to taxes and regulation, while strengthening government's abilities when it comes to infrastructure or justice.

That explains, he says, why he wants to abolish the estate tax and pushed for a big increase in transportation spending. Or why he wants to lift regulations on small business health plans and has called for a new unit in the Justice Department to investigate murders from the civil rights era.

"Some people look at that as my style changing," Talent said of his work with Democrats. But he sees it as simple pragmatism—and very consistent with his basic outlook of small and effective government.

"I approach things with that lens and I vote that way," he said.

Race Keys On Who's Missing (HC)

By Kristen Mack

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Republican is not on the ballot, and Dem never names GOP rival

Former U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay is as partisan as they come, and the Republican write-in candidate to succeed him is taking the same approach. The Democrat in the race, perhaps not surprisingly, is playing down his party ties in the Republican-leaning suburban Houston district.

City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is invoking the name of U.S. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a bogeywoman to Republicans, and raising the specter of Pelosi as speaker should the Democrats reclaim control of the House.

"This is ground zero for the Democrat Party," Sekula-Gibbs said at a recent Republican gathering, using a favorite GOP pejorative for its Democratic rival.

"They've been effective in getting rid of the most conservative member of the House," she said of DeLay, addressing the faithful at the Greater Houston Pachyderm Club.

She talks big: As the 22nd Congressional District goes, so go the midterm elections. Yet she acknowledges that the national Republican Party isn't sure about her chances as a write-in.

"We have support, attention and response from our national leaders," she said. "But Washington has to be convinced this is winnable."

Democrat Nick Lampson, by contrast, talks mostly about wanting to advance the district beyond partisan politics.

"I'm not running for this office to move it to the left or the right but to move it forward," Lampson likes to say at campaign events. "We need to concentrate on issues and not partisanship. I came into this race and decided I wasn't going to run against anyone."

As it turns out, the statement means more than he thought: His only ballot opponent is a Libertarian, and that party has had little success in Texas. DeLay resigned from Congress after winning nomination for a 12th term, and courts prohibited Republicans from replacing him on the Nov. 7 ballot.

With 17 months of campaigning under his belt and millions in the bank, Lampson has a head start over Sekula-Gibbs.

In fact, listening to him speak, you wouldn't know he has an opponent.

Instead he starts off sharing his personal background. He's the fifth of six children. His father died when he was 12, which is when he got his first job. His mother relied on government assistance to help them get by. She had a fifth-grade education but earned her GED on her 80th birthday.

Lampson isn't the most compelling speaker, but the story of hardscrabble upbringing often draws nods of empathy from crowds.

For Lampson, the race has a kind of political symmetry. He was ousted from the U.S. House in 2004 after his Southeast Texas district was redrawn to elect a Republican in the redistricting engineered by DeLay.

Move to StaffordDuring four terms in Congress, Lampson represented 20 percent of what is now the 22nd District, including the Johnson Space Center. He moved last year from Beaumont to Stafford, which is in the district.

He filed for the seat assuming his Republican opponent would be DeLay, who had been tainted by ethics reprimands and an indictment on charges relating to campaign finance.

As it turned out, no Republican is on the general election ballot for the 22nd.

DOJ_NMG_0072370

But Sekula-Gibbs' name will be on the ballot for the special election to complete the final weeks of DeLay's term. That will be the first thing voters in the district see on their ballots.

The Secretary of State's Office directed Harris County Clerk Beverly Kaufman to put the special election at the top of the ballot, ahead of the general election races, said Kaufman spokesman David Beirne.

That placement alone may give Sekula-Gibbs' write-in chances a boost, although no write-in candidate has ever won a House race in Texas.

Her campaign slogan, "Vote Twice for Shelley," reminds her supporters that marking the special election ballot alone isn't enough and that they need to write in her name later on the ballot to send her to Congress next year.

"You don't have to spell it right, just get it close and it should count," she said during a recent meeting of the Greater Houston Council of Federated Republican Women.

Explaining how to voteThe need to explain how to vote for her leaves her less time to convince voters that they should.

Sekula-Gibbs has several versions of her stump speech. The one-minute version goes something like this: "I support the global war on terror. I'm for taxes that are fair, life and traditional marriage. My opponent is not a moderate. He has the worst rating on taxes; he's for embryonic stem cell research."

She always mentions Lampson. He never talks about her. Acknowledging her in any way only builds her name identification in the district.

Sekula-Gibbs, who is a physician, has focused as a councilwoman on health issues, pushing for a citywide public smoking ban and for more federally qualified health clinics.

But her emphasis has moved to hot-button conservative issues since she began her congressional bid.

One of those, illegal immigration, came to the forefront in the last few weeks as the city mourned the shooting death of police officer Rodney Johnson. The suspect is an illegal immigrant.

Sekula-Gibbs pushed Mayor Bill White to repeal a police policy limiting inquiries about immigration status.

Late last year she accused then-Councilman Mark Ellis, who was running for a state Senate seat, of "political gamesmanship" when he made a similar request.

The national Republican Party has taken note of her candidacy, though not at the $3 million level state GOP leaders had mentioned when they voted to back Sekula-Gibbs' write-in candidacy.

The National Republican Congressional Committee has contributed nearly $100,000 to her campaign. And Vice President Dick Cheney is coming to Houston on Wednesday to host a fundraiser for her.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner joined Sekula-Gibbs for a fundraiser last month in Washington.

Lampson snagged 2004 Democratic vice-presidential nominee John Edwards to headline a fundraiser on his behalf a few weeks ago. And the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has reserved $850,000 worth of television advertising time for the last two weeks of the campaign on Lampson's behalf, said DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg.

Lampson's key issuesLampson didn't file in the special election, saying it would be confusing. Sekula-Gibbs says he didn't want to face a Republican in a head-to-head competition.

If that were true, Lampson says, he wouldn't have entered the race when DeLay was the likely opponent.

Lampson's key issues are homeland security, education and health care.

Among other things, he advocates tax deductions for all money spent on higher education and questions whether special-needs children — such as the ones his wife teaches — should be subject to standardized testing.

Libertarian Bob Smither is running in both the general and special elections.

He touts himself as the conservative on the general election ballot.

"I wouldn't say I'm aligning myself with the Republican Party," said Smither, an engineer who founded the Laura Recovery Center for missing and abducted children. "I'm aligning myself with conservative values."

Although Libertarians have appeared on the Texas ballot for years, none has been elected to a major office. Smither has no significant campaign funding and realizes he has a lot to overcome.

Meanwhile, Lampson realizes that even as the sole major-party candidate on the general election ballot, he will have to win votes from at least some residents who supported DeLay for years.

Robert Klein, a retired chemical-industry manager who attended a house party for Lampson, said he faces a battle even with the ballot advantage.

Still, Klein said, this is Lampson's best shot: "If Lampson can't win now, he can't win."

High-powered Allies Come Out To Back Murtha (PPG)

By Bill Toland

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 1, 2006

Congressman's opposition to Iraq War divides electorate

JOHNSTOWN -- If John Murtha is ceding a significant segment of the military voting block to Republican challenger Diana Irey, as she hopes and claims, there were few signs of it yesterday. A cavalcade of rank-and-file vets and Democratic military brass gathered in Johnstown's damp Central Park to support the representative from Pennsylvania's 12th Congressional District.

Former U.S. Sen. Max Cleland, a disabled Vietnam veteran, was the rally's master of ceremonies, and he was joined through the late morning and early afternoon by Vietnam veteran and former U.S. Sen. Bob Kerrey, former NATO commander Gen. Wesley Clark, state Auditor General Jack Wagner and finally Gov. Ed Rendell, himself seeking re-election this November.

They all hit on a common theme -- that Mr. Murtha, the top-ranking Democrat on the House committee that disburses defense appropriations -- is a great friend of the American soldier, not a foe, as his challengers are trying to paint him.

"We're tired of swift-boating in America," said Georgia's Cleland, who lost his own re-election bid in 2002 after his patriotism was questioned. "And it stops right here today, in Johnstown, Pennsylvania."

Mr. Murtha, who spent 37 years in the Marine Corps and its reserves, angered some veterans, and became a visible target for the GOP, when he began publicly campaigning for a military withdrawal from Iraq. He's drawn more partisan fire as he's continued to criticize the White House's handling of the war, as well as Marine involvement in the killing of 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha. (When Mr. Murtha went on the offensive following the Haditha revelations, Ms. Irey called on the congressman to apologize, saying he was aiding and comforting the enemy.)

Ms. Irey's name wasn't spoken once over the course of the 90-minute rally, which police officials say drew a crowd of 2,000, but the incendiary issues have put this race, and Ms. Irey's face and candidacy, into a national spotlight. The Washington County commissioner says she believes the military voting bloc is more divided than Mr. Murtha realizes. She hopes to capitalize on the split in Cambria County and the rest of the 12th District, which historically had been impenetrable to Republicans, but in recent presidential elections has been voting more conservatively. Ms. Irey won't attend today's "Boot Murtha" rally in Johnstown, organized by local vet Craig Minnick and a GOP group called "Vets for Truth."

Mr. Murtha's criticisms, said Mr. Kerrey, demonstrate that the congressman of three decades has the courage to oppose the White House, in a time when opposition of the president means you'll be branded a turncoat.

"Long before it was cool to wave a flag and support the men and women wearing the military [uniforms] of our Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Force and Coast Guard, Jack Murtha was waving the flag and supporting the men and women of our Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps and Coast Guard," Mr. Kerrey said. "Until Jack Murtha stood up and began to tell the American people what was going on, there were far too many people [unaware]."

The other speakers picked up where Mr. Kerrey left off. "Jack had the courage to stand up and tell the truth," said Gen. Clark. "This administration's leadership of the war has been incompetent, inept. We're not going to let any swift-boaters, shrimp-boaters or anybody else take out Jack Murtha."

Mr. Rendell, who flew in from Harrisburg yesterday afternoon, said Mr. Murtha has done more for American fighting men and women than "any American alive today ... How dare these outsiders come here to Pennsylvania and impugn the patriotism of one of the greatest sons in this commonwealth's history."

Mr. Murtha took the dais last, again criticizing the war effort but sympathizing with the soldiers who must fight it, as well as the nearly 3,000 killed and 20,000 injured. "You know what this war's doing? It's tearing the families apart," he said. "I don't appreciate these people sitting on their fat backsides in the White House, sending our young people to war, when they don't understand the circumstances."

In a recent interview, Ms. Irey said that Mr. Murtha has lost touch with his constituency. "Jack Murtha has been in office 32 years, and that's too long," she said.

She won't be attending today's anti-Murtha rally, she said, because she doesn't want it to appear that her campaign is coordinating with the "Vets for Truth" group.

Stay-the-course Republican Challenges Murtha For Congress (TLPA)

By Jennifer C. Yates

Times Leader (NE PA), October 1, 2006

TARENTUM, Pa. - Republican Diana Irey knew she was taking on a political giant when she decided to run against U.S. Rep. John Murtha, now best-known for his opposition to the Iraq war. But she is hoping her strong support for the war will make her stand out.

Murtha has represented southwestern Pennsylvania for 32 years, winning the last general election with 74 percent of the vote. He's one of the most powerful Democrats in Congress. And there's even an airport named after the 73-year-old Vietnam veteran - who stands over 6 feet tall - in his southwestern Pennsylvania district.

Irey, who is just under 5 feet tall and nearly 30 years younger than Murtha, has been a Washington County commissioner for 11 years but is making her first bid for Congress.

"This is going to be the Diana and Goliath story," said Irey, 44.

Irey said she was spurred to run in part because of Murtha's high-profile criticism of the Iraq war, which has turned the once low-profile congressman into a nationally prominent figure.

At the least, Irey said, she is giving voters a clear choice.

Irey wants troops in Iraq to stay the course while Murtha has called for a withdrawal. She supports term limits; he is in his 16th term. She wants to make President Bush's tax cuts permanent; he voted against them.

But her No. 1 issue remains the war.

"My passion about the war comes from the many soldiers I've talked to who have been in Iraq and have told me about the progress we've been making," said Irey during a recent meet-and-greet at a Tarentum storefront.

Last year, Murtha drew a mix of criticism and praise when he called for the immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq. In May, he raised eyebrows again when he said that Marine Corps officials told him that U.S. troops had killed innocent civilians in Haditha, Iraq, "in cold blood."

The comments have spurred outcries of both praise and criticism of Murtha, with competing groups holding spirited rallies in his hometown of Johnstown.

Larry Bailey, a North Carolina resident and U.S. Navy veteran who heads the group Veterans for the Truth, has been a vocal opponent of Murtha. He said politicians don't "have the right to bad-mouth the troops."

Michael L. Young, a retired public affairs professor from Penn State-Harrisburg who now runs an opinion research firm, said there's no indication Murtha will lose his seat. But the contest could be affected by people's perceptions of the war, Young said.

"It's the kind of volatile situation where challengers like her with not a lot of political experience or even resources can sometimes strike a lightning blow because of the myriad of national forces at play in the race," Young said.

Murtha, lauded for his success in attracting many lucrative defense contracts to western Pennsylvania, said he believes he has overwhelming support in the district.

"The mood in my district is the same that it is any place else in the country," said Murtha after a recent news conference in Washington. "Sixty percent of the people, 59 percent, think we need a change in direction and that's what I see in my district."

The 12th Congressional District, made up of parts of nine southwestern Pennsylvania counties, supported Democrat John Kerry with 51 percent of the vote in the last presidential election.

Irey has raised thousands of dollars online - noting she's received contributions from all 50 states and received more than one million hits on her Web site. But she had just $159,138 in cash compared with Murtha's $1.6 million at the end of June, according to their most recent Federal Election Commission filings.

"I've defeated 25 candidates in the past, but we're working every day," Murtha said. "We know you got to take care of yourself first in these elections."

Irey believes she would bring a fresh perspective to the job. She easily shifts gears during conversation, talking about her three teenage children and family pets - including two dogs, a cat and a horse. She said the decision to enter the race was a family one.

"It was just listening to what Mr. Murtha was saying. I was starting to get really concerned about the state of the district," Irey said.

In 1995, Irey became the first woman elected as a Washington County commissioner. She has worked to attract businesses to the mostly rural county and opposed allowing prison inmates access to cable TV.

Irey said Murtha spends too little time in his own district. He has toured the country raising funds for more than 40 other Democratic candidates, something Republicans have criticized as his "cut-and-run" tour.

"His views now are more like the liberal voters of San Francisco," said Irey, a native of West Virginia who has lived in Pennsylvania for 22 years. "I hear so often, 'He's not the Jack Murtha he used to be.'"

When people meet her, Irey said, "they usually say, 'I thought you'd be bigger.'"

Stumping in Tarentum recently, Irey and a legislative candidate knocked on doors at an apartment building. Though she's an hour north of her home county, Irey finds she's not a total stranger.

"Yes, there you are!" exclaims resident Gary Cunningham, 53, after Irey introduces herself. Cunningham, doing laundry in a first-floor common room, said he knew Irey from her appearance on a local conservative radio talk show.

"As soon as I see you I think of John Murtha, and I get a bad taste in my mouth," said Cunningham, who later admits he isn't registered to vote.

She gives Cunningham voter registration information and they chat briefly about the war in Iraq. She continues going door to door, spreading her message with a wide smile and firm hand shake.

"Hi, I'm Diana Irey and I'm running for Congress."

Iraq Is Topic Non Grata In Hot Races (MJS)

By Steve Schultze And Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 1, 2006

Gard, Kagen among candidates treading carefully on war

When prompted, Republican congressional candidate John Gard offers a staunch defense of the current U.S. policy in Iraq.

"I believe victory (in Iraq) is our only alternative," says Gard, fighting a tough battle for Wisconsin's 8th District U.S. House seat against Democrat Steve Kagen.

"Iraq is an essential front in the war on terror," Gard says. "We must stabilize Iraq economically, militarily" before U.S. troops leave.

His words echo President Bush's determined line on the war, an issue that's dragged down Bush's popularity.

But suggest that Gard takes the "Bush" position on Iraq, and the candidate objects.

"I think it's an American position," says Gard, who cites Ronald Reagan rather than George W. Bush as his foreign policy model: "I believe in the Reagan strategy of peace through strength."

Such comments underscore the political dilemma Republicans in hot races this fall face over the war, as they strive to support the Iraq effort without being identified too closely with the way it has been handled.

"I think in most races they're trying to dance around the issue," political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says of GOP candidates. "The war has come to stand for the president's failures, or shortcomings." Political dilemmas

Of course, they're not entirely alone. Democrats face some dilemmas of their own, such as whether to support a pullout from Iraq and how to shield themselves from GOP charges of "retreat and defeat."

Democrat Kagen is blunt in declaring that "the way things are going right now, Iraq is gone." But he won't say when he thinks the troops should come home.

In other words, Democrats have to tread carefully, too, especially in moderate to conservative districts. The result is that in some congressional races, the Iraq debate has been surprisingly muted. Gard and Kagen have scarcely mentioned Iraq in their TV ads.

"They are staying away" from the war issues, seemingly hesitant about what tack to take, said David Littig, a retired University of Wisconsin-Green Bay political scientist.

"It's the elephant in the room," said one Democrat who has been involved in the House campaign and spoke on the condition his name not be used. "Everybody knows there's a problem (there). Nobody wants to talk about solutions, because they know they're all lousy."

The Gard-Kagen race isn't unique. In many of the country's contested congressional races, candidates are spending most of their TV dollars on other subjects, from domestic issues to personal attacks on their opponents.

This is especially true of Republicans, weighed down by the war's unpopularity and the Bush administration's poor approval ratings. Some GOP candidates have openly criticized the war and the administration, especially in "blue" states such as Connecticut and Pennsylvania.

But in most close races, Republicans are taking a different tack: sticking to local issues or steering the debate to the broader war on terror, where Bush enjoys more public support. 'No easy answers'

Amy Walter, who follows House races for the Cook Political Report, describes the tactic as, "Just change the subject."

Says Walter: "Republicans don't want to talk about it."

Gard has not pushed Iraq as an issue, and he deflects questions about Bush's stewardship of the war.

"It's not about supporting President Bush," Gard said last week, when asked whether he supports the president's handling of Iraq. "Too many people focus on the individual."

Gard says "mistakes have been made," including disbanding the Iraqi military after the U.S. invasion ended.

But the Assembly speaker from Peshtigo isn't doing a whole lot to distance himself from the war, either. He stands squarely with the Bush administration in opposition to a withdrawal plan.

"There are no easy answers here," Gard, 43, said in another recent interview. He added that Kagen "wants to abandon our allies, and I want to do what it takes to achieve victory."

Democrats say criticisms of "cut and run" are losing their political teeth. And they've been armed by the release of a National Intelligence Estimate tying the war to the proliferation of terrorists, and even the new Bob Woodward book "State of Denial," with its grim portrait of wartime leadership. Unpopular war

"Any time the focus shifted back to national security and to terror or foreign policy, it used to be an advantage for Republicans. The big difference this time is that is simply not true," said Paul Maslin, who is Kagen's pollster. "If Gard wants to defend that policy (in Iraq) to the hilt, he is really limiting himself to the base Republicans."

Gard may be helped in the war debate by the district's Republican tilt. Bush carried it by 11 points in 2004. But both sides acknowledge that the political climate favors Democrats this year. And some polls suggest the war might be more unpopular in Wisconsin than it is nationally.

The GOP firm of Strategic Vision is polling independently each month in Wisconsin and six other states: Washington, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia, Florida and Michigan. In a recent round of September polls, likely voters in Wisconsin registered the lowest approval rating of any of those states for Bush's handling of Iraq: 25%.

The partisan breakdown in the Wisconsin poll is revealing: 59% of Republicans approved of the president's performance on Iraq. But just 4% of Democrats, and only 12% of independents, approved.

GOP officials say that despite such numbers, Iraq is not playing a major role in most contested races.

"It has to do with, first, a lack of Democratic credibility on the issue and the lack of any kind of a coherent Democratic alternative as to what they would do," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Campaign Committee. Difference in attack

Kagen, a wealthy allergist making his first run for Congress, is vague about when he would bring the troops home, saying it's a judgment better left to the generals. But his comments about the war suggest he sees Iraq as a lost cause.

"Are we going to invest in a foreign nation that once was called Iraq? Iraq has gone the way of Yugoslavia. It is not coming back. It's a mess," said Kagen at a Democratic "unity rally" in Green Bay on Sept. 16.

In an interview last week, the 56-year-old Kagen said a breakup of the country might bring more stability, as it did in Yugoslavia.

"The first mistake was getting involved in the first place," Kagen said. Now, the U.S. must work to convince Iraqis that "we are not going to stay . . . the path we are on is simply unacceptable."

Kagen has made health care the leading theme of his advertising.

Evan Tracey, who tracks campaign advertising, says that when Iraq is invoked by Republicans, it's usually to attack Democrats for not supporting the troops or being defeatist. When it's invoked by Democrats, it's part of a broader attack against Republicans as rubber-stamps for President Bush. 'Radio silence'

In that vein, Iraq could certainly work its way more dramatically into the Gard-Kagen race before election day.

But for now, "radio silence" is how one political observer in Green Bay, lawyer Tim Nixon, described the way Gard and Kagen are dealing with Iraq.

"It's almost a third-rail issue for both sides," said Nixon, who sits on the Green Bay Area Chamber of Commerce and says he doesn't see in northeastern Wisconsin the stark partisan fault lines on the issue that national polls have found. One reason, he says, is the number of local military units that have served.

The Strategic Vision poll lends some support to that view. In that Sept. 15 to 17 survey, 59% of likely Wisconsin voters favored withdrawal of U.S. troops "within six months." Both Republicans (43% favored withdrawal) and independents (55% favored withdrawal) were quite divided about what future course to take in Iraq.

"I've got people I know who never voted Democratic in their life, and this war thing is making them crazy," Nixon said. "And I know (non-Republicans) with kids over there, and they want to support it wholeheartedly. . . . It's amazing for a 'small' war how many people this has touched here." The Elephant In The Florida 22nd: Medicare Prescription Benefit (WP)

By Anushka Asthana

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. -- Betty Priscak has voted for veteran Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) in every election he has been in, but now she thinks it is time for a change. Priscak, a 74-year-old in increasingly poor health, plans to vote for Ron Klein, Shaw's Democratic challenger, in November.

Why? She is upset with the Medicare prescription drug program passed by the Republicans in 2003. She calls it "devastating."

The initial uproar over the program's complexity died down once many seniors had signed up, but now Priscak and millions of other older Americans are confronting an interruption in their drug coverage that will require them to pay the full cost of their prescriptions -- or go without. Priscak came up against the coverage gap, known as the "doughnut hole," in May, and it was months before the drug coverage kicked back in.

If it had not been for financial assistance from her partner, she said, she would not have been able to meet the thousands of dollars of uncovered drug costs. "If you think I dare vote for a Republican, you have another thought coming," she said.

Priscak is not alone. According to the consulting firm Price Waterhouse Coopers LLC, 3.4 million seniors will fall into the doughnut hole this year.

The doughnut hole ends federal payments for a person's drug purchases once an annual spending limit is reached, resuming them only after the beneficiary has spent thousands of dollars out-of-pocket. It was one of the most contentious elements of the 2003 legislation that created the drug benefit, which was championed by the Bush administration and congressional Republicans.

Shaw's district, which stretches from West Palm Beach to Fort Lauderdale, has one of the highest concentrations of Medicare recipients in the country. Tens of thousands of residents have signed up for the prescription drug program, known as Part D. Democrats have long hoped to tap into voter dissatisfaction with the program, thinking it could affect some congressional races.

"When folks show up at the pharmacy and get hit with paying 100 percent of their drug costs, while continuing to pay 100 percent of their premiums, they become concerned," said Klein, a state senator. He said his main objection to the program is that it does not allow the federal government to negotiate drug prices to bring down costs -- a suggestion that pharmaceutical and insurance companies successfully fought.

But as the election draws closer, polls suggest that the GOP-backed program may not win as many votes for Democrats as they had thought. A Washington Post poll in April found that, among seniors, 50 percent said they approved of the drug program and 41 percent disapproved. Most respondents at that time said it would make no difference to them whether a candidate for Congress had voted for or against the drug program.

"Seniors are saving on average $1,100 a year in Florida; monthly premiums are $24," said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "At the beginning of the year, the Democrats were politically invested in the failure of the program. Now there is overwhelming approval."

In one of Shaw's campaign offices, a converted diner in Fort Lauderdale, the congressman said seniors are better off under the program . "It's like the big lie. If you tell it enough, people begin to believe it," Shaw said of the criticism. "They are trying to convince people it was a windfall for the drug companies. It's not."

Shaw credits the plan with creating the competition that led Wal-Mart and Target to decide to discount their generic prescription drugs.

Don Monroe, 79, who has volunteered for Shaw's campaign, is one of many seniors not affected by the doughnut hole because of limited need for prescription drugs. Monroe said he is eager to see Shaw win reelection and become chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee.

Shaw, who has served in Congress since 1980, has sought to shift the focus of the campaign to other issues, including national security, terrorism, Social Security and the environment. Last week, he hosted Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne in Florida for a tour of the Everglades. Shaw "is one of the leaders on environmental issues," Kempthorne said in an interview.

Klein also is not focusing on Medicare; he has raised the subject in only one television ad. His main focus is trying to tap into anger at Bush and the Iraq war in a district that sided with Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), the Democratic presidential nominee, in 2004. Shaw, Klein keeps telling voters, votes with Bush 90 percent of the time.

"The overall focus by Ron Klein is to make Clay Shaw look like a pawn of the Republican leadership," said Amy Walter, senior editor of Cook Political Report. "If it is Clay Shaw versus Ron Klein, then I think Clay Shaw can win. If it is a referendum on Washington or President Bush, then the advantage goes to Klein."

Klein trails Shaw in campaign fundraising, $2.8 million to $3.4 million, according to an August campaign-finance disclosure.

Bush and Vice President Cheney have visited to help Shaw raise money, and former president Bill Clinton is due at a fundraiser for Klein this month. Walter has classified the race as a tossup -- some polls have shown Shaw in the lead, others Klein -- but said she had seen no indication that the drug program is driving voters.

Some local commentators disagreed. The Medicare drug benefit "is still going to be a very, very, very viable election issue," said Edith Gooden-Thompson, a coordinator of Serving Health Insurance Needs of Elders.

Sitting in the Aging and Disability Resource Center of Broward County, Gooden-Thompson was surrounded by others who worked with seniors and agreed with her assessment. Nancy Ackerman said she had seen people cutting back on food so they could buy prescriptions.

Even so, though, it could be a tossup: "Clay Shaw has been very supportive to senior issues in all the years we have known him," said Edith Lederberg, the center's director, but she added that Klein had, too. "He has been a state senator for many years and is very popular. That is why it is going to be such a tough choice for people to make."

Perhaps playing in Klein's benefit: More seniors are finding themselves in the doughnut hole as the election approaches. The Institute for America's Future, a group calling for the closure of the gap, calculated that, on average, seniors who enrolled in the benefit at the beginning of the year would have fallen into the doughnut hole on Sept. 22.

On that morning, Klein was talking about the doughnut hole with seniors at a doughnut shop, Dandee Donut Factory in Pompano Beach. Jane Shaffer said she has been in the doughnut hole since March, and she and her husband Robert -- a registered Republican -- say they will back Klein.

For the first time, the Voters Coalition, which encourages voter participation, will not endorse Shaw, said Harold Ostrow, 78, former chairman of the group. "It's easy to get into the doughnut hole, but very hard to get out," Ostrow said.

The question is whether there are enough people like Ostrow, Priscak and the Shaffers to swing the vote -- and whether other issues will erode Shaw's longtime base.

Klein is hoping that by closely linking Shaw to Bush, he can overcome the incumbent late in the campaign. Shaw said that Klein's tack is misguided. "He is running against the president and not Clay Shaw," Shaw said. "I represent the 22nd Congressional District of Florida and not the Republican Party."

As Vote Nears, Schwarzenegger Surges Ahead (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Survey finds Republican governor leading Democratic challenger Angelides 50% to 33%. Most see the incumbent as a stronger leader.

Just over five weeks before election day, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a commanding lead over his Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, who has built scant support beyond a core base of liberals, according to a new Los Angeles Times poll.

If the Nov. 7 election were held today, likely voters would favor the Republican governor over Angelides 50% to 33%.

The survey found an abundance of grim signs for Angelides, including a failure to match Schwarzenegger's success in rallying voters of his own party strongly behind his candidacy. Just 61% of Democrats support Angelides, while 88% of Republicans favor Schwarzenegger. And independents, a crucial swing vote, support Schwarzenegger over Angelides 49% to 31%.

The poll also showed that Angelides suffers from one of the main problems that plagued California's last Democratic governor, Gray Davis: a lack of public confidence in his leadership skills. Asked who has stronger leadership qualities, 60% of likely voters say Schwarzenegger and 20% say Angelides. Even a plurality of Democrats sees Schwarzenegger as a stronger leader.

The poll also found a new rise in the governor's popularity, further progress in his steady recovery from the debacle of his 2005 ballot initiatives, which voters resoundingly rejected.

In a nearly complete reversal, 56% of California voters now approve of Schwarzenegger's job performance and 41% disapprove. In October 2005, 37% approved and 59% disapproved.

"He seems to have become a little bit more the governor of the people, rather than the governor of the Republicans," poll respondent Jack Phillips, a Democrat who lives in the Sacramento suburb of Folsom, said in a follow-up interview.

"Maria must've got to him," added Phillips, 67, in a nod to the Kennedy family lineage of Maria Shriver, Schwarzenegger's wife. The retired railroad marketing man plans to vote for Schwarzenegger.

Overall, the poll affirmed the dominating force of Schwarzenegger's personality on California politics, showing his capacity — in a state that strongly favors Democrats — to break a national tide running against Republicans.

It also demonstrated his outsmarting of Angelides in seeking out the political center, where statewide elections are won in California. For months, Schwarzenegger has been piling up agreements with Democratic lawmakers that widen his electoral appeal, including laws to combat global warming, raise the minimum wage and cut prescription drug costs.

Still, the election dynamics could change in the campaign's final weeks. Both candidates and their allies are spending millions on advertisements, which could shift public opinion.

The survey, supervised by Times Poll director Susan Pinkus, interviewed 1,312 registered voters, including 989 deemed likely to vote. The survey was conducted by telephone from Sept. 23 to 28. The margin of sampling error for likely voters is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Schwarzenegger's political recovery coincides with a brightening mood among California voters: 42% say things in the state are generally going in the right direction, up from a paltry 27% last October. Still, 45% say things are seriously off on the wrong track.

As for what's on their minds, likely voters name illegal immigration as the most important problem facing the state, followed by education and the economy. Republicans are most concerned about illegal immigration, while Democrats rank education as most important.

In the race for governor, relatively few likely voters have yet to make up their minds: 9% are undecided.

Eight percent favor candidates other than Schwarzenegger or Angelides.

For Angelides, the strongest support comes from liberal Democrats: 70% support him. Latinos also heavily favor Angelides over Schwarzenegger, 57% to 22%.

But as a whole, the poll illustrates a bleak landscape for Angelides. He falls short of majority support in every region of the state, even in the Bay Area, where Democrats normally run up landslide margins against Republicans.

In Los Angeles County, another Democratic stronghold although a less solid one, the race is nearly even: 41% favor Angelides, 37% Schwarzenegger.

In the rest of Southern California, Schwarzenegger trounces Angelides by a 41-point margin. In the Central Valley, the governor runs 37 points ahead. Both areas lean Republican.

The geography also looks bad for Angelides along the coastal-inland divide that has increasingly defined California elections. In counties along the coastline, which normally tilt strongly toward Democrats, Schwarzenegger is ahead 45% to 37%.

In the Republican-leaning counties of inland California, the governor leads by more than 2 to 1.

On major issues, Angelides also faces trouble. Californians usually favor Democrats on education and the environment, but the survey found likely voters split on whether Angelides or Schwarzenegger would do a better job in those areas. And by wide margins, they say Schwarzenegger would do a better job on the state budget, the economy and immigration.

The poll also found problems for Angelides on taxes, a top concern cited by those with an unfavorable impression of him.

Schwarzenegger ads have highlighted billions of dollars in tax increases that Angelides has supported over the years. Diane Smith, a retired Trinity County child-care provider, said she knew virtually nothing about Angelides apart from what she had seen in those ads, which show the Democrat walking backward.

"It looks like he's floating away," said Smith, an independent who is leaning toward Schwarzenegger.

Phillips, the Folsom Democrat supporting Schwarzenegger, called Angelides a "big-spending liberal" who would "follow in Gray Davis' footsteps — spend, spend, spend and put us into debt like there's no end to spending money."

Angelides has proposed tax increases for corporations and Californians who make more than $250,000 a year, along with tax cuts for those making less than $100,000 a year and for small businesses. A majority of Democrats and liberals say his tax agenda makes them more likely to vote for Angelides.

"We should help people who have less money and tax those that have more," said retired teacher Donna Doyka of Manhattan Beach, a Democrat who supports Angelides.

But the Angelides tax agenda is unpopular with Republicans and conservatives. And a majority of them say Schwarzenegger's promise not to raise taxes makes them more likely to back his reelection.

Another challenge for Angelides is ethics, a central line of attack against him in the Democratic primary and one that he has tried to turn back on Schwarzenegger.

On the question of which candidate has more honesty and integrity to serve as governor, 43% say Schwarzenegger and 25% say Angelides.

Also problematic for the Democrat is his lukewarm support among union members, a key constituency of his party: They support him over Schwarzenegger, but only by 43% to 37%.

More than half of union members think Schwarzenegger has stronger leadership qualities. And 52% have a favorable impression of Schwarzenegger, while 47% view Angelides in a positive light. Organized labor has been the No. 1 source of campaign money for Angelides.

The poll also underlined Schwarzenegger's edge on personality and public image. It found that 60% of likely voters hold a favorable impression of him, while 38% see Angelides in a positive light.

Also unsettling for Angelides, who was virtually unknown to most Californians before the campaign: 43% of likely voters hold an unfavorable impression of him. That negative view was inspired in part by months of television attack ads run against Angelides by Schwarzenegger and the treasurer's spring primary rival, state Controller Steve Westly.

The survey also cast new doubt on the Angelides strategy of stressing Schwarzenegger's political ties to President Bush. Among those who view the governor unfavorably — 39% of likely voters — 2% named his support for Bush's reelection as the reason.

Still, Bush remains unpopular in California: 40% of voters approve of his job performance and 58% disapprove. Though it is dismaying for an incumbent, that marks a rebound from the record low that he hit in an April Times poll, which found 31% approved and 66% disapproved.

As for the governor, the new poll found his support more solid than his challenger's: More than three quarters of those who favor Schwarzenegger say their vote is definite, but fewer than two-thirds of Angelides backers say the same.

Schwarzenegger's strongest blocs of support are men, Republicans, conservatives, whites, older voters and residents of California's inland counties.

Women are less enthusiastic: Though likely male voters favor Schwarzenegger over his rival by 57% to 30%, likely female voters prefer the governor 42% to 37%.

How the poll was conducted: The Times Poll contacted 1,868 adults in California by telephone Sept. 23 through 28. Among them were 1,312 registered voters, of whom 989 were deemed likely to vote in the Nov. 7 general election. Likely voters were determined by a screening process that included questions on intention to vote, certainty of vote, interest in the campaign and voting history. Telephone numbers were randomly selected from a list of all exchanges in the state, allowing calls to listed and unlisted numbers. Multiple attempts were made to call each number. Additional Latino voters were contacted in a separate random sample to allow more accurate analysis of their subgroup. Adults in the entire sample were weighted slightly to conform with census proportions for sex, ethnicity, age, education, region and the secretary of state's report of party registration. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points. For certain subgroups, the error margin may be somewhat higher. Poll results may also be affected by such factors as question wording and the order in which questions were presented. Interviews in the Latino supplemental sample were conducted by Interviewing Service of America in Van Nuys. Interviews were conducted in English and Spanish.Mark Hafer Los Angeles Times

California's Model For The Middle (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

SACRAMENTO -- The likely victory of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in next month's election could change the dynamics of California government and the way both national parties think about this mega-state.

It has been a long time since a Republican presidential candidate won California: not since George H.W. Bush in 1988. And it had been almost as long since any Republican won major statewide office -- until Schwarzenegger won the special election of 2003.

But the circumstances of that race were so odd -- a referendum on the unpopular incumbent, Democrat Gray Davis, and a free-for-all among dozens of would-be successors running virtually without party support -- that Schwarzenegger's victory seemed almost happenstance.

Now he is running as the Republican nominee against a single legitimate Democratic contender, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, a former party chairman. And the double-digit lead that Schwarzenegger has fashioned cannot be put down to luck.

Rather, it reflects his rapid adaptation after a serious political miscalculation. In 2005 he declared war on the Democratic legislature and the public-employee unions and forced a special election on four initiatives designed to cripple the unions' influence and strengthen his hand as governor. Voters rejected all of them and drove his approval ratings into the basement.

After that repudiation, Schwarzenegger reopened negotiations with the legislature this year, passed a heap of big bills and won the applause of an independent electorate.

To be sure, there are still skeptics who argue that the governor has no convictions and therefore is totally unreliable. In his political biography, "The People's Machine: Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Rise of Blockbuster Democracy," author Joe Mathews quotes the judgment of bodybuilder Rick Wayne, a buddy of the governor. "I've never known Arnold to be a conservative," Wayne said, "I've known Arnold to be a chameleon."

Some Democratic lobbyists in Sacramento expect a reelected Schwarzenegger to go back to bashing unions and fighting with the legislature. But his aides and intimates think that is a misreading of the man and the state. Both, they say, are firmly rooted in the center of the political spectrum.

Indeed, key Republicans here -- including some of George W. Bush's former people imported for the Schwarzenegger campaign -- think the governor's example is one that could be emulated in 2008.

Their argument is that at least three possible Republican contenders -- Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York; John McCain, the senator from Arizona; and Mitt Romney, the governor of Massachusetts -- could compete effectively for California if they made the effort.

To have a chance, they would have to abandon the Republican habit of treating California as a piggy bank -- a place to fly in, pick up a bundle of cash and fly out.

The contenders would not have to go as far as Schwarzenegger has in embracing Democratic issues. The state might respond to a candidate who combines fiscal prudence and avoiding higher taxes with a progressive attitude on the environment and such social issues as immigration and civil rights.

Because Republicans have abandoned California politics for so long, Democrats have been allowed to dominate the state. If its rich hoard of 55 electoral votes became competitive for 2008, it would be a boon to both parties. Democrats would still have a substantial advantage, with their support for abortion rights and appeal to working families and minority groups. But moderate Republicans could also compete and challenge and thereby shift the focus of the entire national election toward the political center.

All that -- and more -- is implicit in Schwarzenegger's run this year, making it potentially the most significant Republican victory in what otherwise looks like a year of Democratic gains.

Topinka Faces Many Challenges In Illinois Governor Race (SLPD)

By Adam Jadhav

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

From the beginning, the Judy Baar Topinka gubernatorial campaign expected to be outgunned financially.

Gov. Rod Blagojevich, a Democrat, has used his prolific fundraising to run TV ads almost non-stop since the March primary, save for a brief hiatus midsummer. Topinka began her television attack in September.

For every $1 she has spent, he's burned $9.

Now, with just over five weeks left until the November election, Topinka, a three-term state treasurer, and her running mate on the Republican ticket, Joe Birkett, find themselves an average 10 points behind in most polls.

In an interview with the Post-Dispatch this week, Birkett gave a candid review of the campaign, expressing plenty of optimism, but acknowledging hurdles, too.

Blagojevich "hasn't gained, but he hasn't fallen either. What he has is an unlimited source of funds," Birkett said. "This is the first time in Illinois history that anybody's been on this early, as long, and on the attack like this.

"This has been six months — unprecedented — negative campaigning (from Blagojevich). And Judy is still in the hunt which, I think, speaks volumes about her reputation and how strong her numbers are."

Meanwhile, Blagojevich's campaign staff remain cheery about their position: a double-digit lead with less than 40 days to go.

The governor himself has shied away from public campaign stops, typically appearing around the state in his official duties. Along the way, however, he continues to announce programs and plans — a vision of a second term.

"We just want to get the governor out talking about his record and his accomplishments," said Blagojevich spokeswoman Sheila Nix.

Birkett and other Republicans did say fundraising has been a hurdle. As of June 30, the last time candidates reported their finances under state law, Blagojevich led $12.2 million to $1.5 million.

"Obviously, we've got to raise more money," Birkett said matter-of-factly.

But that has led to Blagojevich's TV barrage: $8.4 million spent on ads around the state from the day after the primary until last week, according to estimates and an advertising analysis compiled for the Post-Dispatch. Topinka had paid $934,000 for advertising, and has run no ads in the St. Louis area.

Through all of it, statewide polls have consistently given Blagojevich a little below 50 percent of the vote. And he has maintained unfavorable ratings almost as high. In addition, he has faced continuing media revelations about a federal corruption probe of some of his associates and others involving state contracts and political contributions.

"Rod Blagojevich is one of the luckiest incumbents in the nation," said national pollster Scott Rasmussen. "Normally, those numbers would spell defeat."

Rassmussen attributed Blagojevich's continued lead to the media blitz, Illinois' leftward political slant and Topinka's similarly high "unfavorables."

And since the primary, Topinka's vote percentage has tracked slightly downward, at least in Rasmussen's own polling.

Though outmatched in TV advertising, Topinka and Birkett have been more active in barnstorming the state. Both have repeatedly visited the Metro East, announcing plans for jobs, education, court reform and more.

Their campaign has also waged a regular e-mail and fax war. And continually released "white papers" detailing her positions and plans if elected.

But some political scientists question whether Topinka's position is really being heard in the electorate, over Blagojevich's voluminous advertising.

"She's come out with policy positions. She's on the air a little," said Alan Gitelson, a political science professor at Loyola University in Chicago. "At the same time, Blagojevich continues to pump out his own negative advertising. This is still a race that is Blagojevich's to lose."

Though Topinka is a veteran campaigner and not one to be counted out, observers said unless news breaks in the criminal investigations of hiring and ethics that have dogged Blagojevich's administration, his lead may hold fast.

"That would completely shake up the dynamic," said John Jackson, a political scientist at Southern Illinois University Carbondale. "Otherwise, I don't see much closing that gap."

Republicans say Blagojevich's advertising will become white noise. Topinka's staff and Birkett say they will strike back more. Watch and see, Birkett added.

"Keep in mind that the voters haven't seen the full picture," Birkett said. "They've seen almost $10 million in negative campaign ads about Judy."

TV ads are likely from Topinka for the remainder of the campaign, her staff and other Republicans said. There's two planned debates, including one Monday in Decatur. And they will continue fundraising.

Specifically, the campaign is courting a visit from First Lady Laura Bush, Birkett said. Another stop by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman is possible, said state GOP executive director John Tsarpalas, along with other "celebrity politicians."

"People are now starting to pay attention now," Tsarpalas said. "She's on the air. We're already out of the gate and running."

Campaign Cash Mirrors A High Court's Rulings (NYT)

By Adam Liptak And Janet Roberts

COLUMBUS, Ohio — In the fall of 2004, Terrence O'Donnell, an affable judge with the placid good looks of a small-market news anchor, was running hard to keep his seat on the Ohio Supreme Court. He was also considering two important class-action lawsuits that had been argued many months before.

In the weeks before the election, Justice O'Donnell's campaign accepted thousands of dollars from the political action committees of three companies that were defendants in the suits. Two of the cases dealt with defective cars, and one involved a toxic substance. Weeks after winning his race, Justice O'Donnell joined majorities that handed the three companies significant victories.

Justice O'Donnell's conduct was unexceptional. In one of the cases, every justice in the 4-to-3 majority had taken money from affiliates of the companies. None of the dissenters had done so, but they had accepted contributions from lawyers for the plaintiffs.

Thirty-nine states elect judges, and 30 states are holding elections for seats on their highest courts this year. Spending in these races is skyrocketing, with some judges raising $2 million or more for a single campaign. As the amounts rise, questions about whether money is polluting the independence of the judiciary are being fiercely debated across the nation. And nowhere is the battle for judicial seats more ferocious than in Ohio.

An examination of the Ohio Supreme Court by The New York Times found that its justices routinely sat on cases after receiving campaign contributions from the parties involved or from groups that filed supporting briefs. On average, they voted in favor of contributors 70 percent of the time. Justice O'Donnell voted for his contributors 91 percent of the time, the highest rate of any justice on the court.

In the 12 years that were studied, the justices almost never disqualified themselves from hearing their contributors' cases. In the 215 cases with the most direct potential conflicts of interest, justices recused themselves just 9 times.

Even sitting justices have started to question the current system. "I never felt so much like a hooker down by the bus station in any race I've ever been in as I did in a judicial race," said Justice Paul E. Pfeifer, a Republican member of the Ohio Supreme Court. "Everyone interested in contributing has very specific interests."

"They mean to be buying a vote," Justice Pfeifer added. "Whether they succeed or not, it's hard to say."

Three recent cases, two in Illinois and one in West Virginia, have put the complaints in sharp focus. Elected justices there recently refused to disqualify themselves from hearing suits in which tens or hundreds of millions of dollars were at stake. The defendants were insurance, tobacco and coal companies whose supporters had spent millions of dollars to help elect the justices.

After a series of big-money judicial contests around the nation, the balance of power in several state high courts has tipped in recent years in favor of corporations and insurance companies.

In the 2002 Ohio judicial election, for example, two candidates won seats that year on the seven-member court after each raised more money than one of the candidates for governor that year.

Corporate Giving Increases

Judges are required by codes of judicial ethics to disqualify themselves whenever their impartiality might reasonably be questioned over financial or other conflicts. Even owning a few shares of stock in a defendant's company or seeing a relative's name on a brief generally requires automatic disqualification.

But there is an exception to this strict rule: campaign contributions. Very few judges in the states that elect the members of their highest court view contributions as a reason for disqualification when those contributors appear before them.

Many judges said contributions were so common that recusal would wreak havoc on the system. The standard in the Ohio Supreme Court, its chief justice, Thomas J. Moyer, said, is to recuse only if "sitting on the case is going to be perceived as just totally unfair."

Duane J. Adams, a plaintiff in one of the class-action suits heard by Justice O'Donnell, concerning defective cars, said he questioned the impartiality of the justices who ruled against him. Mr. Adams had sued DaimlerChrysler under the state's lemon law, and he grew angry when told that the company's political action committee had given money to justices in the majority.

"At the very least, it's a conflict of interest," Mr. Adams said. "These gentlemen, they should be prosecuted for what I consider is taking a bribe." He and the other plaintiffs did not contribute, but their lawyers gave to the campaigns of five of the justices.

Precisely what contributors want or get for their money is unclear. Some contributors say they have no agenda beyond ensuring that able and independent judges are elected. Others surely hope to influence the justices' votes in particular cases.

The middle ground, advanced by groups representing business, labor and plaintiffs' lawyers, is to support justices who hold views similar to their own. "Various interests see voting patterns," Chief Justice Moyer said. The alignment between contributions and votes, he said, is a matter of shared judicial philosophy.

If that is right, contributors are not trying to buy votes in particular cases. But they are trying to buy seats on the court.

And they are succeeding. Not long ago, the Ohio Supreme Court was controlled by liberal justices whose campaigns had been financed in large part by plaintiffs' lawyers and unions. Now that business groups are outspending their adversaries, the court has become dominated by more conservative justices. And the court's decisions are no longer markedly sympathetic to people claiming injuries.

Justice O'Donnell, a Republican, won his seat with the help of big contributions from the insurance, finance and medical industries. He is running for re-election this year, and his opponent, Judge William O'Neill, is making contributions an issue.

"We have to stop selling seats on the Ohio Supreme Court like we sell seats on the New York Stock Exchange," said Judge O'Neill, a Democrat on the 11th District Court of Appeals in Warren, in northeast Ohio. He says he will not accept contributions.

Justice O'Donnell, who has raised more than $3 million since 2000, refused to be interviewed for this article despite more than a half-dozen requests to his campaign, his chambers and the court. In a statement, he said, "Any effort to link judicial campaign contributions received by a judicial campaign committee for major media advertising to case outcomes is misleading and erodes public confidence in the judiciary."

"A judge," the statement said, "may fairly and impartially consider matters despite receipt of the campaign contribution by the campaign committee."

Interest groups play a powerful and generally accepted role in races for legislative and executive positions. But their increasing role in identifying and supporting judicial candidates is at odds with the traditional concept of what judges do.

"The role of the judge and the role of the legislator are completely different," said William K. Weisenberg, an Ohio State Bar Association official. "You want a legislator to vote the way you would vote. When you go into court, you want someone to listen to the facts and decide the case on the facts and the law. We don't want the umpire calling balls and strikes before the game has begun."

Influencing the Bench

Many judges concede that sitting on their contributors' cases creates the perception that their votes can be bought. But in public, at least, most insist the perception is wrong.

"All the surveys I've seen indicate that generally 75 percent of the people believe that contributions influence decisions," said Chief Justice Moyer, a Republican. But when asked if contributions played a role in courts' decisions, he said: "I don't believe they do. I know they don't for me."

That view is not universally held.

"It's pretty hard in big-money races not to take care of your friends," said Richard Neely, a retired chief justice of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals. "It's very hard not to dance with the one who brung you."

Indeed, according to a survey of 2,428 state court judges conducted in 2002 by Justice at Stake, a judicial reform organization, almost half said campaign contributions influenced decisions. And more than half agreed that "judges should be prohibited from presiding over and ruling in cases where one of the sides has given money to their campaign."

The Times study explored the influence of money on judicial decision-making by asking two basic questions about the Ohio Supreme Court. How often did it hear cases involving major contributors? And how did justices vote in those cases?

The study considered only cases that were both significant and difficult. It excluded procedural decisions, including whether to hear or reconsider a case. And only divided cases — those in which there was at least one dissent — were considered, because those presented the most contentious legal issues. In the 12 years ended this spring, there were about 1,500 such decisions.

The study looked at contributors who gave $1,000 or more in the six years preceding the decision, the term length for justices.

It also considered, for the most part, only the contributors most directly affected by a ruling: the parties themselves and groups that filed supporting briefs urging the court to rule a certain way.

Contributions from lawyers were excluded from the study's main findings. Lawyers are far more likely than other contributors to give to judges across the ideological spectrum, and — because their firms often handle a wide variety of cases — they generally do not have the intensely focused interest in the outcome of a particular case that their clients do. More than 200 times, moreover, justices sat on cases after receiving contributions from lawyers on both sides.

The court's decisions, the study found, were rife with potential conflicts. In more than 200 of the 1,500 cases, at least one justice cast a vote after receiving a significant campaign contribution. On scores of occasions, the justices' campaigns took contributions after a case involving the contributor was argued and before it was decided — just when conflicts are most visible and pointed.

Contributors did well with those whose campaigns they had financed. Of the 10 justices in the Times study, 6 sided with contributors more than 70 percent of the time. Justice O'Donnell, who has been on the court for only three years and has participated in fewer decisions than most of the justices studied, had the highest rate — 91 percent.

Lawyers who gave money were not nearly as successful. Five justices voted for the positions represented by these contributors half of the time, and the average rate was 55 percent. Recusals in cases involving contributors were all but unheard of.

Six of the seven sitting justices — all except Justice O'Donnell — agreed to interviews for this article, and all said contributions had not affected their decisions.

"There is a lot more to the story than the cold numbers suggest," said Justice Maureen O'Connor, a Republican who voted for her contributors 74 percent of the time. Some cases are more significant than others, she said. Similarly, she and other justices criticized the decision to omit from the study the court's terse rulings on whether to hear a case at all. Many of these decisions are routine or trivial, however, and the rulings themselves do not contain sufficient information to be readily categorized.

In his statement, Justice O'Donnell said that "selectively screening a limited number of case decisions results in a skewed outcome." He did not elaborate.

But Justice Pfeifer, who voted for his contributors 69 percent of the time, backed the study's methodology. "I quite frankly can't think of another way," he said. "You're using the only yardstick that I'd know of that you can use."

Several justices said they found Ohio's money-fueled judicial elections distasteful and troubling. They pointed out, though, that Ohio law has mechanisms to limit contributions and to insulate justices from contributors, including a ban on personal solicitations by the justices. Some said they tried to avoid learning the identities of their many contributors, though they conceded it could sometimes be unavoidable. Justice Evelyn Lundberg Stratton, for instance, said she had attended 50 fund-raisers during her last campaign.

None of the justices interviewed suggested that more frequent recusals from contributors' cases would be a positive step rather than a recipe for havoc. Last year, though, five justices did recuse themselves from a case involving a Republican fund-raiser, Thomas W. Noe. They had taken $23,510 from Mr. Noe and his wife. Appeals court judges filled in for the justices.

"It is not necessary for a judge to recuse himself just because an attorney or party has contributed to his campaign," Chief Justice Moyer said in a statement at the time. "However, this is a high-profile case with political implications and with potential personal consequences for the campaign contributor in question."

Some legal experts say that recusal should be the rule and not the exception. Indeed, in 1999, the American Bar Association revised its Model Code of Judicial Conduct to require judges to disqualify themselves if they received campaign contributions of a certain amount from a party or its lawyer. But the bar association did not name an amount, leaving it to the states should they adopt the code. No state has adopted it.

Unlike campaign contributions, direct gifts to judges, even relatively small ones, almost always require disqualification.

In 2002, for instance, the Ohio Supreme Court reprimanded a lower-court judge for accepting football tickets from Stuart Banks, a lawyer who had appeared before the judge. Yet three of the justices who issued the reprimand had accepted at least $1,000 each in contributions from Mr. Banks in the previous 10 years. Those same justices also sat on several cases in which Mr. Banks appeared before them.

Ruling on a Lemon Law

From the day he leased it in 1996, when it leaked transmission fluid all over the garage, Duane J. Adams's Dodge Caravan was nothing but trouble.

"My wife went to start it at the grocery store, and the battery blew up," Mr. Adams said. "We didn't feel safe in it."

Mr. Adams invoked Ohio's tough lemon law, which calls for a refund for defective cars. DaimlerChrysler took the car back after an arbitration found the car defective but deducted a $6,000 "mileage fee."

Mr. Adams and other Ohio car buyers filed a class-action lawsuit against three car companies that routinely imposed such mileage fees in settlements and arbitrations. Drawing on a 1996 appeals court decision that banned the fees and the fact that the Ohio Legislature had rejected such fees when it enacted the law, an appeals court allowed the case to go forward in 2003.

In the first week of November 2004, while the case was pending in the Ohio Supreme Court, the political action committee of DaimlerChrysler, a defendant, gave $1,000 each to the election campaigns of Chief Justice Moyer and Justice O'Donnell. Two months earlier, the committee of a second defendant, Ford, gave those same justices $500 apiece. From 2000, when the suit was filed, to 2004, when it was decided, the affiliates of the three companies gave $15,000 to four of the justices on the case.

Still, all four of the justices continued to sit on the case, and all of them were in the majority in the 4-to-3 decision issued on Nov. 10, 2004, just days after the last set of DaimlerChrysler contributions.

The justices ruled that the plaintiffs had voluntarily accepted settlement offers or arbitration awards with the mileage fee deducted. The ban on the fees applied only to lawsuits filed in court and not disputes resolved less formally, the majority said.

The three dissenting justices said the majority's ruling gave the plaintiffs an impossible choice: to pursue a lawsuit that could cost more than the car itself or to accept the reduced sum.

Elaine Lutz, a spokeswoman for DaimlerChrysler, defended the company's actions. "The contributions that companies' PAC's make are driven by the campaign calendar, not the judicial calendar," Ms. Lutz said. Candidates for the court may accept contributions for about a year before an election and four months afterward.

Lawyers for Ford also said it complied with Ohio law. "By definition," said one of the lawyers, John Beisner, "if you have an elective system, the judges are going to go to those with the greatest interest in the system to get their contributions."

Car company lawyers said the contributions were merely an effort to level the field against big-spending plaintiffs' firms. In the lemon-law case, though, the overall contributions were tilted heavily in favor of the companies and their own lawyers.

Mr. Adams and the other named plaintiffs gave no money to the justices. While the case proceeded, their lawyers contributed about $12,000 to five of the seven justices in the case, dividing their money roughly evenly between a justice who voted for them and several who voted against them. The law firms representing the companies gave only to the justices in the majority, for a total of more than $115,000.

That was consistent with national trends. "The current wars are epic battles between businesses and trial lawyers," said Bert Brandenburg, the executive director of Justice at Stake. "Over the past half-decade, business groups are outraising and outspending trial lawyers."

A week after the lemon-law case was decided, the court announced another ruling in favor of a business. This one halted a class action to support the medical monitoring of workers who had been exposed to beryllium, a potentially toxic substance. The vote was 5 to 2. Employees and the political action committee of the parent company of the defendant, Brush Wellman, gave a total of $5,700 to four justices, more than $2,600 of it after the case was argued and before it was decided. All four were in the majority.

Patrick Carpenter, a spokesman for Brush Wellman, said its political action committee "contributes to deserving candidates in the interest of advancing good government" and noted that the workers' lawyers had also given to the justices. The lawyers gave about $20,000 to several justices, though most voted against the workers. Mr. Carpenter also said the company had lost a 2002 decision by a 4-to-3 vote, before the court's conservative wing took over.

Michael Fincher, a 48-year-old roofer who was a plaintiff in the beryllium suit, said the contributions meant he had not received impartial justice. "I don't think it's appropriate, period," Mr. Fincher said.

Screening the Candidates

Business groups have turned picking potential justices into an art.

"They study very carefully the field of potential candidates, really studying their backgrounds and what makes them tick, and picking a person who is liable to be leaning their way," said Justice Pfeifer, who has shown an independent streak in his 14 years on the court. He did not name names.

Justice O'Donnell's campaign materials say he is "rooted in law enforcement" as the son a Cleveland police officer. They also note that he served as a law clerk and taught elementary school students and paralegals. In 20 years on lower courts before his appointment to the Supreme Court in May 2003, he created a long paper trail of conservative decisions. On the Supreme Court, he has helped consolidate its transformation from a court that routinely ruled against corporations and insurance companies to one quite friendly to business interests.

In 2004, running to complete the six-year term to which he had been appointed, Justice O'Donnell had a million-dollar advantage over his opponent that led to an Election Day rout.

Now that same opponent, Judge O'Neill, is back for a rematch. His campaign slogan: "No money from nobody."

Contributing to candidates for states' highest courts can be money well spent in at least one sense: the courts are very powerful. They have the last word on most of the issues that come before them. The United States Supreme Court has no jurisdiction over cases that present pure questions of state law, and in any event it hears only about 80 cases a year.

The states use various methods to choose their judges. The approaches are often some combination of nominating commissions, governors' and legislative action, and popular voting, including partisan contests and retention elections. Political machines still play a role in some states. In the federal system, by contrast, judges are appointed by the president, confirmed by the Senate and awarded lifelong tenure.

"Although there may be no good method of selecting and retaining judges, there is a worst method, and Ohio is among the states to have found it," Paul D. Carrington and Adam R. Long wrote in a 2002 study of the Ohio Supreme Court in the law review of Capital University here in Columbus. "That worst method is one in which judges qualify for their jobs by raising very large sums of money from lawyers, litigants and special interest groups, and retain their offices only by continuing to raise such funds." The problem, the authors found, is not a new one, but one that grows with the sums involved.

Ohio started electing judges in 1851, and the system seems unlikely to change. Voters overwhelmingly rejected a proposed return to an appointive system in 1987. In the 1980's, a campaign for a seat on the Ohio Supreme Court cost $100,000, compared with the $2 million a candidate may raise and spend these days.

Much of the recent spending came from business groups furious with what they called a liberal "Gang of Four" on the court after a pair of 1999 decisions. One of the decisions struck down a law revising the treatment of injury cases. The other interpreted employers' insurance policies broadly to cover some off-the-job injuries.

In 2000, business groups mounted a multimillion-dollar campaign to unseat Justice Alice Robie Resnick, a Democrat who wrote the first decision and joined the second. One advertisement showed a female judge switching her vote after someone dropped a bag of money on her desk.

Her opponent was Judge O'Donnell. He refused to denounce the attack advertisements, which seemed to backfire with voters. Justice Resnick won the election with 57 percent of the vote.

From that election on, "Ohio became a poster child for everything that was wrong with judicial elections," said Mr. Weisenberg, the Ohio State Bar Association official.

Money poured in, from political parties, from trial lawyers and especially from business interests. Contributions from people and entities affiliated with the finance and insurance industries totaled more than $800,000 in 2004. Doctors and the health care industry contributed more than $440,000.

The Balance of Power Shifts

Interest groups on the other side give, too, and the justices they support overwhelmingly vote their way. But Justice Pfeifer says the balance of financial power has shifted to business groups.

"I don't care how well a trial lawyer does or how big a pot a labor union has," he said, "they can't begin to match the business corporations. It's not a fair fight."

Justice Stratton, a Republican, said the recent contributions from business groups were a predictable consequence of a series of rulings "very strongly in favor of trial lawyers."

"You only have the big money coming out," she said, "when the court has swung too much to the left or to the right."

In 2002, Lt. Gov. Maureen O'Connor, a Republican, won a seat on the court, replacing a more liberal Republican justice and altering the balance. Her campaign took more than $330,000 from affiliates of insurance companies and medical groups. Not long after she joined the court, Justice O'Connor wrote the opinion that overruled the 1999 insurance decision. Only four years after the court ruled that employers' insurance policies covered many off-the-job injuries, it reversed course. "It serves no valid purpose to allow incorrect opinions to remain in the body of our law," Justice O'Connor wrote for the majority. The vote was 4 to 3.

The shift in personnel had a prompt impact on other cases, too. Since then, law firms that work mostly for plaintiffs have fared poorly in the court. A look at a sample of 14 big plaintiffs' firms showed that they won 64 percent of the cases in the study before 2003. In the next three years, after the rise of the court's conservative wing, their success rate dropped to 17 percent. Since 1995, Ohio has imposed campaign contribution limits. They are $3,000 from individuals and $5,500 from organizations for each judicial election. Primary and general elections are counted separately.

A Critic Takes On the System

But, depending on how donations from individuals and political action committees are counted, the limits do not stop some businesses from making very large aggregate contributions. Affiliates, employees, officers and directors of the Cincinnati Insurance Company, for instance, gave more than $200,000 to Ohio Supreme Court candidates from 1998 through 2004.

Joan Shevchik, a spokeswoman for the parent company of Cincinnati Insurance, Cincinnati Financial Corporation, cited the effort to overturn the 1999 decision as a reason for the contributions, but emphasized that the corporation itself gave nothing. "As insurance professionals," she said, "each of us sees up close the immediate impact that the Ohio Supreme Court has on the industry, our company and our policyholders."

There is a small printing press in the garage of Judge O'Neill. In the evenings, he and his children produce fliers for a long-shot no-money campaign for Justice O'Donnell's seat on the Ohio Supreme Court.

"We're going to do a million pieces for $4,000 from my pocket," Judge O'Neill said, explaining that he will not accept a penny in contributions. Even some of his supporters view his effort as quixotic, notwithstanding the higher ratings Judge O'Neill gets from many Ohio bar associations.

"They're out soliciting the next million dollars to beat me," he said. "The insurance industry, the manufacturers and now the doctors treat the Ohio Supreme Court as a personal piece of property."

Justice Resnick, the last Democrat on the court, is retiring this year, and her seat is also open, making an all-Republican court next year a distinct possibility.

Marc Dann, a Democratic state senator running for attorney general, said Judge O'Neill's strategy might have been driven by necessity as well as principle.

"Best case," Mr. Dann said, "maybe he goes to the plaintiff's bar and labor unions, and maybe he raises $300,000. To do a good week of TV in Ohio is $750,000."

Judge O'Neill's assertion that seats on the Supreme Court are for sale infuriates many in the legal establishment in Ohio, and in July 2004 the Disciplinary Counsel of the Ohio Supreme Court began an investigation into whether Judge O'Neill had violated judicial ethics by making similar statements in the last campaign.

Judge O'Neill laughed when asked if the investigation worried him.

"I am a Vietnam veteran, and I lost my wife 10 years ago," he said. "I raised four kids by myself. When you talk about fear, I fear big things in life. Being hauled before a disciplinary counsel does not qualify."

For the time being, a federal judge has suspended the investigation on First Amendment grounds. If the Ohio Legislature is troubled by Judge O'Neill's conduct, the federal judge, Ann Aldrich wrote, "the proper solution is to stop electing judges and make state judgeships appointed offices."

Judge O'Neill disagreed. He likes elections, he said.

"We have more authority over people's lives than anyone else in elected office," he said. "We decide who goes to jail and who gets out of jail. We decide what happens to your life savings after you die. We decide whether or not you will be permitted to finish raising your child. I can't think of any other industry that has a more profound impact on people's lives. And it is arrogant at best that some committee should make this appointment."

But Chief Justice Moyer said the flaws in Ohio's approach were the product of elections.

"In a perfect world," he said, "you would have justices being selected not based on the amount of money their campaign committees can raise from various interests, but on their character and record — and somewhat on judicial philosophy, certainly, but in a more abstract way."

The anniversaries of Sept. 11, 2001, and Hurricane Katrina were painful reminders that the United States needs to be better prepared for the unexpected. A three-part report by the Institute of Medicine released this summer underscores the need for major reordering of priorities in emergency medicine, but the portion of the report devoted to the needs of children has not received the attention it deserves.

Although children account for nearly 30 percent of all emergency department visits, only 6 percent of emergency departments are properly equipped to handle them. Reports have shown that emergency medical technicians, nurses and even doctors lack adequate pediatric training, that health-care facilities lack sufficient pediatric resources and that emergency department policies often overlook children.

As an emergency physician at Children's National Medical Center in Washington, I know firsthand that pediatric emergency departments differ immensely from adult facilities. For instance, each year overcrowded emergency rooms divert 500,000 ambulance patients to more distant facilities. Children's medical center, like many regional pediatric hospitals, does not have the option of diverting ambulances to other hospitals. In fact, we employ a "no-diversion" policy, requiring that all children transported to our emergency department be stabilized and treated.

Children are not mini-adults; their size is accompanied by fragility, fear and impatience. Caring for them is typically more labor-intensive, so we must recognize the need for health-care workers who are not only better trained but also more abundant. For instance, it may take a team of three or four to start an intravenous line in a frightened 3-year-old, as opposed to one person for an adult.

Pediatric-specific facilities must equip themselves to handle large influxes of people, including parents and caretakers, during mass-casualty emergencies. Pediatric hospitals must have a comprehensive approach to treating both children and accommodating those who come with them, because separating families may cause additional stress.

The Institute of Medicine recommends that emergency departments and emergency medical services ensure appropriate staff and equipment to treat children; that there be explicit pediatric-specific preparations in disaster planning; that research into medications and technologies for pediatrics be supported; and that funding be increased for the Emergency Medical Services for Children program, a national initiative designed to reduce child disability and death due to severe illness and injury.

The Institute of Medicine's recommendations to Congress should be considered and implemented immediately if we, as a society, want to properly address the emergency needs of children.

Bush Signs US Sanctions Bill Targeting Iran's Partners (AFP)

AFP, October 1, 2006

US President George W. Bush signed into law a new set of sanctions targeting foreign countries that continue nuclear cooperation with Iran and sell it advanced weaponry.

"I applaud Congress for demonstrating its bipartisan commitment to confronting the Iranian regime's repressive and destabilizing activities by passing the Iran Freedom Support Act," Bush said in a statement.

Mindful of the situation in Iraq, lawmakers warned that nothing in this document should be "construed as authorizing the use of force against Iran."

Although it does not name any countries, the measure is seen as a clear warning to Russia and China, two permanent members of the UN Security Council that have resisted calls for new international sanctions against Tehran in response to its refusal to halt uranium enrichment.

Russia is involved in an 800-million-dollar project to help Iran build a nuclear power plant in Bushehr and sells it modern weaponry. China has been accused of supplying the Islamic republic with advanced missile technology.

"Enactment of this legislation ensures that ILSA (the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act) will continue to impede Iran's efforts to acquire nuclear weapons," said US Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

"This act also provides important new authority for the administration to block financial transactions related to Iran's weapons of mass destruction programs and encourages the administration to use all available leverage over Russia to gain Russian support for multilateral sanctions against Iran," Frist said in a statement.

In a separate statement, Senator Norm Coleman said: "For the sake of our national security, the US must ensure that the sensitive nuclear technology that we share with partner countries does not fall into the hands of the Iranians.

"The Iranians have demonstrated that they are deceitful, obstructionist and bent on destroying Israel and all of Western civilization. We know where this path is going to lead. Aiding Iran to become a nuclear power, even inadvertently, is unacceptable," he said.

The new sanctions, passed earlier Saturday by the Senate after clearing the House of Representatives a day earlier, came as the European Union engaged Iran in delicate negotiations designed to persuade the Islamic republic to halt its enrichment work and avoid a major international showdown.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was expected to confer with EU foreign policy coordinator Javier Solana and her counterparts from Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia over the weekend to take stock of progress reached in these talks.

Following the carrot-and-stick approach adopted by Washington, the Iran Freedom Support Act states that it should be the policy of the United States "not to bring into force an agreement for cooperation with the government of any country that is assisting the nuclear program of Iran or transferring advanced conventional weapons or missiles."

The measure calls for this policy to remain in effect until Iran has suspended all enrichment-related activities and committed to verifiably and permanently refrain from such nuclear work in the future, or until the targeted country has severed ties with its Iranian partners.

Under the measure, the US government may also award grants to pro-democracy radio and television stations that broadcast into Iran.

"We have to increase our capability to mine resources and intelligence about Iran," Rice told The Wall Street Journal in an interview published Saturday. "And one of the challenges is that we haven't been in the country for 26 years."

The White House said in a separate statement that Bush signed into law House bill 6198 "Iran Freedom Support Act."

President Signs Iran Sanctions Bill (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

President Bush on Saturday signed legislation that would impose mandatory sanctions on entities that provide goods or services for Iran's weapons programs.

The Senate passed the bill with no debate Saturday, two days after the House approved the measure following a debate over the wisdom of toughening unilateral sanctions on Tehran at the same time the United States was trying to work with its U.N. partners on a multinational approach to Iran's nuclear threat.

The measure sanctions any entity that contributes to Iran's ability to acquire chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

In a statement, Bush said, "This legislation will codify U.S. sanctions on Iran while providing my administration with flexibility to tailor those sanctions in appropriate circumstances and impose sanctions upon entities that aid the Iranian regime's development of nuclear weapons."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said in a statement that the action "strengthened one of our most important tools in the fight to keep nuclear weapons out of the mullahs' hands."

He said it would encourage the administration to use all available leverage over Russia, a partner in Iranian energy projects, to gain Russian support for multilateral sanctions against Iran.

Bush also signed legislation Saturday extending and amending higher education programs. One part of that bill would authorize cancellation of student loan indebetedness for certain people affected by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Iran Leader Rejects Even Brief Halt In Its Uranium Enrichment Efforts (NYT)

By Agence France-presse

TEHRAN, Sept. 30 (Agence France-Presse) — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Saturday that Iran would not halt uranium enrichment even for a short period.

"They want us to suspend for a short period, and then they will use this for propaganda and say Iran has suspended and it has caved in," Mr. Ahmadinejad said in a speech to students on the first day of the new university term, according to the student news agency ISNA.

"Nobody has the right to make Iran back down over its rights," he said. "With rationality and with logic, we will defend the rights of Iran."

The comments come just two days after talks between Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, ended in Berlin without agreement. European diplomats have said that Mr. Larijani offered a two-month suspension in talks recently. Some diplomats say there may be division within Iran's leadership over whether to allow a suspension.

European diplomats still hope Iran will agree to some kind of suspension under a deal offered by the five permanent United Nations Security Council members plus Germany that offers Tehran a package of diplomatic and economic incentives.

The United States, which has refused to hold direct talks with Iran unless it suspends uranium enrichment, has been pushing for more international pressure to halt Tehran's nuclear program over concerns that it is meant not to produce electricity, as Iran contends, but nuclear arms.

"They have been putting pressure on us to suspend enrichment," Mr. Ahmadinejad said Saturday. "At first they asked us to suspend for six months, then they asked us to suspend for three months, then for one month. We said no.

"Now they have proposed that we suspend for a short period, for one day, but we asked them, 'Why do you want us to suspend?'

"They said suspend for a few days and explain that you have technical problems. But we have no technical problems! Why should we lie to the people?"

White House Divided Over Iran (NSDY)

By Timothy M. Phelps

Long Island Newsday, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Just as it was four years ago in the run-up to the war with Iraq, the Bush administration is said to be bitterly divided over how hard a line to take against Iran and whether a last-resort military option -- massive bombing of Iran's nuclear facilities -- is advisable.

The lineup, according to sources with good contacts inside the administration, is almost exactly what it was before, with the vice president and secretary of defense pushing for a tougher approach, and the secretary of state holding out for patient diplomacy.

The difference is that so far Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is prevailing, while Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and their conservative allies in the capital have been left sputtering. Rice, unlike her predecessor, Colin Powell, is extremely close to the president, even spending weekends with him and his wife at Camp David.

"Obviously Cheney and Rumsfeld have decided to go ahead and bomb the hell out of them, and everything else is an excuse to do that," said Jean-Francois Seznik, an expert on the Iranian economy who teaches at Columbia University. "And State wants to negotiate. The Iranians have caught on to the idea that the U.S. is very divided."

The United States has patiently gone along with its European allies on repeated postponements of deadlines set for Iran to agree to suspend uranium enrichment or else face a United Nations Security Council vote on economic sanctions. It has softened its Iran policy in other ways, including the recent announcement by President George W. Bush that the United States does not oppose the development by Iran of reactors to produce civilian nuclear power. And it has agreed to talk with Iran if that country verifiably suspends nuclear enrichment -- anathema to neoconservatives who not only want to stop Iran from getting nukes, but also to topple its government.

There also are reports that the Iraq Study Group set up is considering calling for a U.S. rapprochement with Iraqi neighbors Syria and Iran as a means of improving the situation in Iraq.

A number of conservative regional experts and columnists who are normally highly supportive of the Bush administration have been left very angry.

"No one in the international community and very few inside the State Department believe that it is important that we succeed in using diplomacy and economic means to try and contain Iran," said Danielle Pletka of the conservative American Enterprise Institute, which has been the Bush administration's favorite Washington think tank. "At least until now the Bush administration seems to think it's OK to just talk about it."

White House spokesman Tony Snow categorically denied there is a rift, saying it "sounds like one of those State Department leaks" and was "thoroughly baseless." He said, "This stuff is not done in a vacuum. Condi Rice is not a free agent."

But just because diplomacy is winning now does not mean it will prevail, most commentators believe, especially because it seems unlikely Russia and China would vote for high-impact economic sanctions right now that might force Iran to change.

The Pentagon appears to be gearing up for the possibility of a conflict.

Time magazine reported two weeks ago that extra ships were being sent to the Persian Gulf to block Iranian ports if necessary. And this year Rumsfeld created a Pentagon office to advise him on Iran, as he did for Iraq. The Iran Directorate bears some of the hallmarks of the old Office of Special Plans, which critics say funneled bogus intelligence from now-discredited Iraqi exiles directly to the White House.

Created in March, the directorate also represents the Pentagon at U.S. governmentwide meetings on Iran, said Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman. He called any comparison between the offices "absolutely untrue" but confirmed that two people from the special-plans office now work in the directorate.

Bush continues to state that Iran will not be allowed a nuclear weapon. "It is time for Iran to make a choice," he said on Aug. 31. "We've made our choice: We will continue to work closely with our allies to find a diplomatic solution -- but there must be consequences for Iran's defiance, and we must not allow Iran to develop a nuclear weapon."

Pletka believes the State Department's soft approach will lead to war. "One outcome we don't want is to have no options available to contain Iran other than military," Pletka said. "That's where I think we're headed."

While the military option is "very unattractive," Pletka said, "if I had to choose between the measured military might of the U.S. and an armed [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad regime, I think the choice is fairly obvious."

U.S. intelligence has estimated that Iran is five to 10 years from having a nuclear bomb, but House Republicans have charged that the intelligence community is being too cautious after its mistakes in Iraq.

Unlike the Iraq debate, there is little doubt in the intelligence community -- or, regional experts say, in the Middle East -- that Iran is working toward a nuclear weapon capability in order to dissuade the United States, Israel or Iraq from attacking it.

Some think the top leadership in Iran -- Ahmadinejad is outranked by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei -- eventually will make a deal with the United States.

But Kenneth Katzman, a respected congressional Middle East analyst, said that while the administration appears to want to avoid a military strike, Bush probably will be faced with a stark choice before he leaves office in 2009: "I would say he ultimately is going to be faced with a choice whether to take some dramatic action or acquiesce to Iran on the road to becoming a nuclear state on his watch."

Why Not Talk? (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

After a summer of protracted and mostly pointless bombing, the talking season is upon us. Unable or unwilling to halt Qassam rocket attacks on Israel and starved for funds, Hamas has begun discussing a national unity government with its rival Mahmoud Abbas. Tony Blair is rather bravely using his last months in office trying to get Abbas to sit down with the Israelis, who themselves have little to show for their campaign against Hezbollah. Iran, which spent the summer ignoring barely veiled bombing threats, seems poised to discuss its nuclear program with a coalition that includes China, Russia, Britain, France and Germany.

Conspicuously absent from any of these negotiations is the United States. We approve of all of them, and our diplomats are doubtless in the loop. But officially speaking, silence is our policy. We do not speak with Hamas because of its terrorist activities and unwillingness to recognize Israel's right to exist. In the case of Iran, the trouble stretches all the way back to the 1979-81 hostage crisis, during which we refused to recognize the Islamic Republic. In the latest cycle of tensions over Iran's nuclear progress, the U.S. refuses to join any talks unless Iran first suspends uranium enrichment — which was also the position of our partners until they announced they would be willing to start talking anyway. President Bush put his position bluntly last month: "I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program. I meant what I said."

What's the point of not talking, especially when others are talking for us? If politics is the art of compromise, then surely conversation is one of its methods. Of course, some enemies — a Hitler or a Pol Pot — may be so repugnant that the mere prospect of reaching a compromise with them would violate our deepest moral principles. The only time it would be right to hear them out is when they are proposing to surrender. There are radical jihadists who see us in similar terms: they find us repellent and see little point in speaking unless it is to warn us of our downfall if we don't submit to their demands. Given their principled unwillingness to compromise, there is little point in talking with them.

And yet even intractable interlocutors may be worth engaging. Perhaps the conversation serves as a strategy of subterfuge and delay, maintaining a holding pattern or cease-fire until the time is ripe to restart hostilities. Talking can also reveal information about an adversary's leaders — their preconceptions, their blind spots, their fixed beliefs.

Ultimately, however, the most fruitful negotiations are based on a different premise: under certain conditions, the motives that drive people and regimes can be changed. Properly carried out, diplomacy creates new incentives that alter countries' underlying interests — and thus their behavior. Over 50 years, a slow and painstakingly negotiated process of economic integration has taught Western Europe's traditional enemies to look upon one another as allies, then friends and now almost as parts of one big country. If there is ever to be a meaningful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, it will involve something similar: putting both peoples in a position to gain more the closer they come together.

When we put our trust in diplomacy, it is not because it is an inspiring or uplifting discourse or because it helps us see the common humanity in others. The stylized circumlocutions of diplomats can make them seem ridiculous or irrelevant: they never seem to be talking about what is really going on. Moreover, talk between enemies may remind both parties of the depth of their mutual enmities and of all the reasons why they were tempted to use force against one another in the first place.

Nevertheless, diplomacy is essential as long as the use of direct force has limits. After 9/11, most Americans were in no mood to talk with our enemies in the Middle East, whatever those enemies' ideology, and the Bush administration's policies of invasion and pre-emption reflected that sentiment. Now, having relearned the lesson of our limitations, we find ourselves edging back to the table.

Our refusal to speak with Hamas since its election victory has had real costs. It has suggested to many that our commitment to Middle Eastern democracy is partial at best, and it may have enabled violence by implying that the United States doesn't care all that much about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Still, our policy may pay dividends in helping to establish a new Palestinian government, and we should continue to shun Hamas to make sure that such a result occurs. If the new government agrees to abide by previous Palestinian commitments to Israel, however, we should get back to the table quickly.

In the case of Iran, the problem is that we are at once desperate for its help in quieting the chaos of Iraq and determined to stop it from developing a nuclear weapon. We have been willing to speak with Iran's leaders about Iraq but not about the weapons — a distinction that Iran regards as arbitrary and has thus far yielded few gains in either realm. We would do better to sit down with Iran now, recalling that by the time we began negotiating with North Korea, its nuclear progress had become all but a fait accompli.

In short, we need a breakthrough, one that will help either the Israeli-Palestinian track, the Iraq situation or both. To get that, we will need the much-maligned diplomats. It could be a British prime minister on his way out, able to accomplish what Bill Clinton in his last days could not. It could be the first Muslim secretary general of the United Nations — Prince Zeid al-Hussein of Jordan is a leading candidate — who breaks the impasse. Or it could be the usual suspects, just muddling through and lowering the temperature. In an ideological age, diplomacy may seem weak and prosaic. But sometimes it is all we have.

The World Is J-Curved (WP)

By Ian Bremmer

U.S. officials threatening to isolate Iran from the international community may want to take their cue from the Iranian leadership, which is doing a fine job of purging the Islamic Republic of foreign influences all on its own. Last December, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad banned Western music from state-run television and radio. And in mid-May, his government announced plans to increase the number of stations capable of blocking foreign satellite broadcasts from 50 to 300 within two years. Just as its government was making the airwaves safe for theocracy, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice again threatened Iran with "isolation from the international community."

Similarly, the Bush administration insists that if Kim Jong Il's government would dismantle its nuclear program, the U.S. government would support North Korea's integration into the family of nations. If it refuses, Washington will "further deepen North Korea's isolation," Rice said.

What the United States seems not to recognize is that the world's most repressive regimes depend on isolation to survive; they are stable precisely because they are closed. Kim knows he must hide North Korea from the outside world, and the outside world from North Koreans. If half the people of North Korea watched 30 minutes of CNN (or al-Jazeera, for that matter) and fully understood the damage wrought by their government's catastrophic policies and brutality -- or the contrasting standards of living in Japan and South Korea -- Kim's regime might not survive. Threatening that regime with isolation is like threatening a drowning man with a lifeboat.

So, what is the best way to transform a stable but closed state into a stable and open one? Historically, such transformations have required countries to go through a dangerous period of turmoil. Some states, such as South Africa, survive the transition. Others, such as the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, do not.

In the Middle East, the Bush administration is seeking to spread democracy and free markets -- in essence, to transform closed states into open ones. But imposing such a transformation from the outside is likely to exacerbate the transitional turmoil, as U.S. troops in Iraq are discovering every day. It's easy to push a closed state into instability; it's much tougher to help its citizens build a new political stability based on openness.

Imagine a graph that charts a country's stability on the vertical axis and its openness (both within the country and to the world) on the horizontal one. If each nation appears as a point on the graph, the resulting pattern looks very much like the letter J. Nations higher on the graph are more stable; those lower are less stable. Nations to the right of the dip in the J are more open; those to the left are less open. This simple J curve captures many of the dilemmas inherent in global politics today.

A state's stability depends on its capacity to withstand shocks and avoid producing them. For instance, when the July presidential election in Mexico resulted in a close vote, recount demands and massive protests in Mexico City, local and foreign investors largely shrugged off the controversy. Why? Over the past several years, the country's political, financial and legal institutions have gained greater public confidence. The government is more competent, and the middle class is growing. Mexico experienced a political shock, but the election revealed the country's underlying political stability.

A country's openness, meanwhile, is the extent to which the state allows people, ideas, information and goods to flow freely across and within its borders. Are foreign books translated into the local language? Can citizens tap independent local, national and international media? Can they travel outside the country? Is foreign investment permitted? Can citizens communicate and conduct business freely?

Open and stable countries on the right side of the J curve have a collective interest in opening up the closed states on the left side. But the most powerful agents for change in any society are the people living in it. Democratizing North Korea from the outside is not a realistic short-term goal. Instead, the gradual infiltration into North Korea of communications technology -- such as cellphones, the Internet, satellite dishes and text-messaging equipment -- is more likely to undermine authoritarian rule from within over time. Consider the recent official reaction in North Korea when discarded VCRs and contraband tapes of South Korean soap operas made it across the border from China. The tapes reportedly became so popular that state-run television warned citizens not to imitate South Korean slang or hairstyles.

Unfortunately, U.S. policy too often helps authoritarian governments isolate their people. The French firm Alcatel recently upgraded Iran's telecom network and provided the country with its first high-speed DSL Internet connections. But when the company began merger talks with the U.S. firm Lucent, some lawmakers here criticized Alcatel's ties with Iran. Wiring the country allowed Iranians to better communicate with one another and the outside world. Instead of condemning the effort, Washington should find ways to imitate it.

Even limited trade ties between open and closed states improve communication between people within and across national boundaries. By inviting countries such as Iran, Russia and Saudi Arabia to join the World Trade Organization, open states can help reinforce the growth of middle classes and create rising expectations for further opening. It won't happen overnight; Cuba and Burma are already WTO members. But it's a first step in a long-term effort.

In the short term, however, it can also be a tremendously destabilizing effort. For a closed stable country to become an open stable one, it must pass through the dip in the J curve -- a transition of greater openness combined with dangerous instability. Is the world ready for open national elections in Pakistan, for example? In Egypt? If fair elections took place next month in China, would the country become more stable or less so?

The dip in the J curve is a frightening place. Sectarian violence and insurgent attacks kill hundreds of Iraqis each week. In such an environment, it is natural for the public to demand a quick return to stability, even if it means sacrificing openness. (Russia, for instance, responded to the chaos of the Boris Yeltsin years by embracing Vladimir Putin -- essentially voting its way back up the left side of the J curve, toward a more stable but authoritarian state.)

Moving right along the J curve is harder; it requires plenty of time and political capital, and neither is abundant in Iraq. Success will require years of troop support and financial assistance. The Bush administration has done little to prepare the American people or the international community for such commitments. And the Iraqi people may not have enough faith in their new government to make the sacrifices necessary to ensure its success. If violence intensifies further, Iraq could eventually generate a new authoritarian regime or collapse into chaos as locals increasingly rely on sectarian militias to defend their interests.

With such turmoil in mind, it's easy to see why the leaders of left-side states will do their best to resist any incremental opening or transition. Kim has no interest in allowing the Peace Corps to move freely around the North Korean countryside letting people know what life is like on the outside. Iran's clerics point their restive youth away from the temptations of Western culture and instead emphasize Western attempts to deny Iran its nuclear program.

Indeed, many authoritarian leaders know that if they provoke the United States, Washington will isolate their countries and thus strengthen their authority. Some of these provocations may seem a little crazy. (See Ahmadinejad on the Holocaust or Kim on, well, any number of things.) But when Venezuela's Hugo ChÃ¡vez and Burma's ruling military junta warn of a U.S. invasion, they are not out of touch with reality; they're merely stealing ideas from the playbook that has helped keep Cuban President Fidel Castro in power for 47 years.

In Iran, standing up to the United States is a winning issue. Indeed, many in Iran's government probably would welcome international sanctions as a useful tool with which to unify Iranians behind the regime, deprive domestic rivals of public support, and rewrite laws to ensure that would-be reformers cannot regain a foothold in government.

By contrast, China's experience with stability and openness is not as clear. The country's openness to trade, foreign investment and advanced communications seems to place it on the right side of the J curve. But in reality, its police-state politics consign it to the left side. In essence, Chinese leaders hope to beat the J curve -- they're gambling that by generating greater prosperity for China's people, they can bring the country into the international community without unleashing the turmoil that flows from opening up an authoritarian state.

Can the Chinese Communist Party survive China's dip in the J curve? Perhaps 11 percent growth will fend off public anger with the country's authoritarian system. Maybe it won't. About 50,000 Chinese police are now charged with monitoring the Internet, but each day, 100,000 Chinese log on for the very first time. And the dangers of a sudden economic slowdown -- which can emerge from a sustained oil price spike or from the imposition of severe travel restrictions following an avian flu outbreak -- could quickly derail China's longer-term political stability. The country could be closer to dangerous instability than many realize.

In one way or another, all states -- even open, stable ones -- are constantly moving along the J curve. Some states swing widely; others shift imperceptibly over time. However, history suggests that all closed states eventually wither or explode; their walls merely hide their potential instability from the world. Only an openness that links citizens within and across nations can help states build stability and social and economic dynamism. Only the free exchange of information, values and people can build global stability that enriches all who take part in it.

Troop Pullout From Lebanon Complete (WT/AP)

By Matti Friedman, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

MOSHAV ZARIT, Israel -- Israeli military officials said the army withdrew the last of its troops from Lebanon early today, fulfilling a key condition of the cease-fire that ended a monthlong war with Hezbollah guerrillas.

The pullout ended a nearly three-month troop presence and cleared the way for the full deployment of an international peacekeeping force that will police the border.

Israeli military officials said the last soldiers returned to Israel around 2:30 a.m., ahead of the onset of Yom Kippur, the holiest day on the Jewish calendar, which begins at sundown. The officials spoke on the condition of anonymity under military guidelines.

Israel had gradually reduced its troop presence since the Aug. 14 cease-fire from a peak of 30,000 during the fighting to several hundred in recent days. The final pullout was swift, taking just several hours to complete.

Under the cover of darkness, the roar of Israeli tanks and armored vehicles could be heard moving across the Lebanese side of the border during the operation.

An armored column creaked across the border at the Israeli border community of Moshav Avivim, leaving tank tread marks in the soil and sending a large cloud of dust into the air that was visible in the vehicles' headlights. Later, the last group of soldiers was seen boarding a bus at nearby Moshav Zarit.

During the withdrawal, the military censor imposed a blackout on all details of the troop movements, citing security concerns. The army set up roadblocks to block reporters from reaching the border.

Israel sent the troops into Lebanon shortly after Hezbollah guerrillas abducted two soldiers and killed three others in a July 12 cross-border raid. More than 150 Israelis and 850 Lebanese were killed in 34 days of fighting.

Israeli officials had been reluctant to withdraw the last of the troops. They cited disagreements over the deployment of Lebanese and U.N. forces in southern Lebanon, which has long been a stronghold of the Shi'ite Muslim Hezbollah guerrillas. Israel is concerned about the force's ability to prevent Hezbollah, which launched 4,000 rockets into Israel during the fighting, from rearming.

The last troops had been scattered at four locations along the border, including Maroun el-Rass, where heavy fighting raged in July and August.

The U.N. peacekeepers deployed in southern Lebanon were expected to send patrols today to verify the Israeli withdrawal.

DOJ_NMG_0072398

As in previous Israeli withdrawals since the cease-fire, U.N. peacekeepers would send patrols to the vacated areas after being informed by the Israelis to verify and in turn inform the Lebanese government.

The U.N. resolution calls for 15,000 peacekeepers to work with an equal number of Lebanese soldiers to prevent another outbreak of fighting.

Ruined Towns Look To Beirut, Mostly In Vain (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 30 — A ride through the south of Lebanon, across rutted and bombed-out roads, past a landscape of twisted metal and crumbled concrete, reveals little progress toward rebuilding tens of thousands of homes devastated by the 34 days of Israeli bombing that ended more than six weeks ago.

Money has begun flowing in, from foreign governments and nongovernmental organizations. But nearly $900 million in international pledges remains untapped by the Lebanese government, whose presence is barely visible in the south. In contrast, Hezbollah, with money from Iran, continues to give cash payments to individual Lebanese for damaged homes. And the central government has allowed, and indeed encouraged, some foreign countries to begin giving similar grants.

Those villages lucky enough to have been adopted by foreign donors are preparing to rebuild. In those less fortunate, villagers sit staring into ruins, and waiting.

"There is nothing from the government, not even a phone call," said Muhammad Azzam, mayor of Siddiqin, a small village that has reported 449 homes destroyed by Israel's military. Such comments are repeated, nearly verbatim, across the south, although an arm of the Lebanese government has cleared rubble from many towns.

The government defends its performance, saying that it has gotten vital services such as water and electricity back, opened roads and kept the economy functioning. It says that it is nearly done putting in place the trustworthy financial system needed to tap into the international pledges, one that will provide a level of accountability and transparency unprecedented for Lebanon.

"It has only been one month, and a lot has been accomplished," said the country's finance minister, Jihad B. Azour. "But people only see what wasn't done."

However, when it comes to homes, the government has been slow to respond. Government officials said they would pay $40,000 cash for each destroyed house, but they have not been able to say when. And winter is approaching.

The United Nations resolution that ended the war was designed in part to give Lebanon's central government its first chance since Israel withdrew in 2000 to extend its authority over the southern part of the country. The peace deal required the government to dispatch the internationally bolstered Lebanese Army there to push out Hezbollah, long the de facto authority in the area. The agreement also offered the central government a chance to sweep in and begin to rebuild, which could have helped it win the peace among a population that it had long ignored.

But while the army is there, it has yet to really engage the international force, not yet allowing it to set up checkpoints or conduct searches. The central government has made no better showing at winning over the people of the south with help.

"It is not good enough to send the army," said Timur Goksel, a former longtime United Nations spokesman in Lebanon who teaches public administration at the American University in Beirut. "Someone has to fix the roads in the south. Someone has to get the hospitals going. Where is the state?"

The central government's stumbles started early. Even before the conflict between Israel and Hezbollah ended, it was encouraged to create financial mechanisms to guarantee that international aid would not be squandered; they remain incomplete. Foreign donors who pledged millions at a conference in Stockholm last month have proved so skittish that, instead of funds, they have sent delegations to Beirut to work out exactly how their money will be spent, according to people in the government and others affiliated with nongovernmental agencies and a gulf-area donor country.

Officials in Beirut, determined to get projects moving, have simply encouraged donors to bypass the central government. "We are trying to make ourselves flexible," said Dr. Azour, the finance minister.

So far, foreign countries have agreed to adopt 99 out of 251 damaged villages, and will likely spend about $640 million on the work, officials said. The United States has agreed to spend $20 million to help repair the Mudarrij Bridge in partnership with the Italians, for example. In total, the United States has pledged $230 million in humanitarian assistance and what are known as early recovery systems.

Lebanon's people largely rallied together after Hezbollah's capture of two Israeli soldiers on July 12 prompted Israel to rain bombs on their country, shattering bridges, airports, homes, roads and businesses. But Lebanese unity is as fleeting as the raw emotions aroused by crisis.

Now the scars of this war have exposed, and in some cases deepened, many of the nation's fault lines. Some Christian villagers in the Shuf Mountains, for example, ask why Shiites in the south will receive compensation for lost homes after just a month, when many of those Christian villagers have received nothing for homes they lost during the civil war of the 1980's, officials said.

The animosity has only grown between Hezbollah and the coalition that controls the government — named for March 14, the day in 2005 that huge numbers of people demonstrated to call for an end to Syria's military presence. Their verbal sparring has raised fears of possible civil conflict, in a country miserably familiar with such fighting, and has distracted attention from rebuilding, officials said.

"We have a responsibility to stop political bickering and work on not turning Lebanon into a battleground for external conflicts, and at the same time build a strong, democratic and capable country," Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said in a televised speech on Friday night. "Our country needs reconstruction of the people's houses, their lives, their businesses, their sources of income, reconstruction of infrastructure, reconstruction of economy, rebuilding our future potentials."

That point is not in dispute; the debates are over how to get there. And so the March 14th side accuses the Hezbollah side of carrying water for Syria and Iran. The Hezbollah side accuses the March 14th side of doing the United States' bidding.

Terms like flattened, crumbled and collapsed barely describe what happened to Aita al Shaab, a Hezbollah stronghold in the south, and neighboring villages. The landscape is a canvas of destruction, 750 homes destroyed, 400 damaged. Communities have been uprooted, families forced to crowd in with relatives, schools shattered. Many residents worried that reconstruction would be uneven, with little planning, and villages forced to take what they can get.

Animosity toward Beirut has hardened.

"The government prefers to get the money directly so they can decide how much money to take for themselves and how much to give to us," said Afif Bassi, who heads a newly formed local reconstruction committee in the shattered village of Bint Jbail, another Hezbollah stronghold a few miles north of the border, which had some of the most bitter fighting when Israel sent in ground forces. "We drafted a plan for reconstruction that includes electric, roads, water, gardens, sidewalks."

Fadhl Chalak, the former president of Lebanon's Council for Development and Reconstruction (which is what war had already turned the Ministry of Planning into, back in 1977), charges that the government has intentionally stalled the reconstruction effort. Mr. Chalak, who was instrumental in completing the reconstruction of Beirut after the civil war, says he believes that the government calculated that Shiites in the south would turn against Hezbollah if reconstruction dragged on — a charge the government dismisses as unworthy of response.

He quit the development council, he said, after Arab countries pledged hundreds of millions of dollars in aid before the war ended and the government was slow to accept it — which the government also denies.

"By delaying funding, they think they can turn Shias against their leaders," Mr. Chalak said.

The minister of finance said Mr. Chalak quit because he had a personal conflict with the prime minister.

The government has guaranteed that every village will be rebuilt, but the current patchwork of aid has raised concerns about the fate of villages that are not adopted. And if there are few, if any, signs of confidence in the central government, there is growing anxiety about the willingness to turn planning and decision making for individual villages over to foreign governments.

Qatar's offer of up to $100 million to help rebuild Bint Jbail — where village officials say 700 homes were destroyed, 300 heavily damaged and 1,500 moderately damaged — was based on a plan to distribute money to individual homeowners. The village officials said they were pressing Qatar to adjust the plan.

"What we are asking for from the Qataris is to rebuild the whole village themselves in a modern way which also preserves its historical aspect," said the mayor, Ali Bazzi. "But they are insisting on paying the people directly. This would be a disaster to the city and to the country too because people will take the $40,000 or $50,000 and leave the country."

Qatari officials said they have no interest in overseeing the reconstruction itself; they are already overseeing the restoration of 11 damaged schools. In Bint Jbail, they intend to give grants in three stages, with residents having to meet deadlines and show progress to receive each succeeding payment.

"If they do take the first payment and leave, then there is really nothing that we can do, can we?" said Khaled al-Hitmi, an engineer working with the Qatar delegation.

The mayor of Siddiqin, Mr. Azzam, was in a more frustrating position. He said that many people in his village were not supporters of Hezbollah, and so did not receive any of its beneficence. Nor had he received any contact from the government, he said.

But he had met with a delegation from Syria, which promised to rebuild. He said he had not heard back from the Syrians, and so was unsure if they would follow through, or if he would have to wait for the government to get around to his village. Pessimism has taken hold.

"We do not believe people will be compensated," he said, flatly. "We do not believe their houses will be rebuilt."

Hope Fades For Fatah, Hamas Deal (BOS)

Frustration rising for Palestinians

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has spent the past two weeks struggling to reach a power-sharing deal with the Hamas government -- a government that hasn't paid salaries in six months and that hobbles along with thousands of workers on strike and four Cabinet members in Israeli jails.

In the places where the Palestinian Authority tries to do its work, many dejected officials say it is absurd to expect such a deal against the current backdrop of chaos.

Ministry offices stand half- deserted in the West Bank city of Ramallah. In the Gaza Strip, rival security officials from Hamas and Abbas's Fatah party accuse each other's followers of murder. And the newest ``martyr'' commemorated on posters plastered across West Bank villages is a young man who was killed not by Israeli soldiers but by Palestinian police officers who opened fire last month on stone-throwing demonstrators after short tempers flared into a riot over a stolen motorcycle.

With the daily work of government hamstrung by political infighting and financial crisis, neither the Hamas government nor the president's Fatah movement is in a position to make a bold compromise or sell one to its people, officials from both sides said in interviews last week.

The disarray in the West Bank and Gaza and the political stalemate suggests there's little hope any time soon for advancing the Middle East peace process or for ending Palestinians' crippling economic isolation. When the Hamas-led government took office in March, Israel began withholding more than $50 million in monthly tax revenues it collects for the Palestinians, and the international community cut off aid.

Hamas refuses to meet the conditions set by Israel, the United States, Russia, the European Union, and the United Nations to lift the aid boycott: recognize Israel, renounce violence, and honor previous peace agreements. Abbas is trying to persuade Hamas to give up some of its Cabinet seats and join his faction and others in a unity government that would accept the conditions.

But as Palestinians' quality of life falls dramatically and both Fatah and Hamas lose credibility, the two parties seem more viscerally opposed than ever. Fatah officials say openly that they believe Hamas will never compromise and that Abbas's current strategy is to incite street protests to bring down the government.

``How can we deal with these people?'' said Ahmed Abd al- Rahman, a media adviser to Abbas, complaining that Hamas at first agreed to a unity government, then pulled back. He called Hamas leaders ``so-called politicians,'' ``amateurs,'' and, referring to their goal of establishing an Islamic state, ``ideological people with beards.''

Sameer Abu Aisheh, minister of planning in the Hamas-led government, said pushing Hamas into a corner would only harden its stance. ``We submit to no one but God.''

The stalemate is taking its toll on Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0072401

Since March, according to Palestinian Authority statistics, the gross national product has fallen 49 percent and imports are down 41 percent. Robbery and theft have risen 40 percent.

``How long will the security chaos last?'' says the poster that commemorates Ehab Al-Qinneh, 22, killed Sept. 3 when police fired on a crowd that stormed the police station in Bir Zeit, a village outside Ramallah, after officers confiscated a stolen motorbike.

Qais Abdelkarim, head of a small opposition bloc in the Palestinian parliament that printed the posters, said the feud between Hamas and Fatah is adding to a ``spreading anarchy.'' Rival Hamas and Fatah militias have undermined the already shaky public respect for law enforcement and left security forces ``in a state of chaos,'' he said. ``There is no political will to deal with this.''

At a time when delicate negotiations were said to be underway on the unity government, Hamas and Fatah officials in Gaza last week blamed one another's allies for the assassination of a top intelligence official.

In this atmosphere of chaos, Abbas aims to do the near-impossible: win a compromise on gut-level issues that divide Hamas and Fatah. But that means gaining concessions from a Hamas government that considers itself unfairly under siege.

Abu Aisheh presided Wednesday over a near-empty Ministry of Finance building. He said 70 percent of his employees are on strike. Originally named planning minister, he was forced to take a second job when Israel arrested the finance minister, along with more than two dozen other Hamas officials, after Hamas militants kidnapped an Israeli soldier in June.

Abu Aisheh, a university professor with a doctorate in transportation planning from Pennsylvania State University, took office in March with dreams of introducing American-style efficiency to notoriously disorganized ministries. Instead, he's watched the work of his two ministries grind almost to a halt.

One of his jobs is tracking the Palestinian Authority's six-month arrears in operating expenses -- $120 million in rent, utilities, and other bills.

But Hamas won't bend under duress, said Abu Aisheh, an independent who supports Hamas's Islamist agenda.

The central issue is recognition of Israel. This year, Hamas and Fatah agreed on a common goal of a Palestinian state on the lands that Israel occupied in 1967. Fatah says that wording is an implicit recognition of Israel. Hamas says it is not.

Abu Aisheh says the words speak for themselves, and that going further would be humiliating.

``Let's be realistic. Having a state within the 1967 borders, that means there is another state in the rest of historical Palestine,'' he said. ``But in our tradition, in our belief, in our society, we do not submit to those who say'' -- he snapped his fingers three times -- ``One, two, three, do this.''

That kind of talk infuriates Rahman, Abbas's adviser, who spent decades in exile with Yasser Arafat when Fatah -- the largest organization in the Palestine Liberation Organization -- was just as militant toward Israel as Hamas. He displayed the secular nationalist bent of his party by chain-smoking through an interview Thursday afternoon, when traditional Muslims were fasting and avoiding cigarettes in honor of the holy month of Ramadan.

Recognizing Israel, he said, is how Fatah won international support for founding the Palestinian Authority and, someday, a Palestinian state.

``It's not for the Israelis!'' he said, raising his voice in exasperation. ``It is a precondition for the rest of the world to recognize me. I need it for myself.''

Frustrations in the streets are directed not just at Hamas, but also at the Palestinian Authority bureaucracy and security forces, dominated by Fatah.

No one in the village of Qibliyeh Farm disputed that the motorbike police confiscated Sept. 3 was stolen. But economic stress had frayed tempers, and rumors circulated that the police had beaten the man who was riding the bike.

A crowd of villagers rushed to nearby Bir Zeit and stoned the police station. Qinneh was killed there in what Palestinian officials ruled was excessive use of force.

The altercation, for police and villagers alike, sums up feelings of abandonment by their leaders. A police sergeant who no longer has enough gas for his car, yet is still so loyal to Fatah that his cellphone ring is a recording of Arafat reading a Koranic verse, said that people have lost respect for the law and that Hamas and Fatah would rather keep their respective political fiefdoms than strike a deal.

``Hamas is happy, and Abu Mazen [Abbas] is happy, and we are stuck in the middle," said the officer, who asked not to be identified because of the political tension.

Meanwhile, the dead man's father, Abdelfattah al-Qinneh, said officials sent him a $10,000 payment for his son's death -- not through a court of law but through a traditional practice used to resolve clan feuding. To Qinneh, it was as if the Palestinian Authority were just another tribe.

``There is no law and order," he said. ``The killers should be identified."

Thousands In Gaza Protest Salary Delays (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, October 1, 2006

Thousands of government employees and security officials burned tires, blocked roads and fired shots in the air on Gaza streets Saturday to protest delays in receiving long-awaited salaries.

Palestinian Interior Minister Said Siyam ordered security forces to deploy in the streets Sunday to prevent similar protests. The order authorized the use of "all means of force," said ministry spokesman Khaled Abu Hilal.

"Those who protested today ... do not represent security institutions. They are violating law and order, so they are illegal," he said.

The protesters closed the main road between Gaza City and Khan Younis, affecting movement between Gaza City and the southern Gaza Strip.

The Palestinian government on Thursday began paying partial salaries to 165,000 civil servants who haven't received their full wages in months due to an economic embargo on the Palestinian Authority. The individual payments of $350 come from money donated to the government by Qatar and Saudi Arabia.

But government employees complained that in some cases, the money hadn't arrived, and in others they were left with nothing after Palestinian banks had deducted commissions and interest and paid off existing loans.

Outside Rafah City, protesters threw stones at the vehicle of Attalah Abu Sabh, Hamas' minister of culture, breaking the windows of the car. Abu Sabh was unharmed, Hamas officials said. The protesters also tried to enter a number of schools and disrupt studies, witnesses said.

Israel and the West froze economic ties with the Palestinian Authority after the militant Islamic group Hamas took power in March. Hamas has refused international demands that it recognize Israel, accept signed peace agreements and renounce violence.

With the aid cut off, the government has been unable for six months to pay the full salaries to its workers, a major part of the Palestinian workforce. Government workers, including teachers, doctors and security officers, have repeatedly staged strikes demanding the salaries and calling for the resignation of the Hamas government.

Presto, Palestinians, You Are All One (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

JERUSALEM

THE Palestinians may soon have a new government of national unity — or may not.

More than two weeks ago, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, announced he had reached agreement with the radical Islamic group Hamas on the political platform for such a government as a way to induce the West to resume financial aid to the desperate Palestinians.

The idea was immediately endorsed by the European Union at a meeting of foreign ministers on Sept. 15.

But the Europeans were embracing a chimera — praising a new government that didn't yet exist. In fact, Hamas repudiated the political program almost as soon as Mr. Abbas announced it.

In the muddle since then, what has become clearest is the danger of diplomacy when reality confronts language intended to disguise it. The whole exercise has had an element of prestidigitation about it — a magician wooing an audience desperately hoping to suspend disbelief.

The major obstacle is that any new government would represent a defeat for Hamas — an admission that it cannot govern alone, with no ideological modifications. That is apparently too big a concession for its political director, Khaled Meshal, who lives in exile in Damascus.

For Hamas leaders in the territories, like Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, a unity government could be an exit from a terrible problem. Hamas, considered a terrorist group by the United States and European Union, has proven unable to circumvent the Israeli and American determination to force it to change by denying it recognition and money.

But even a unity government would not automatically mean a restoration of financing. The Israelis and Americans make three demands: that Hamas recognize the right of Israel to exist; that it forswear violence; and that it accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Mr. Abbas's magic plan has been to seek language that would allow Hamas to accept some conditions as part of a unity government, without making them the movement's own.

The draft political plan, for example, would not explicitly recognize Israel's right to exist. Instead, it accepted as a goal an old Arab League peace proposal, which Israel has rejected, and in language that didn't mention Israel at all.

The program also tried to dodge the government's role in international relations by confirming the primacy of the Palestine Liberation Organization, headed by Mr. Abbas, as the sole negotiating authority. The P.L.O. accepts previous agreements that it negotiated, so Mr. Abbas argues that Hamas's refusal to do the same hardly matters. But if he should reach agreement with Israel, the deal's fate would be at the mercy of the Palestinian legislature, which Hamas controls.

And while the program promised that Palestinians would "struggle to liberate their lands and end the occupation using all legitimate means," the document negotiated with Hamas confirmed a "right" to resist Israeli occupation, including inside Israel proper. This is not "forswearing violence."

As Mr. Abbas has labored, European diplomats talked about amending the three demands and starting with a cease-fire that would bring some cash support. The United States and Israel oppose any softening, however — particularly on Israel's right to exist.

So the vision of a unified Palestinian government may wither quickly. With the Egyptians frustrated, Qatar on Thursday stepped in to try to mediate between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Meshal. But in interviews last week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice talked as if a national-unity government were dead, and her government was said to be pushing Mr. Abbas to confront Hamas and fire Mr. Haniya.

The mirage of national unity may, on closer inspection, presage intensified conflict. Or it may not.

Building Nowhereland (WP)

By Gershom Gorenberg

JERUSALEM -- Out on Highway 60, the bulldozers are at work.

Next to the road that leads south from Jerusalem to Israeli settlements in the West Bank, the big yellow machines are scraping the earth, carving a flat, white, dusty shoulder. Along that strip, a high concrete wall is already being built, part of the newest segment of Israel's "separation fence." The planned route loops around the cluster of settlements known as the Etzion Bloc, putting them on the Israeli side of the de facto border.

Israeli-Palestinian diplomacy is stalled. The bulldozers are not. Once again they are changing the face of the land in a way that makes life far more difficult for Palestinians while damaging Israel's own long-term interests.

As described by Israel's Defense Ministry, the fence is purely a security measure intended to protect Israelis from Palestinian terrorists. Instead of running along the Green Line, the Israel-West Bank border, the route has been drawn to place major "settlement blocs" on the Israeli side -- supposedly only to defend them as well.

Yet Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has publicly stated that the settlement blocs will remain part of Israel after a unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank. He reiterated that point in February while on a working tour of the fence route in the Etzion area. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni has said, a bit coyly, that the fence "will have implications for the future border." The Defense Ministry official in charge of planning the fence told me much the same three years ago. Cut past obfuscations, and the fence is the government's assertion, drawn in concrete and barbed wire, of what land it seeks to keep.

The 10 settlements in the Etzion enclave are home to more than 44,000 Israelis. The number keeps rising, boosted by government efforts. In early September the Housing Ministry asked for bids to build more than 340 new units in Beitar Elit, the largest settlement in the enclave. The settlers enjoy the full rights of Israeli citizens. They drive into Israel, or to scattered settlements deeper in the West Bank, without interference, and they will continue doing so.

But note this: Six Palestinian communities are also inside the planned enclave. Twenty thousand people live in them. To travel back and forth to Bethlehem, the nearest urban center, most will have to pass through a single terminal being built along the fence and undergo a security check. That includes women in labor trying to reach the nearest hospital. It includes those who commute to work in the Bethlehem area, along with farmers who work the area's rich land and want to get their produce to market. Teachers from Bethlehem trying to reach their classrooms inside the enclave will need to pass the other way. This is a very partial list of how the fence will tear the fabric of life.

Yet for Palestinian residents the enclave will not be annexed to Israel. No one so much as suggests that they be given citizenship -- or even legal residency and the right to travel and work freely within Israel. Indeed, another stretch of fence is planned along the Green Line, to prevent potential terrorists from crossing into Israel. The six villages will be in Nowhereland, neither part of Israel nor part of the West Bank.

To pursue this project today makes no sense. Olmert's vision of unilateral withdrawal was intended to end rule over the Palestinians and guarantee Israel's Jewish majority, yet allow Israel to keep major settlements. But the conditions created inside enclaves such as the Etzion area are an affront to Israel's democracy and a guarantee of continuing conflict with the Palestinians.

What's more, the summer's battles in Gaza and Lebanon have shattered support in Israel for unilateralism. Without peace, a fence is not enough to protect the country. It is now clear that Israel can pull back safely only if it does so as part of a negotiated agreement. And there is no chance of an accord that will leave large settlement blocs in Israel's hands.

The Israeli Supreme Court is expected to rule soon on lawsuits by Palestinians against the Etzion area fence. Yet the slim chance of judicial salvation does nothing to explain why Olmert's government continues to invest in the failed project of the settlements, which for nearly 40 years has drained Israel's energies, subverted its democracy and harmed its security.

Nor is there any reasonable explanation for why Israel's strategic ally, the United States, virtually ignores what is happening in the Etzion area. The Bush administration has recently shown some inconsistent interest in restarting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Yet, following a long, mistaken tradition in American diplomacy, it pays more attention to negotiating stances than to the shifting reality in the region.

Meanwhile, out on Highway 60, the bulldozers are preparing a monument to a doomed policy.

Palestinians: Israeli Airstrike Kills 2 (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

An Israeli airstrike in the southern Gaza Strip killed two Palestinian militants and wounded three people, medical officials said.

The airstrike took place in Rafah, which borders Egypt. Medical officials said two members of the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades — a violent group linked to President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party — were killed. Two people were seriously wounded, and a 6-year-old boy was wounded in the legs.

The army said it had targeted a vehicle carrying a group of militants involved in attacks on Israel. But witnesses said the missile struck a group of pedestrians.

The airstrike occurred shortly after Israeli ground troops attacked a target along the Israeli border in northern Gaza. Witnesses said there were no injuries.

The Israeli army said it had targeted a militant who had tried to fire a homemade rocket into Israel. Earlier Saturday, a homemade rocket struck a house in the Israeli border town of Sderot, lightly wounding one person.

Jordan's King Risks Shah's Fate, Critics Warn (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

Abdullah II, who has closely allied himself with the U.S., is accused by reformers and traditionalists alike of alienating his people.

AMMAN, Jordan — A politically inexperienced king takes control of a Middle Eastern monarchy from his powerful father, surrounds himself with U.S. military hardware and spies, loses touch with his people and is finally ejected in a popular uprising.

That was the tale of Mohammed Reza Shah Pahlavi, the pro-American ruler of Iran whose ouster ushered in the reign of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and three decades of Islamic rule.

Now many in this Arab country of more than 5 million people fear that a similar fate could befall King Abdullah II, the Jordanian monarch who assumed power after his charismatic father died in 1999.

"Until now in Amman we don't have a Khomeini," said one mid-ranking official serving the Jordanian Cabinet. "If there was a Khomeini, then this family would be in trouble."

The king's father, Hussein, deftly balanced his country's contradictory pressures. He paid respects to the conservative East Bank tribes' demands for stability while also attending to calls from the nation's more cosmopolitan majority Palestinians for democratic change.

But critics on both sides of the Jordanian divide say the 44-year-old king has failed to garner popular support. Descendants of the tribes that are the monarchy's base criticize the king for failing to abide by tribal customs and losing touch with his supporters. They whisper the name of Abdullah's popular younger brother, Hamzeh. Palestinian groups and activists fear that the government in Amman has gotten too close to Washington, has adopted the Bush administration's with-us-or-against-us worldview too thoroughly and is sliding on human rights and democracy.

"King Hussein was an artist," said Ivan Eland, for 17 years a staff member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and now an analyst at the Oakland-based Independent Institute, a think tank. "He was roundly criticized for supporting Saddam [Hussein] in the first Gulf War. But in retrospect, he looked pretty smart.

"The son has gotten more in bed with the United States," he added. "He hasn't been distancing himself from American policy. That has put him in a hole he hasn't been able" to get out of.

Numerous parallels exist between the shah's rule and that of Abdullah. Like the shah's SAVAK security and intelligence service, Jordan's General Intelligence Department, now in a new hilltop complex in an Amman suburb, operates as a "subdivision" of the CIA, said Alexis Debat, a former French Defense Ministry official who is a counter-terrorism consultant and a senior fellow at the Nixon Center in Washington.

By Debat's estimates, the Jordanian intelligence agency receives at least $20 million a year in U.S. funding for operations and liaison work. "They're doing all the legwork for the CIA," he said.

The Jordanians have become one of Washington's closest allies in the intelligence-gathering business, second only to Britain's MI6, counter-intelligence experts say. They are closer to the CIA than the Mossad, Israel's much-touted intelligence agency, which is considered to have too much of an agenda of its own to be completely reliable, Debat said.

Like the Iran of the 1970s, Jordan has become a receptacle of U.S. interests and trade. American aid to the kingdom has totaled $3.59 billion over the last five years, compared with $1.36 billion during the previous five years, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Like the shah's regime, the Jordanian monarchy has surrounded itself with American hardware. Just before Hussein's death, Amman took delivery of 16 advanced F-16 fighter jets. "That was a sort of threshold that Jordan crossed," said Michael R. Fischbach, a professor of history at Randolph-Macon College in Virginia. "They got truly advanced weaponry. It made Jordan have aircraft on par with Israel."

U.S.-made military hardware abounds on Jordan's streets. Jordanian soldiers carrying American-made M-16 assault rifles and riding in olive-green U.S.-made Humvees watch over sensitive military and political sites in Amman, the capital. Convoys of U.S. military transport trucks move in and out of the country.

Perhaps most controversially, say Amnesty International and other human rights groups, Jordan has become an important nexus in U.S. intelligence's subterranean "renditions" network, in which terrorism suspects are secretly detained and interrogated in countries with blemished human rights records. Jordanian officials deny participation in the program.

Many worry that bolstering Jordanian security forces amid widespread reports of abuses against detainees has hampered the country's baby steps toward democratization.

"The security forces are improving at the cost of democracy," said Hamzeh Mansur, a leader of the Islamic Action Front, the main Islamist parliamentary bloc.

Jordanian officials say the security apparatus has been ramped up and civil liberties laws tightened out of fear the country will become a staging ground for secretive cells plotting violent operations in Iraq, Israel and the Palestinian territories. Jordan has also been victimized by terrorism, including the Nov. 9, 2005, bombings of three Amman hotels that killed dozens.

"You have to combat terrorism while it's in its planning stage," said Nasser Joudeh, a government spokesman. "We will not allow Jordan to be used as a scene for any activity relating to non-Jordanian problems. We will not allow anyone to bring militant or extremist ideas into Jordan or export them elsewhere."

But the Hashemite kingdom's evident close ties with Washington and its leap into the U.S.-declared war on terrorism threaten to put the government on what some call a collision course with many of its people, especially in light of a sharp increase in anti-American sentiment after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 and Israel's recent bombing of Lebanon in the Jewish state's war against Shiite Muslim militants.

"Being darlings of the U.S. is considered bad, bad, bad," said a Western analyst based in Jordan who requested anonymity.

Jordanian government officials say the security forces have become less heavy-handed in their approach. "I am liberal-minded," said Maj. Gen. Mohammed Dahabi, the chief of Jordanian intelligence, who says he was appointed in December with a mandate to clean up the service's reputation as well as confront the growing threat of Islamic militants in neighboring Iraq and the West Bank.

However, confronted by the recent allegations of torture, the officials acknowledge that the past casts a long shadow on the country.

"Old habits die hard," said Dahabi, who represents a segment of the tribal-dominated security forces that strongly supports the king.

Few publicly speak out against the king because of a law that can be used to prosecute those who do. "Criticisms of the king and the intelligence forces are strictly taboo and carry serious penalties," says a January 2006 Human Rights Watch report. "Articles of the penal code criminalize speech slandering public officials, criticizing the king and his family, and harming relations with other states."

But Abdullah has emboldened a legion of critics among the country's tradition-minded tribes that are the backbone of the monarchy.

"He talks about information technology and foreign investment, but he doesn't really know his own people," said the government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of his sensitive position within the Cabinet.

"The tribes are very upset with him," said the Western analyst in Amman.

"The impression is that he's too Westernized."

Many critics say the monarch has been too busy pursuing a Western agenda instead of forging ahead with a vision for uniting the country, which remains divided between the powerful tribes and the numerous Jordanian nationals of Palestinian descent.

"He has ambitions to make Jordan a modern country," said Jean-Robert Leguey-Feilleux, a scholar of Middle East politics, diplomacy and terrorism at St. Louis University. "You can't do that without the support of the people."

India's Police Say Pakistan Helped Plot July Train Bombings (NYT)

By Anand Giridharadas

DOJ_NMG_0072407

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

MUMBAI, India, Sept. 30 — In a declaration likely to increase tensions on this subcontinent, the Indian police on Saturday accused Pakistan's intelligence agency of being behind the July 11 train bombings that killed more than 180 people in Mumbai.

Officials in Islamabad swiftly rejected the allegation, which comes at an awkward moment for Pakistan.

On stormy visits to Washington and London this week, the nation's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, was dogged by accusations that Pakistan was not doing enough to curb Islamic militancy, or, worse, might even be aiding it.

Now the Indian police are adding their voice to those claims. They have already blamed Lashkar-e-Taiba, a Pakistan-based militant group fighting to expel India from the disputed Kashmir region, for the blasts.

But on Saturday, for the first time in this investigation, they directly accused the Directorate for Inter-Services Intelligence in Islamabad of plotting the bombings.

"We have solved the July 11 bombings case," Anami Narayan Roy, the police chief of Mumbai, said during a televised news conference. "The whole attack was planned by Pakistan's I.S.I. and carried out by Lashkar-e-Taiba and their operatives in India."

Within hours, the Pakistani Foreign Office issued a statement calling Mr. Roy's comments irresponsible and baseless.

"This statement, like those made immediately after the Mumbai bomb blasts, contains unsubstantiated allegations, which the Indian officials and media keep making for propaganda purposes," the Pakistani statement said.

India almost always blames Pakistan for terrorist attacks on its soil, and Pakistan almost always denies the allegations, expressing frustration with India's refusal to share hard evidence dealing with the attacks.

The latest accusation complicates a recent initiative to rescue the India-Pakistan peace process, which stalled in mutual recriminations after the blasts. Relations improved earlier this month when the two countries agreed in Havana to resume talks and to create a joint mechanism for combating terrorism in the region.

"The antiterror mechanism is obviously not going to take off, especially now that this Mumbai statement has come out," said Kanchan Lakshman, a terrorism analyst at the Institute for Conflict Management in New Delhi. "I think they'll go back to how it was pre-Havana."

Terrorism remains a major stumbling block between the nuclear-armed rivals, which have fought three wars and stood at the cusp of a fourth in 2002. India accuses Pakistan of fomenting terrorism. Pakistan has long said that it provides moral support to those fighting for an Indian withdrawal from Kashmir but that it rejects violence.

Navtej Sarna, the Indian Foreign Ministry spokesman, said in a telephone interview from South Africa that it was too early to judge the fallout of the police statement.

Parvinder Singh Pasricha, the police chief of Maharashtra State, which contains Mumbai, formerly Bombay, said in a telephone interview late Saturday that the accusations by the police had been cleared with and corroborated by India's national intelligence agencies.

The charge comes days after President Bush used a White House dinner to try to make peace between General Musharraf and President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan, who accuses Pakistani intelligence of letting the Taliban resurface in Afghanistan.

Moreover, this past week, the BBC reported on a document, said to have been written by a military research institute sponsored by Britain, accusing Pakistan's security services of playing a dual role by fighting and abetting militants.

Indian Official Accuses Pakistan In July Attacks (WP/AP)

By Ramola Talwar Badam, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Spy Agency Seen Behind Mumbai Blasts

MUMBAI, Sept. 30 -- The police officer leading the investigation into train bombings that killed more than 200 people in the Indian city of Mumbai in July accused Pakistan's spy agency on Saturday of engineering the attack.

Tariq Azim, Pakistan's minister of state for information, denied the claim, calling it "sad and unfortunate."

"We reject this allegation, and demand that India should provide us any evidence, if they have," Azim said.

Mumbai Police Commissioner A.N. Roy said an intensive investigation that included using truth serum on suspects revealed that Pakistan's top spy agency had "masterminded" the bombings.

Roy said Pakistan's Directorate for Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI, began planning the attacks in March and later provided training in Bahawalpur, Pakistan, to those who carried out the bombings.

"The terror plot was ISI-sponsored and executed by Lashkar-e-Taiba operatives with help from the Students Islamic Movement of India," Roy said at a news conference in Mumbai, formerly known as Bombay, to announce the completion of the investigation.

Lashkar is a Pakistan-based Islamic militant group; the Students Islamic Movement of India, or SIMI, is a banned group.

So far 15 people have been arrested, including 11 Pakistanis, Roy said, adding that three Indians were still on the run and another Pakistani was killed in one of the blasts.

The July 11 attacks involved seven bombs that ripped through suburban trains in Mumbai, India's financial and entertainment capital, killing at least 207 people and injuring 700.

Pakistan has in the past denied involvement in the attacks, and it was not immediately clear how Roy's remarks would affect the fragile peace process between the nuclear-armed neighbors.

The Indian allegations came days after the BBC reported that a document prepared for Britain's Defense Ministry accused the ISI of indirectly supporting terrorist groups including al-Qaeda.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, strongly rejected the accusation, while the British Defense Ministry clarified that the leaked document was academic research and did not represent the government's view.

Roy gave a detailed description of how the explosives were transported into India and by whom. He also described how the bombs were packed into pressure cookers and placed on the trains.

Roy said some of the Pakistanis slipped into India by going over the two countries' shared border, while others went through neighboring Nepal and Bangladesh. There they were met by Indians who brought them to Mumbai and housed them in rented apartments, he said.

Police cracked the case after tracking down a suspicious call from Mumbai to the Nepali border region, Roy said. There they picked up one of the suspects, who led them to others.

Roy said many of the suspects had been trained to resist interrogation and only the use of truth serum helped tie up loose ends.

Karzai, Musharraf To Lead Tribal Talks (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, October 1, 2006

President Hamid Karzai said on Saturday that he and the Pakistani president will jointly lead a series of tribal gatherings along their countries' shared border to quell attacks on Afghanistan by Pakistan-based Taliban rebels.

Karzai said he wants an end to the Taliban incursions from Pakistan. The number of attacks in the Afghan border regions has tripled following a peace agreement between the Pakistani government and pro-Taliban tribesmen in its territory, according to U.S. officials.

"We're waiting to see how this peace deal works out. So far it hasn't been fruitful for Afghanistan," Karzai said.

Karzai appears to have been unable to secure Pakistan's immediate cooperation in shutting down radical religious schools or arresting Taliban leaders living in Pakistan.

Radical elements in some Islamic schools, also known as madrassas, have been blamed for indoctrinating suicide bombers and anti-government fighters who have stepped up attacks in Afghanistan in recent months. Hours before Karzai spoke Saturday, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a crowd near Afghanistan's Interior Ministry, killing at least 12 people.

"Unless we target the madrassas and their preaching of hatred against Islam and humanity, we won't be successful," Karzai said.

A U.S. military officer said on Wednesday that the cease-fire that began June 25, cemented by the signing of a peace accord Sept. 5, allowed the Taliban to use the North Waziristan border area to plan and carrying out attacks in Afghanistan.

Pakistani tribal elders brokered the truce between Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf's government and militants, ending years of unrest in the tribal region.

Karzai played down suggestions that relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan had cooled because of his bickering with Musharraf. The pair, who met with President Bush on Wednesday, conspicuously refused to shake hands in front of the press on the White House lawn.

"Relations with my brother Musharraf are never cool," Karzai said. "Afghanistan wants stability and brotherly relations between both countries."

Karzai said he and Musharraf would attend a series of jirgas, or consultative councils, with tribal elders and governors focused on the Afghan border provinces of Nangahar and Paktika and Pakistan's autonomous tribal region, North Waziristan.

The two presidents will seek ways to employ armed tribesmen on both sides of the border to stabilize the region and cut down on insurgent raids, Karzai said.

Cease-Fire Called By Group Of Kurdish Guerrillas In Turkey (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

ANKARA, Turkey, Sept. 30 (AP) — A Kurdish guerrilla group declared a new unilateral cease-fire in its war for autonomy in Turkey's southeast on Saturday, heeding a call from its imprisoned leader, a pro-Kurdish news agency said.

The Kurdistan Workers Party, or P.K.K., said the cease-fire would take effect on Sunday "in the hopes of starting a democratic process for the solution of the Kurdish problem," the pro-Kurdish Firat news agency said on its Web site.

The group said its fighters would not use arms unless attacked by the Turkish Army, Firat said.

The Turkish government has ignored previous cease-fires by the group, saying it does not negotiate with terrorists. Military commanders have vowed to fight until all rebels are killed or surrender.

The cease-fire announcement was made three days after the rebels' imprisoned leader, Abdullah Ocalan, appealed for a new cease-fire after guerrilla attacks against civilians and foreign tourists had drawn global criticism.

On Saturday, a Turkish soldier was killed and another was injured when they stepped on a mine believed to have been planted by Kurdish guerrillas in southeastern Turkey, the Dogan news agency reported. The incident occurred in the Hakkari province, bordering Iran and Iraq, it said.

A surge of rebel violence has killed more than a dozen soldiers and policemen in recent weeks. Militants believed to be linked to the rebels also have bombed tourist resorts, killing three tourists and wounding more than a dozen.

Mr. Ocalan's appeal followed American pledges of support in cracking down on the P.K.K., which is listed as a terrorist organization by the United States and the European Union.

The rebel conflict has claimed the lives of 37,000 people since the guerrillas took up arms in 1984.

Last year, the guerrilla group declared a cease-fire, but the truce lasted little more than a month. The rebels said the government failed to recognize their group and was maintaining its military drive against its members.

The P.K.K.'s longest unilateral cease-fire was declared after Mr. Ocalan's capture in 1999 and lasted five years.

Uneasy Lies The Severed Head (NYT)

By Christopher Caldwell

IT takes a lot to shock a vanguard theater audience in Berlin. The Deutsche Oper production of Mozart's "Idomeneo" adds a scene in which the decapitated heads of Poseidon, Jesus, Buddha and Muhammad are pulled from a bloody sack and propped on chairs — and it is meant to provoke.

When the director, Hans Neuenfels, staged the opera in 2003, though, the outrage was muted. That was before last winter's "cartoon affair," in which caricatures of Muhammad in a Danish newspaper led to several days of rioting and arson in the Muslim world, and protests in Europe.

Mr. Neuenfels's production was scheduled to reopen at the Deutsche Oper next month. But acting on an anonymous call from a worried operagoer, the Berlin police made an assessment that staging the opera would constitute a "risk with incalculable consequences." In German as in English, incalculable can mean two things. It can mean too high to reckon, or it can mean your guess is as good as mine. The Deutsche Oper's artistic director, Kirsten Harms, took it in the former sense. On Monday, she announced that "Idomeneo" would be struck from the fall schedule.

The condemnation was immediate and widespread. The leader of the parliamentary caucus of the Christian Social Union, the conservative Bavarian party, described Ms. Harms's decision as "nothing but pure cowardice." On the left, the Green Party's culture spokeswoman accused her of a pre-emptive "capitulation." Wolfgang Schäuble, the Christian Democratic interior minister who has spent recent months working with Muslim leaders to create an assimilable "German Islam," promised to ask Ms. Harms "whether she had gone crazy."

At a conference on Islam that Mr. Schäuble held on Wednesday, many of the country's top Muslim personalities called for the opera to be performed as planned. As the week ended, the clamor to reinstate the opera looked as if it would soon be irresistible.

What is it that Germans are rallying around so single-mindedly? If it is free speech, then that would imply a national shift. Germans value free speech, of course, and nowhere more so than in the artistic realm. They deploy sex (think of Fassbinder's movies) and gore (think of Joseph Beuys's performance-art pieces with dead animals) in ways bound to strike many Americans as gratuitous. But for understandable historical reasons, they are also unusually sensitive about hate speech.

This is not Denmark, for instance, where Louis-Ferdinand Céline was allowed to spout his fascism after World War II and where, in our own time, intolerant ranting tends to be ignored more than repressed. Germany is a country where you cannot, by law, glorify the Nazis or deny the Holocaust. Expression that tramples on the sensibilities of vulnerable minorities usually gives Germans, at the very least, pause.

The absence of any such pause is one of the distinctive features of the opera affair. Those who urged that people put themselves in Ms. Harms's shoes did so on the grounds of risk analysis, not on the grounds that demeaning religious symbols might be a bad idea. And this seems part of an emerging pattern.

After Pope Benedict XVI said he regretted any offense given by his lecture at the University of Regensburg in Germany — in which he cited the claims of a medieval text that Islam had brought little new besides conquest by the sword — many in the German press, including Michael Naumann, a former culture minister who publishes Die Zeit, argued that he had been too quick to apologize. Monika Griefahn, cultural spokeswoman for the Social Democratic Party, said of the opera cancellation: "If we're weighing security questions against artistic freedom, I have to ask myself if the fundamentalists haven't already won." Jörg Königsdorf, opera critic for the center-left newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung, noted that the scene with the four severed heads would have constituted "an ideal litmus test for the different potential for aggression among the world's religions."

The clamor cannot simply be chalked up to constitutional vigilance about free speech, because the threat to free speech was not a constitutional one. The state was willing to provide protection if threats proved credible. What it could not do, though, is supply artists and cultural institutions with a sense of steely purpose. In some quarters, inside and outside Germany, there was a mood of having been let down by the German cultural establishment, which is heavily subsidized and seen as pampered, particularly in the opera world. (Among them, the three Berlin opera houses receive roughly as much government financing — just over $125 million — as the National Endowment for the Arts in the United States.)

The British political commentator and opera enthusiast Martin Kettle, not an admirer of Mr. Neuenfels's school of interpretation, wrote in a Guardian blog that it would be a shame if "Idomeneo" were "to acquire a controversial reputation merely because of a 21st-century director's misdirected ego." And in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, Eleonore Büning wrote that it would be irresponsible to cancel the opera out of fear, "even if the production were stupid, silly, unoriginal, ignorant or, indeed, offensive."

The "opera affair" suggests that fear of Islam has lodged itself deeply in the minds of a lot of Westerners. Ms. Harms and the investigators she listened to are among them. This fear is not always irrational but not always based on real things, either. People often talk about the "specter" of Islamic violence. It was just that — a specter, rather than violence itself or any specific threat — that led to last week's cancellation. What made the German media and the broader public turn so suddenly on Ms. Harms was a kind of collective embarrassment. Germany has as much reason as other Western countries to worry about Islamist excesses. But the last half century has given it more experience in policing the fears inside its national subconscious.

AFP, October 1, 2006

The US military has entered the final stage of installing an advanced surface-to-air missile defense system in southern Japan, amid mounting concern over North Korea's missile launches.

The first batch of equipment for the Patriot Advanced Capability-3 (PAC-3) system was unloaded Saturday at a military port on Okinawa island, amid protests from a handful of anti-war activists, press reports said.

The operation was part of a move to relocate an air defense battalion with some 600 soldiers to the Kadena US air force base in Okinawa from Fort Bliss in Texas. The battalion is equipped with 24 (PAC-3) missiles.

Under an agreement reached with Tokyo last July on realigning US forces in Japan, the US will deploy PAC-3 missile interceptors at its bases in Japan and make them operational as soon as possible.

Television footage Saturday showed trucks and containers being unloaded from a US-chartered freighter which anchored at the port late Friday.

The Kyodo news agency, quoting US military sources, reported that the PAC-3 system itself was scheduled to arrive in Okinawa within two weeks.

The US plans to begin partial operation of the PAC-3 system by the end of December and become fully operational by the end of next March, Kyodo said.

At the US forces headquarters in Tokyo and at the Kadena base, noone was available to confirm the reports.

The land-based PAC-3, together with the projected sea-based Standard Missile 3 (SM-3), will make up a two-phased advanced anti-missile shield.

The SM-3 intercepts ballistic missiles when they reach their highest point outside of the atmosphere, while the PAC-3 is used to destroy missiles that evade SM-3 interceptions. The accuracy of these systems is still being debated.

SM-3s, jointly developed by the two countries, will be based on destroyers equipped with the state-of-the-art Aegis air-defence system.

The missile-defence project has been a pillar of the strengthened Japan-US military alliance in recent years.

Japan was prompted to boost its missile defenses in cooperation with the United States in 1998 when North Korea lobbed a suspected long-range missile over its main island and into the Pacific.

North Korea's July 5 firing of seven missiles into the Sea of Japan (East Sea) also fueled the drive for the joint missile scheme.

On Tuesday, the US military activated a powerful new missile defense radar at Camp Shariki in the north of the main Japanese island of Honshu.

The so-called X-Band Radar Transportable (FBX-T) is part of a network of forward deployed missile defense sensors that also includes US Aegis destroyers.

U.S. Defense Gear Said To Arrive In Asia (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

Heavy vehicles and other equipment related to the upcoming deployment of advanced Patriot interceptor missiles at American bases on southern Okinawa island arrived in Japan on Saturday, news reports said.

The equipment arrived amid lingering concerns about North Korea's missile program. Pyongyang test-fired seven missiles in early July that fell harmlessly into the Sea of Japan. The tests prompted Japan to impose sanctions on North Korea and brought international condemnation.

Japan and the U.S. later that month announced a plan to deploy Patriot Advanced Capability-3 interceptor missiles on Okinawa. The U.S. government will have the missiles operational by the end of the year, and will station more than 600 troops on the island to support them, according to Japan's Foreign Ministry.

Equipment related to the Patriots' deployment arrived at a military port in Naha, Okinawa, Saturday morning, public broadcaster NHK and the Kyodo News agency reported.

The equipment includes vehicles that will be used to transport the Patriot missiles, which are expected to arrive in the next two weeks, Kyodo said, citing U.S. military officials.

U.S. military officials did not immediately respond to phone messages and an e-mail Saturday. Japanese military officials were not immediately available to comment.

The missile deployment will be the latest in a series of steps undertaken by the U.S. and Japan to beef up regional missile defense.

Earlier this week, the U.S. military activated a high-powered "X-Band" radar outpost in northern Japan that is a key part of a joint missile defense shield and meant to track ballistic missiles in the region.

The U.S. in late August replaced a guided missile cruiser stationed at Yokosuka near Tokyo with the USS Shiloh, a cruiser equipped with Aegis technology geared toward tracking and shooting down enemy missiles.

In Thailand, A New Model For Militants? (LAT)

By John M. Glionna, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Muslim separatists' relentless low-level attacks on civilians are taking a heavy toll, but the campaign is largely unnoticed by the West.

HAT YAI, Thailand — The bomb that exploded outside New Cherry Ancient Massage was among the most sinister kinds — a lethal sucker punch timed to detonate moments after two other blasts had lured onlookers into the streets of this tourist town.

The homemade device, hidden in a motorcycle parked outside the busy parlor, killed five people, including a Canadian teacher and three masseuses.

All 30 surviving massage workers quit on the spot. Within days, the parents of the three dead women came to take their daughters' bodies home.

"One father asked, 'Why my child? She was a good girl,' " said New Cherry owner Boonchai Sangmankung. "And I couldn't answer him. I don't know myself. Why do the attacks continue? Why are more innocent people killed every day?"

Since 2004, militants in Thailand's predominantly Muslim south have waged a bloody separatist insurgency against the cultural elite of this largely Buddhist nation, targeting teachers, monks, community leaders and government officials. So far, 1,700 people have been killed, yet the campaign of almost-daily bombings, arson attacks, kidnappings and assassinations has gone largely unnoticed in a Western world fixated on higher-profile Islamic terrorism campaigns in Iraq and elsewhere.

"The violence in southern Thailand is quite significant compared to many other world conflicts today," said Panitan Wattanayagorn, a political scientist at Chulalongkorn University in Bangkok. "The U.S. lost 3,000 soldiers in three years in Iraq. This death toll is not far behind."

International terrorism experts are keeping a close eye on southern Thailand's guerrilla war, believing that the attacks could become a blueprint for small insurgencies in the post9/11 world. The strategy of incessant low-level attacks against civilians could be imitated by other regional militants, they say.

Experts also fear that the insurgents could soon be joined by international terrorists slipping across Thailand's porous borders, bringing money, expertise and manpower.

"It's important that this regional war not escalate," said John Brandon, director of the Asia Foundation's international relations program. "The world cannot afford this war to become ripe for outside terror influences to take advantage of it."

A recent State Department report concluded that there was no evidence of any connection between the militants and global terrorist groups such as Al Qaeda or Jemaah Islamiah, based in Southeast Asia.

"There is concern, however, that these groups may attempt to capitalize on an increasingly violent situation for their own purposes," the report stated.

Under Thai rule since 1902, Pattani, Narathiwat and Yala, the three Muslim-dominated provinces at the heart of the violence, are distinct from the rest of Thailand. The people speak a different language — a Malay dialect — and observe a strict Muslim lifestyle not far from the jet-set crowd sprawled on the sandy beaches of Phuket, a draw for U.S. and European tourists.

Many Muslim residents still chafe over what they consider a century of abusive rule. But experts differ over the roots of the insurgency. Some say it's a battle over religious freedom, others say it's a fight for territory and self-rule. Still others say it's both.

But the tensions have filled daily life in Thailand's south with newfound risks — walking children to school, shopping in an outdoor market, driving at night.

In the first six months of 2006, two people died every day, on average: A Buddhist teacher was gunned down in front of his fourth-grade class by men dressed as students. A salesman was beheaded outside a crowded teashop. The owner of an elephant troupe was shot seven times by assailants who had lined up with children to buy tickets for a show.

In August, 22 small bombs exploded nearly simultaneously in banks throughout southern Yala province, killing one person and bringing commerce to a standstill. Two months earlier, 50 bombs went off in a single day at government offices and police stations.

Last year, 15 militants stormed a Buddhist temple and hacked two monks to death before setting fire to their bodies. Thai officials believe that 30,000 Buddhists have fled the south since the attack. Insurgents also have targeted fellow Muslims suspected of conspiring with a military known for its brutality in dealing with the Islamic militants.

For their part, Thai officials claim to be fighting a ghost insurgency: The killers don't issue claims of responsibility for their acts. Officials have little clue about the identity of the attackers. About 20,000 troops in the region have yet to arrest any insurgency leaders.

"The nation's best military intelligence concedes we are waging a war on ghosts," said Srisompob Jitpiromsri, a political scientist at Prince of Songkla University. "We don't have a clue as to who their leaders are or what they want."

Terrorism experts believe that the insurgency is led by a coalition of regional groups, including the National Revolutionary Front Coordinate and the Pattani United Liberation Organization, or PULO, which are vying for control of the region.

The two groups have developed cells in most southern villages and have their pick of disenfranchised youths eager to take part in the violence. But neither claims to control all of the region's militants, saying that religious splinter groups, war lords and business and political rivalries also play a role in the attacks.

"People on the street may know who is responsible, they may even know them, but everyone is too afraid to say anything aloud, or even speak in private about the attacks," Srisompob said. "That, to me, is the mark of a successful insurgency."

Mahkota Kasturi, a PULO foreign affairs spokesman in exile in Sweden, said Thai officials "know who we are and where we are, but they are reluctant to come to the table. Perhaps they do not feel they need to negotiate with so-called terrorists."

Experts say the militants eventually want to create an autonomous Muslim state in southern Thailand, where residents have long complained of being treated as second-class citizens, enduring the erosion of their language and culture. None of the three southern provinces, where Muslims make up 80% of the 1.8 million residents, has ever had a Muslim governor, they point out.

Mahkota said separatists seek to disrupt Thai society as a way to win freedom. "The killings and the violence will continue until we reach our goal — and that is independence," he said.

Former Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, deposed last month in a coup, had recently struck hard against the insurgents, imposing martial law that brought allegations of torture and counter-assassinations.

In 2004, nearly 200 Muslims were killed by security forces. First, 32 militants died during the storming of a mosque in April. Six months later, a military crackdown on a demonstration against martial law at a regional police station killed scores. Seventy-eight men suffocated after being stacked five-deep into sweltering army trucks.

Thaksin has been replaced by Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, a Muslim who has pushed for a more conciliatory stance toward the insurgents. But within a week of the coup, attacks had killed four people and injured more than a dozen.

Experts doubt that the regime change will bring peace.

"If anything, they may step up attacks in an attempt to provoke a heavy-handed government response," said Zachary Abuza, a terrorism expert who has written a soon-to-be published book on the Thai insurgency. "The secessionist agenda operates on a time frame that you and I don't understand. For them, 30 years is not a long time."

The scope of the violence has widened since 2004. At first targeting civil servants, soldiers and police officers, militants soon included restaurants and businesses serving the military. Then monks and teachers came under fire; the death toll now stands at 49 teachers and six monks. Many attacks have been staged by men using motorcycles for quick escape. Bombs are usually detonated by cellphone.

Insurgents have made teaching the most dangerous job in southern Thailand.

In July, while his fourth-graders looked on, Prasarn Martchu was shot in the back as he stood at his blackboard instructing a morning class at a rural school in Narathiwat province.

Principal Adul Jekyeng said Prasarn had taught for 25 years and was a leader in the local teachers union. He said four men rode up on motorcycles and passed several classrooms before they found Prasarn.

"He never saw his killers," Adul said. "They shot an unarmed teacher in the back. He had no gun, no weapon, only a piece of chalk."

Educators say teachers are seen by insurgents as authority figures and targeted because they are easy to find. Many, such as Phairat Saengthong, are fighting back.

The regional school director recently flew to Bangkok to buy a 9-millimeter pistol.

"This is the model the U.S. soldiers carry," he said proudly, pointing the weapon around the room.

"Today, 90% of male teachers carry guns such as this, and even 30% of the women, which shows how fearful we have become. I may be a Buddhist, but now I too carry a gun. And I am not afraid to use it."

Sitting cross-legged on the floor of her home in a rural village in Pattani province, Chitra Ngen-Moon said she felt trapped in the crossfire between rebels and soldiers.

Her 29-year-old son, Anek, was killed last year. Friends found his beheaded body soon after he disappeared while on his rounds as the local tax collector. He is one of 10 men who have been killed in the village of 400 residents.

Holding a photo of her son, the 70-year-old woman vowed that one day she would know who was responsible.

"When all of this violence is over, I want to know who cut off the head of my son," she said. "I want to see these barbaric people with my own eyes. But I am an old woman. Now I am too afraid to ask questions."

Nearby, at the Krue Se mosque in Pattani, site of the deadly 2004 storming by the military, Haji Niseng Nilaeh said he did not approve of the violence being waged by either side.

"Every day, people die — it makes me unhappy," said the 77-year-old Muslim elder, dressed in a traditional tunic and sarong. "But the insurgents are not only killing Buddhists, they are killing fellow Muslims now as well. No one is safe."

Russia Puts Base Closures On Ice (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

MOSCOW — The Russian military Saturday suspended the closure of its two military bases in the former Soviet republic of Georgia, saying it was acting to protect its citizens there as relations between the two countries spiraled downward in the midst of a spy scandal.

Russia reacted angrily to the arrest Wednesday of five Russian military officers. Four of the Russians have been ordered held for two months while investigations continue; the fifth was released Thursday for lack of evidence. Ten Georgian citizens also were detained.

Georgian authorities have demanded the hand-over of a sixth officer, believed to have taken refuge in Russia's military headquarters in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital. Police have cordoned off the compound, saying they will neither storm the headquarters, which is protected by diplomatic immunity, nor allow the officer to escape. The Russian military has denied that Lt. Col. Konstantin Pichugin is at the compound.

Meanwhile, Russia has been evacuating nonessential diplomats and their families. Ivan Volynkin, a top official at the Russian Embassy in Tbilisi, told Russian news agency RIA Novosti on Saturday that only two diplomats and several security guards would remain.

Alexander Baranov, commander of Russian forces in a southern region that borders Georgia, said Saturday at a news conference in Rostov-on-Don that the base closures were being suspended because Georgia's actions meant the safety of Russian personnel there could not be guaranteed.

Baranov also said that Russia would prevent Georgian authorities from entering any Russian military facility to apprehend suspected spies.

"The order has been given that any attempts by strangers to enter the garrisons' territories be prevented, if necessary, by force," Baranov said. "There is no question of handing over any alleged spies. These are Russian citizens, and any problem should be resolved through dialogue rather than through police escapades."

Russia and Georgia issued a joint statement in May 2005 in which Russia promised to close the two Soviet-era bases by 2008. One of the facilities is in the Black Sea region of Adzharia; the other is in southern Georgia near the border with Armenia.

Salome Zourabichvili, who was Georgia's foreign minister when the accord was reached, said at the time that the statement was not legally binding but that it was "politically binding." The Russian parliament has not ratified a separate protocol implementing the agreement.

Russia also has bases for peacekeeping forces in two breakaway regions of Georgia: Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which border Russia. Tbilisi accuses those units of siding with separatist leaders ruling the two regions, and it wants them gone.

Since his election in 2004 after a nonviolent people's revolt dubbed the Rose Revolution, Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili has sought to reassert the country's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Using military threats and encouraged by local protests, he quickly won back control of Adzharia. In recent months, he has stepped up pressure on the other two regions.

Moscow has charged that Georgia wants Russian troops gone so it can retake the breakaway areas by force before applying for NATO membership.

Under Saakashvili, Georgia has made joining the North Atlantic Treaty Organization a top priority. It says it wants to achieve reunification peacefully.

Many observers believe that the long-term goal of the separatists in Abkhazia and South Ossetia is to merge with Russia. Russian officials deny having any designs on Georgian territory.

The Russian ambassador to Georgia, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, was recalled to Moscow in protest of the arrests, and he told reporters upon his arrival here Friday that the spying charges had "no solid basis at all."

Kovalenko dismissed the significance of videotape that allegedly shows the Russian and Georgian detainees conspiring.

Georgian Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili released the video Thursday. It also shows an exchange of money.

Chirac Urges Turks To Recognize Genocide (NYT)

By Agence France-presse

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

YEREVAN, Armenia, Sept. 30 (Agence France-Presse) — French President Jacques Chirac on Saturday urged Turkey to recognize World War I-era massacres of Armenians as genocide if it wants to join the European Union.

Mr. Chirac spoke at a news conference during a visit to Yerevan, the Armenian capital. His remarks are likely to irritate Turkey and further strain its relations with France.

Until now, France had refused to make a direct link between the genocide and Turkey's bid for membership in the European Union. The bloc has not made it a condition of entry.

Asked if he thought Turkey should recognize the 1915 massacres as genocide before it joins the European Union, the French president replied, "Honestly, I believe so."

Armenia's president, Robert Kocharian, spoke respectfully about Turkey's aspirations to join the European Union.

"We don't see any danger in this process, but we would like that our interests would be discussed in the process too," he said.

Armenians: EU Wrong On Turkey (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0072416

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The Armenian quest for Turkey's admission that it massacred ethnic Armenians nearly a century ago has suffered a setback with an EU decision to drop the historic "guilt clause" as a requirement for EU membership.

The European Parliament's action last week was merely consultative, but nonetheless was seen as a considerable blow to Armenian hopes.

A member of the Armenian diaspora in Cyprus said the community would never give up its struggle to obtain international recognition of "genocide" applying to the World War I deaths of more than 1 million Turkish Armenians, starved, shot or bayoneted during a forced "resettlement" march across the desert to Syria.

Some Armenians feel that the dropping of the proposed precondition paragraph by the EU parliamentarians was influenced by governments pushing for Muslim Turkey's EU membership.

Canada's reference to the Armenian "genocide" and the French plan to penalize those who deny it caused a crisis earlier this year in relations between the two countries and Turkey.

The issue appeared to have been shelved after Turkey threatened "irreparable damage," particularly in its relations with France, Turkey's major economic partner but also home to an influential Armenian diaspora of more than 200,000.

Turkey has systematically rejected efforts to blame it for the massacres perpetrated by the collapsing Ottoman regime that preceded modern Turkey.

Ankara's official version is that some 300,000 Armenians died in 1915-17 because of war, disease, famine and ethnic conflict rather than as a result of any policy of ethnic extermination.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has described efforts to add the admission of Turkish guilt into official membership requirements as a violation of EU rules.

"We do not ask for privileges from the EU, but putting forward new criteria is unacceptable to us," Mr. Erdogan said recently.

Ottoman Turkey, at war with Russia during World War I, accused its Armenian community of pro-Russian sympathies and of acting as the enemy's "fifth column."

The international campaign for admission of Turkey's guilt is spearheaded by the Armenian diaspora of some 2 million rather than by the former Soviet republic of Armenia with a population of more than 3 million.

Serbian Parliament OKs New Constitution (AP)

By Jovana Gec

AP, October 1, 2006

Serbia's parliament approved a new constitution Saturday declaring U.N.-run Kosovo part of the Balkan state despite ongoing negotiations on the breakaway province's future.

The hastily drafted constitution — agreed after a few weeks of consultation — is designed to underscore Serbia's opposition to possible independence for Kosovo as the result of the U.N.-brokered talks on the province's future.

Kosovo formally is a province of Serbia. But Belgrade has had no authority over the separatist region since a 1999 NATO bombing forced it to end a crackdown against the ethnic Albanian rebels and pull out its forces.

The 242 lawmakers at the session unanimously voted in favor of the constitution that will replace the current one drafted in 1990 by the autocratic leader at the time, Slobodan Milosevic.

The new constitution also needs a "yes" vote in a national referendum before it becomes valid. The parliament later voted to hold the referendum Oct. 28-29.

"This is a historic day," declared Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica. He said the new constitution will "cement the truth that Kosovo always has been and always will be an integral part of Serbia."

The constitution also will define Serbia as an independent state for the first time since the breakup of Yugoslavia in the early 1990s.

Pro-Western President Boris Tadic said the constitution will define Serbia as a "modern, European state."

Several hundred government critics rallied in front of the parliament building during the session to protest against the new constitution, saying that it will jeopardize Serbia's future by declaring Kosovo its own. The protesters, led by the opposition Liberal Democratic Party, announced a campaign for a referendum boycott.

International negotiators have said they want to conclude the talks by the end of the year on Kosovo's future, and there have been increasing signs that Kosovo will be granted some form of independence.

Inclusion of Kosovo in the new Serbian constitution will effectively rule out Belgrade's consent to Kosovo's secession as demanded by its ethnic Albanian majority.

The urgency in bringing the constitution is widely seen as a face-saving effort by Kostunica, who is facing a government crisis and a possible walkout of a key coalition member.

The liberal G17 Party has threatened to leave the Cabinet by Sunday over Serbia's failure to arrest top war crimes suspect Ratko Mladic and resume pre-entry talks with the European Union.

The new constitution defines Serbia as the country of the Serb people and its other citizens, grants protection of human and minority rights, and gives a form of self-rule to the northern province of Vojvodina.

Chavez: Assassination Attempt Foiled (AP)

By Natalie Obiko Pearson

AP, October 1, 2006

President Hugo Chavez, who has repeatedly spoken of various plots on his life, said Saturday a sniper with a long-range gun and a motorcycle to escape on had planned to shoot him as he exited a helicopter on a recent trip to western Venezuela.

The incident allegedly occurred when Chavez visited the western oil-producing region of Zulia in June to inaugurate a refurbished fertilizer plant. Chavez appeared to link the plot to his main rival in upcoming presidential elections, Gov. Manuel Rosales of Zulia state, claiming that he is in constant danger from opponents seeking to get rid of him.

"The plan didn't work out for them — God is always present over there. But those responsible left for Colombia, and by the way, they were from the Zulia police," he said.

He did not elaborate further on the alleged plot.

Chavez has made other claims of assassination plots in the past, including a case involving 27 Colombians and three former Venezuelan military officers who were convicted last October by a military court for allegedly plotting to kill him.

His government also demanded that Bogota investigate allegations that surfaced in an influential Colombian magazine in April saying the country's secret police plotted to assassinate Chavez and other top Venezuelan officials. Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has denied the allegations.

Chavez has also accused the U.S. government of secretly backing his opponents in the Dec. 3 elections and recently claimed that President Bush may be seeking to kill him after he called the U.S. leader "the devil" at the United Nations General Assembly.

"For sure, one walks around risking one's life ... We're being threatened with death by the (U.S.) empire," he said.

U.S.-Venezuela ties sharply deteriorated after the Bush administration swiftly recognized leaders who ousted Chavez in a 2002 coup before the Venezuelan returned to power amid a popular uprising.

Chavez has claimed before that the U.S. government is out to kill him and invade his country. U.S. officials deny that but criticize Chavez as a destabilizing force in Latin America.

Brazil Heads To Polls In Shadow Of Yet Another Scandal (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Sept. 30 — With yet another ethics and corruption scandal lapping at President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva's door, Brazilians will be asked to decide Sunday whether he is worthy of a second term.

A 60-year-old former factory worker and labor union leader, Mr. da Silva has been leading in polls and seems assured of finishing first by a comfortable margin in the initial round of balloting.

The drama surrounding Sunday's vote stems from uncertainty as to whether the president, made vulnerable by an unpleasant "September Surprise" involving some of his closest aides, will obtain the majority he needs to avoid a runoff.

A distant second in the polls is Geraldo Alckmin of the Brazilian Social Democratic Party, a 53-year-old doctor and former governor of Brazil's largest state, São Paulo.

Two other candidates — former allies of Mr. da Silva — are now positioned to his left: Heloísa Helena de Moraes of the Party of Socialism and Liberty and Cristovam Buarque of the Democratic Labor Party. A range of polls have consistently shown them with a total of about 10 percent of the vote.

At a news conference for foreign correspondents here on Tuesday, Mr. Alckmin acknowledged his underdog status but argued that a runoff would be inevitable because of growing voter disgust with the new scandal and what he called "the corrosion of the president's credibility."

"The second round is another election altogether," he said, in which Mr. da Silva's high "rejection index" will be a factor. "In the first round I vote for who I want, while in the second round I vote against who I don't want."

Elected four years ago on a clean government platform, Mr. da Silva has instead presided over corruption scandals from buying votes in Congress to kickbacks on ambulances and postal contracts. The scandals have prompted resignations of his chief of staff and finance minister and the Workers' Party president, treasurer and secretary general.

Still, until mid-September, Mr. da Silva seemed likely to cruise to a first-round victory.

But then operatives of the Workers' Party, which Mr. da Silva founded in 1980 and still leads, were caught trying to pay $792,000 in cash for a dossier they apparently thought would incriminate Mr. Alckmin's party in a corruption scandal. Up to now, that scandal, at the Health Ministry, has mainly involved Mr. da Silva's party. As a result, Mr. da Silva's campaign manager stepped down.

Mr. da Silva has been a presidential candidate in every popular election since a right-wing military dictatorship ended in 1985. Running initially on the hard left, he lost in 1989, 1994 and 1998, but then shifted toward the Social Democratic views of his opponents and won a landslide victory in a runoff in 2002, with more than 60 percent of the vote.

Nearly 126 million people are registered to vote here, the world's fourth-largest democracy. Voting is obligatory for all citizens between the ages of 18 and 70, but disillusionment and anger, especially among idealistic young voters, over corruption have led to concerns that some voters will cast blank or spoiled ballots — or even stay home, at the cost of a small fine.

Political analysts are unanimous in agreeing that Mr. da Silva wants at all costs to avoid a runoff, which would be held Oct. 29.

Each day the Brazilian press is full of new reports that incriminate his closest associates and let his rivals raise the question of the president's knowledge of or involvement in skullduggery that Marco Aurélio de Mello, the chief justice of the Electoral Tribunal, calls "worse than Watergate."

Mr. da Silva has responded by simultaneously accusing the opposition of seeking to achieve through undemocratic means what it cannot achieve at the ballot box and vaguely acknowledging that some of those around him are responsible for what he calls an "insane" act of "barbarism."

At a campaign rally this week, Mr. da Silva even compared himself to Jesus Christ, saying that he too has been betrayed by disciples.

The campaign highlight was to be a debate by the four candidates here on Thursday night. Hours beforehand, however, Mr. da Silva announced he would not participate, complaining to organizers in a letter that "some adversaries" intended to transform the discussion "into an arena of insults and aggressions, in a game with cards that are marked" against him, the incumbent.

But Mr. da Silva's absence did not prevent his rivals from addressing a chair with his name next to it. "If the accusations are proven, will you resign?" asked Mr. Buarque, the president's first minister of education. "Are your supporters voting for you or for your vice president?"

Brazil Leader Slips In Polls Before Vote (AP)

Brazil's first working-class president slipped in the polls on the eve of elections Sunday, indicating he may not win a convincing first-round victory but will instead be forced to campaign for another month amid spiraling corruption allegations against his party.

President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, a poor farmer's son who became a radical union leader and has governed as a centrist, was considered a shoo-in earlier this week. But fresh polls on Saturday night showed him in danger of failing to win 50 percent of the vote, which would trigger a second round of voting on Oct. 29. Silva, known to all as Lula, is still favored to win in the second round.

Silva stunned the world by stabilizing the economy and bringing millions out of poverty without raising taxes as Brazil's first elected leftist leader. But the latest polls suggested a corruption scandal surrounding his party, which has erupted in the last few weeks, may be taking its toll on his popularity.

But Both the Ibope and the Datafolha polling institutes said Saturday night that Silva's lead decreased enough in recent days to raise the possibility of a runoff. Silva would get 49 percent of the valid votes, according to Ibope, while Datafolha said Silva would get 50 percent. Earlier this week, another poll showed Silva with 59 percent.

Ibope interviewed nearly 3,000 people in 200 cities Friday and Saturday. Datafolha surveyed more than 14,500 people in nearly 400 cities on the same days. Both polls had a margin of error of 2 percentage points.

The results came after Silva skipped a presidential debate Thursday that opened him up to criticism from his opponents.

Six members of Silva's Workers' Party, including an old friend who ran his personal security detail, face federal arrest warrants for their alleged roles in an effort to buy damaging information about political opponents.

Silva has not been directly implicated, but allegations are swirling that the Workers' Party tried to pay $770,000 for a dossier linking Sao Paulo gubernatorial candidate Jose Serra to graft when he was health minister between 1998 and 2002.

Accusations of political dirty tricks and illegal campaign spending forced Silva to fire his campaign manager days before the election.

Silva had no weekend campaign events planned before he votes Sunday in the Sao Paulo suburb where he gained fame leading strikes against Brazil's dictatorship in the 1970s and 1980s.

Media coverage, meanwhile, shifted to fears that all 155 people may have died aboard a passenger jet that crashed Friday in the Amazon jungle. Rescuers reached the remote site Saturday.

For the United States, Silva's re-election would be a mixed blessing.

He proclaims himself a friend of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and helped sink the U.S.-sponsored Free Trade Area of the Americas in a protest over lavish U.S. farm subsidies. At the U.N. General Assembly last month, Silva blasted the U.S.-led Iraq war, saying the money should be used to alleviate global poverty.

But unlike Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, who used the assembly podium to call President Bush "the devil," Silva refrained from mentioning the United States or Bush by name.

Washington also wouldn't mind another four years of Silva because he is widely seen as a soothing influence on a continent where far-left sentiment is on the rise, said Michael Shifter, an analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue think tank.

"If Lula is a leftist, he is a leftist Washington can happily live with and even bolster," Shifter said.

On his first full day in office in January 2003, Silva had breakfast with Chavez and dinner with Castro, creating what Chavez termed the "axis of good" — a play on Bush's reference to North Korea, Iran and prewar Iraq as the "axis of evil."

But Silva has managed to distance himself sufficiently from the two to allay fears of radical change. His campaign has positioned him in the center against Geraldo Alckmin on his right — a business-friendly former Sao Paulo governor with poll numbers in the low 30s — and far-left candidate Sen. Heloisa Helena, who is expected to get less than 10 percent.

Alckmin attacked Silva over the corruption scandal in a last-minute Rio de Janeiro campaign stop Saturday, saying voters should choose him to rid Brazil of "this plague of corruption, and to have a government that works."

Despite the scandal, Silva remains popular because in the four years since he was elected in a landslide, life has certainly improved for the majority — more jobs, lower inflation and bigger benefits for the poor.

Silva's campaign theme — that he has proven he can reduce poverty — resonates from the urban slums of Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro to Brazil's impoverished northeast, where Silva was born.

"Zero Hunger," his expanded food stamp-like program, guarantees about $30 a month to virtually all poor families provided they vaccinate their children and keep them in school. It distributes $325 million a month to about a quarter of Brazil's 187 million people.

"He has done an excellent job in controlling inflation and improving the lives of the poor," said Anselmo de Souza, a 63-year-old retired metal worker in the Sao Paulo suburb where Silva rose through the union ranks. "I think the accusations that he is corrupt are lies made up by his enemies."

Alckmin says Silva has stifled growth with the high interest rates he deployed against inflation, and he uses the scandal to taunt the president's Workers' Party for having claimed to be the most ethical in Brazilian history.

Marisela dos Santos voted for Silva four years ago and feels betrayed.

"He may have improved the lives of the poor and stabilized the economy but his government is as infected with corruption as all the others," said the 32-year-old dental assistant. But she doubted anyone else would do better and remained undecided about her vote.

Silva's second-term priorities include reforming the tax and labor rules. But he'll likely be in defensive mode for months as election authorities investigate whether he had a role in the dirty tricks scandal and a center-right coalition led by Alckmin's party could end up controlling the Senate, where 27 of 81 seats are being contested.

Brazilians also are electing all 513 deputies in the House and all of their state governors.

Support From Brazil's Poor Gives Lula Edge In Election (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

SAO PAULO, Brazil, Sept. 30 -- The dividing lines that will determine Brazil's presidential election on Sunday are extraordinarily clear, as plainly visible as the swinging doors that separate a restaurant's dining room from its kitchen.

At a buffet lunch in a middle-class neighborhood, almost all of the cooks who ride buses for hours every day to toil in a steamy kitchen said they will vote to reelect President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva. On the other side of the doors, almost all of the diners said they planned to vote against him.

Lula is expected to coast to victory for this reason: In Latin America's largest democracy, a lot more people live like the cooks than live like the customers.

Although Lula always has portrayed himself as a champion of the downtrodden, the nature of his electoral support this year is different from what it was four years ago. Then, backing among more than 50 percent of middle-class voters was the key that allowed the longtime labor union leader to become president. That support has plummeted to about 35 percent this year, while backing among those earning less than $340 per month -- a minority of whom voted for Lula the first time around -- has soared to almost 60 percent.

Lula won in 2002 during a second-round runoff. He could avoid a late-October runoff this time by getting a majority of the vote Sunday. This week's opinion polls showed Lula favored by just over 50 percent, and his closest challenger -- former Sao Paulo state governor Geraldo Alckmin -- with around 30 percent.

Thanks in large part to minimum-wage hikes and an increase in social programs providing cash to poor families who agree to keep their children in school, the poor have seen their spending power rise by about 28 percent. The Brazilian currency, the real, has gained 60 percent on the dollar since Lula has been president, which has helped keep prices down. The proportion of the population living in poverty has fallen from about 24 percent to about 18.5 percent over the past four years.

"For 12 years, my husband and I have been trying to rebuild our house, and this month we were able to finish because now we can afford cement," said Marlene Silva, 34, who scrubbed chrome counter tops in the kitchen. Helio Helene, a 53-year-old man sweeping the floor nearby, added: "My family used to eat the cheap brands of rice because a package of the good quality rice used to cost 18 reals [about $8.60]. Now the same rice costs 10 reals, so we eat the good brands."

The middle and upper classes don't have stories that are rooted so strongly in everyday life. They talk about double-digit interest rates and a reluctance by Lula to tackle overdue reforms in the banking sector and the social security system. If the economy doesn't grow faster than its current annual pace of about 3.5 percent, they argue, social programs will collapse and leave everyone -- including the poor -- worse off than before.

"Lula is a good agitator, but he's not a good administrator," said Marcelo Naumann Boufleur, 28, one of the restaurant's diners, who works for a video production company. "Interest rates are so high that people are starting to lose jobs -- there's no investment because of that."

When Lula was elected, some financial analysts feared he might promote populist economic policies that would destabilize financial markets, but he earned early praise for reducing foreign borrowing, amassing foreign reserves and retaining a relatively strict fiscal policy. Now some economists say he hasn't done enough.

"Brazil's economic growth is not as much as the world average, and as a developing country it needs to be much higher," said Aloisio Pessoa de AraÃºjo, an economist with the Getulio Vargas Foundation in Rio de Janeiro. "We need to do more to diminish the informal sector of the economy, to regulate less and lighten the tax burden on key sectors."

The middle and upper classes -- as well as the newspapers and magazines that they read -- have paid close attention to a series of corruption scandals that have implicated Lula's administration in recent months. On Saturday, the front pages of the country's largest newspapers featured photos of stacks of cash allegedly paid by a Lula campaign aide for a dossier containing damaging information about Lula's political rivals. It follows allegations of vote-buying in the National Congress last year among members of Lula's party, which prompted some of the president's closest advisers to resign or be fired.

Lula's campaign on Saturday said the publication of the photos was another example of foul play by the media. Throughout the campaign, Lula has declined interviews, contending that most journalists are biased against him. Pundits and those who listen to them might disdain the president, one campaign aide said, but Lula doesn't need them to win.

"You don't know what a burden it is to govern a country with a small group -- the elite -- that is so full of prejudice as the one here," Lula told his supporters during a campaign-closing rally Thursday in a suburb of Sao Paulo.

But the polls suggest the criticisms haven't stuck to him, particularly among those who have benefited from his social programs. For the 70 percent of the population with less than eight years of schooling, the social programs speak louder than the media, according to political analysts.

"Being a government considered more daring in the social field seems to have built a barrier that protects Lula from the corruption allegations," said Francisco Fonseco, a Sao Paulo-based political scientist who published a book last year criticizing the Brazilian media for advancing a non-representative political viewpoint. "Whoever reads only the mainstream media, especially the large newspapers and magazines, tends to have a relatively distorted vision of the political process."

But Claudia Ramos said that from her viewpoint -- that of a 41-year-old secretary with two daughters and a husband who is a lawyer -- the country under Lula has entered a crisis of conscience because of the corruption that has touched the president's party.

"Economically, everything is the same for us, but the country has changed morally," she said, preparing for lunch at the restaurant with her family, who live in the wealthy neighborhood of Campo Belo in Sao Paulo. "I am ashamed of the political situation here."

She added that her daughters' school held a mock election in which Alckmin won handily. But her 6-year-old daughter interrupted to say she had met someone at the school who supported Lula.

"The cleaning lady," she said.

Somali Shopkeepers' Lives Shattered by Violent Attacks

MASIPHUMELELE, South Africa -- The mob announced itself the night of Aug. 28 with a terrifying clatter of stones against the tin walls of Hadith Haji Adam Osman's tiny shop. As he cowered inside, watching one window and then the other shatter from the onslaught, Osman recalled, the young men waved machetes in the air and shouted: "Baraka hamba! Baraka hamba!"

In the slang of this township on the rocky, ragged foothills of Cape Town, "Baraka" is the word for Somali shopkeepers such as Osman, 26, who have traveled thousands of miles from their war-ravaged homeland in search of peace and prosperity in South Africa. And "hamba," a word from the dominant Xhosa language here, means "Go away!"

Looking back on that night, when dozens of Somali shopkeepers lost their homes, jobs and dreams for better futures, Osman counts himself fortunate just to be alive. In the past three months, community leaders say, 32 Somalis have been killed in attacks in townships as South African businessmen have violently defended their turf against the newcomers. The most recent death came Saturday in the township of Delft, also near Cape Town.

"When I see my fellow Somalians being killed, I also understand I am lucky to have survived," said Osman, a slender and short man with a wisp of hair on his chin and the thoughtful manner of a patient older brother.

The attacks on Somali immigrants have drawn attention to a vicious strain of xenophobia lurking in South Africa, a nation determined to portray itself as a model of harmonious diversity but tormented by some of the world's highest rates of violent crime.

The attacks are also a chilling reminder, South Africans say, of the violence that marked the final years of apartheid. Clashes in squalid townships such as this forced the government to abandon a decades-old racial order in 1994 but left the nation with a glut of cheap weapons and a legacy of brutality that lingers in the epidemic of rapes, murders and robberies.

Somalis say the recent attacks have convinced them that South Africa's townships are no safer than Mogadishu, the violent capital of a country so riven by power struggles that no government has controlled all of it since 1991.

"People are going back to Somalia now, no matter what's happening there," said Abdi Hakim, 35, whose grocery store in a township near Cape Town has been robbed twice this year. "If we're going to die, we're going to die there in our homeland."

Mohammed Abdullahi, 35, fled Somalia in 2003, leaving behind a wife and three children in Mogadishu. He eventually found his way to South Africa and opened a shop in Khayelitsha, among the largest and most dangerous of the townships near Cape Town.

On Monday, he said, six young men came to his shop shortly after dark. Without saying a word, one of the men shot Abdullahi in the right temple, leaving him for dead in a pool of his own blood but stealing nothing.

From his Cape Town hospital bed, where Abdullahi is recovering but is unlikely to see again, he struggled for breath in recounting the attack. As he raised his right hand in the shape of a pistol, he whispered, "I've been shot because I'm Somali."

The Somalis began arriving in Masiphumelele in 2002 with the opening of Baraka Cash Store, a modest grocery. "Baraka" means "blessing from God" in the guttural mother tongue of the Somalis, and as their numbers swelled the township's residents began calling them "Barakas."

The Somali shops did not look different from the ramshackle collection of hair salons, bars and vegetable stands that already lined the streets of Masiphumelele. But customers here, struggling for every penny despite being nestled in the mountains just a few miles away from South Africa's glitziest tourist spots, soon noticed that the Barakas sold their goods for less than the stores owned by South Africans. The Barakas also offered a warmer, more responsive brand of customer service, residents said.

The Somalis, mostly unmarried men in their twenties and thirties, worked all day, every day, then slept on cots in their shops at night. They also lent one another money, hired other Somalis as employees and developed strong ties with the region's distributors.

Rivals were not happy, and as more and more Barakas moved to Masiphumelele and opened shops -- the total reached 27 in a community of about 20,000 residents -- the township grew tense. There was a string of robberies. Some shops had their windows broken. One Somali shopkeeper said that every few weeks, a young tough would walk into his shop and say, "Tomorrow I am going to kill you."

On the night of Aug. 24, a group of the township's South African businessmen gathered in a community hall to vent their frustrations. By the end of the meeting, they had agreed that rather than compete against the Somalis, they instead would chase them away, giving them three days to leave.

One of the men at the meeting later told police, "We should not be surprised if one of the Somali businessmen is killed," according to a police report. Another was quoted as saying that if the Somalis did not leave, "we are going to send our dogs."

The three days passed without incident. Then shortly after 8 p.m. on Aug. 28, a mob of more than 200 men and women formed as Somalis across Masiphumelele were closing their shops.

Throughout that night, the crowd moved from Somali-owned shop to Somali-owned shop, bashing in doors, ripping holes in walls, tearing off roofs. Inside, the shopkeepers grabbed machetes and prepared to die protecting their property, they said. But when they saw the sheer numbers of the approaching mob, most fled in terror instead. Some, like Osman, prayed that steel-gated doors would hold as they furiously punched the number of the police on their cellphones.

By the time a group of 10 officers arrived, the situation was out of control, said Capt. Roy Matthee, head of detectives at nearby Ocean View police station. The officers frantically tried to rescue the Somalis and fired rubber bullets to disperse the crowd.

Over the course of that night, 400 rubber rounds were expended, but the shops were thoroughly damaged and emptied out -- in some cases, only the concrete floors were left. But not a single Somali was killed.

Police arrested two men for the attacks of that night, and charges of intimidation were filed against seven of the businessmen who attended the meeting of Aug. 24. All are now free on bail, awaiting trial.

Most of the shopkeepers spent the next several weeks in churches, community halls and mosques. Many are now planning their return to Somalia, they say, ready to leave South Africa as soon as they can raise the money.

The businessman who led the meeting, Khaya Aubrey Cwayi, 32, said he was sorry about the attacks, which he blamed on others. He said the business community of Masiphumelele would not object to having some Somalis return as long as they did not drain too much of the profits of other stores.

"It would be fine if we could have five or seven shops of the Somalians. Not more," he said. "If they are all over the place, those existing businesses will never make any money."

Osman visited his old shop last week. The landlord had repaired the windows, and the hole in the wall where the mob had forced its way inside was closed up as well. As Osman looked at the gutted store, which was empty save for some broken eggs and plastic milk crates, several old customers begged him to return to Masiphumelele.

They missed his low prices, they said, and his smile.

"Please come back," said Matilda Badla, 23, who lived across the street from Osman's old shop. "This week."

Osman sadly shook his head. He had no money to restock. And where he once felt hope, he said, now there was only fear.

"They want me to be here," he said. "I also like them. But circumstances will not allow it."

Zambia: Unofficial Results Give Opposition The Lead (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

The tallying of Zambia's presidential election was held up after a ballot shortage delayed voting in some provinces, but the state-owned newspaper The Zambia Daily Mail, citing a survey of voters leaving polls, reported that Michael Sata, a populist former cabinet minister, held a commanding lead over the incumbent, Levy Mwanawasa. Mr. Sata was reported to have healthy leads in both Lusaka and the northern Copperbelt Province, the two most populous regions.

In China, Churches Challenge The Rules (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Bold Congregations Risk Official Wrath

WENZHOU, China -- A new breed of churches in this region of China has demonstrated a boldness and independence unmatched elsewhere in the country, despite strict government guidelines for places of worship.

Here in Wenzhou and the surrounding province of Zhejiang, just south of Shanghai, a growing number of congregations that began life as house churches -- unauthorized places of worship set up in private, often dilapidated homes -- have recently registered with the government, while continuing to spurn the rules of the official Protestant church in China. Like so many institutions in China, these churches now hover in a sort of legal netherworld.

The official church, known as the Three-Self Patriotic Movement, was founded in the 1950s to free religious Chinese from foreign funds and influence. Its name is derived from the principles of self-governance, self-support and self-propagation of the Gospel.

The fact that many Christians in this region have turned away from the official church's beliefs, analysts say, is a result of history and prosperity.

"Wenzhou's Christians have a lot of social connections, a lot of friends, they're very capable," said Chen Cun-fu, director of the Institute of Christianity and Cross-Cultural Studies at Zhejiang University in Hangzhou. "They're smart, they know how to do things. They're young, they have money, they have their own cars and cellphones."

Meanwhile, a growing number of college students, lawyers, businessmen and preachers educated abroad are also joining illegal house churches.

According to the rules of China's official church, midweek services are forbidden, as is proselytizing outside of church. But the rules are often bent, depending on the relationship between local officials and church leaders, and some independent-minded churches refuse to attend official meetings or pay official fees.

The well-worn Bailouxia church, tucked away down a small lane in this prosperous city, began as an illegal house church. But the church registered with the local religious authorities, and now displays a cross outside the building.

On a recent day, four elderly parishioners stretched out in varnished wooden pews, napping under ceiling fans. In a back row, a toddler fussed as a woman plucked the eyebrows of another worshiper using a thread.

"God's temple is desolate," sang a preacher at an electric keyboard, leading about 60 people in a hymn. "Where is the watchman? The wall is collapsed and everybody is only taking care of themselves."Clash Over a Building

Nothing illustrated the boldness of Zhejiang's Christians more clearly than the hasty building of an illegal house church this summer in a suburb of Hangzhou, the provincial capital. When local officials demolished the church, a massive riot ensued, with 3,000 protesters facing off against thousands of uniformed riot police, security guards and plainclothes police.

It was the most dramatic example in a series of arrests, raids and demolitions of churches considered illegal by the authorities. Some observers said the riot was only the latest chapter in a long-running battle between authorities and the more outspoken of China's growing population of 45 million to 65 million Christians. Other activists said it represented a stepped-up persecution of unregistered congregations.

The 85-year-old church, in the suburban district of Xiaoshan, had its own building before government officials turned it into a hospital many years ago. Since then, members had haggled with officials for compensation and a new location, most recently rejecting a government-approved spot beside a noisy highway.

"Xiaoshan people have the tradition of family or house gatherings and they're rich, so they want more freedom," said Chen. "It's hard for the government to regulate them and tell them where to build their church."

Tired of delays, church members decided in July they couldn't wait any longer. Hundreds gathered in Xiaoshan's Cheluwan village to build the church by hand. They began on a Monday, one group encircling the site to serve as protection with a second group working in rotation through the night. Some volunteers cooked while others stood above one another on metal scaffolding, handing up bricks, sand, cement, shovels and rope.

By Saturday morning they needed only to lay the roof. But on the afternoon of July 29, authorities sent several hundred trucks, four bulldozers, and thousands of riot police, security officers and non-uniformed guards to the scene. Police used bullhorns to order everyone to disperse.

"Stop all illegal activity," the police demanded, as bystanders used their cellphones to photograph their arrival. "Nobody should obstruct state officials who are executing their public function. Nobody should make up facts, spread rumors or disturb social order."

A riot broke out as church members tried to stop the demolition. More than 50 people were detained and many were beaten, said an attorney for the detained, who interviewed and photographed the injured. Six church leaders remain under arrest for instigating violence and interfering with the law. Prosecutors will decide whether to formally charge them this month.

The head of the village, who said his surname was Wang, insisted there had been no injuries and complained that the church was unregistered and illegal.

"They're absolutely lawless. They consider God to be the most powerful authority and ignore the law," Wang said in a telephone interview.

Official state media reported only that an illegal building had been dismantled, but news of the riot, arrests and beatings spread quickly among Christians.

"This would only happen in Zhejiang. In other provinces, Christians wouldn't dare to build a church this way," said a preacher in a registered Three-Self church in Hangzhou that has several thousand worshipers. He asked not to be named because religion is such a sensitive topic.

"The authorities pay no attention to what you preach, so long as you don't talk about political issues," the preacher said. "The law in China is very fluid. They can regulate but people sometimes do what they want."

In Xiaoshan, however, residents now live in fear. There is an ongoing investigation into who leaked news of the riot to foreign media. One villager said police have been waiting outside the homes of active Christians and posing as journalists.

"You can't speak loudly or talk to outsiders or strangers. There are plainclothes police paying close attention to the houses where Christians live," he said. "They stop people on the street, and in the middle of the night. They ask where the leaders have gone."'It's Just a Name'

Hu Qianjie, the 32-year-old owner of a Wenzhou welding factory, is one of the growing number of independent-minded preachers at registered churches in China. The son of peddlers, he grew up in poverty and remembers Christians coming to help pray for a sick younger brother.

"I was so confused about what I was taught in school -- that socialism was good, everybody was equal, no job was better than another," he said of the search that led him to convert to Christianity when he was 17. Today, despite the fact that he leads a congregation affiliated with the official church, he makes his own views known.

"We look like we might be under the umbrella of the Three-Self church but actually it's just a name, like a sign hanging in front of your house," he said. "I don't just explain the Bible to my followers, I link it to the current situation of society."

Hu rejects the formulaic nature of official Three-Self sermons that stick strictly to the Gospel. And he is critical of early Communist Party attacks on any Western ideology, arguing that Christian cultures are better at absorbing useful lessons from other societies. "Chinese culture just expels everything that doesn't fit with its own culture," he said.

By making the church relevant to the lives of young Christians, Hu also hopes it will fill a void because the government is unable to provide moral leadership.

"We don't talk publicly about sensitive, political issues," he said. "We focus more on abortion, divorce, extramarital affairs. The Communist Party has no more standard for that, no more restrictions on that."

Zheng Datong, a Wenzhou preacher who gives sermons in both registered and unregistered churches, said churches in China are an important outlet for the middle class in Zhejiang province.

"I have many friends who are middle class and who own their own businesses," he said. "I can tell there is a need for them to do some soul-searching. People have everything now -- they have cars, they have houses -- but no peace."

Often Parched, India Struggles To Tap The Monsoon (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

SURAT, India — Early on a Monday morning during the August monsoon, after several days of torrential rains, the engineers in charge of a massive dam about 50 miles upstream from this diamond-polishing hub faced a harrowing crisis.

With water brimming well past the permitted levels at the 350-foot Ukai Dam, according to official records, and the skies showing no sign of relief, the engineers apparently threw open the reservoir's 21 sluice gates. Water then did what water does. It surged downriver, swallowing this city of three million people like a hungry beast. The diamond lanes of India became a warren of muck and ruin.

In less than three days, at least 120 people died. More than 4,000 animal carcasses were later hauled out of the mud. Two weeks after the floods, Surat's diamond-polishing factories were practically empty of workers, who had fled fearing disease. An industry group estimated the losses at $60 million.

Exactly what happened in Surat is still under investigation. But the deluge has drawn new attention to a puzzle that is crucial to securing India's future: how to harness and hold on to its rich but capricious rains.

The problem is a matter of bitter and enduring debate in this country — and the answer may hold a key to India's prosperity. Every year, India is crippled by floods in some areas, even as it is parched in blighted corners elsewhere.

India's average annual rainfall rate hovers at an abundant 46 inches, as much as Ireland's. Yet growing water scarcity threatens both farms and cities. With the population hitting 1.1 billion, the amount of water available to each Indian is roughly the same as the amount available to the average Sudanese, according to the Food and Agriculture Organization.

India's rains tend to come in short, furious bursts, meaning that much of that water escapes as untapped potential, washing into the sea and wreaking havoc on the fragile villages and flourishing cities that stand in its way.

India is likely to become even more vulnerable, environmentalists warn. Global climate change threatens to make weather patterns even more erratic. Steadily shrinking Himalayan glaciers will inexorably melt and rush down the flood plains.

Floods in India are already a perennial and costly affair, especially in human terms. The southwest monsoon killed 2,545 people in less than four months this year, according to the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Part of the problem lies in India's rapid and unruly development. As water demand has soared, the natural sponges of Indian cities — lakes, ponds, marshes, mangroves — have been lost to construction. Only a handful of city and state governments have lately begun to mandate rainwater harvesting to slowly replenish groundwater.

Moreover, the country faces a water storage crunch. Traditional small-scale Indian storage systems, from temple tanks to elaborate step-wells, have fallen into disrepair. China, a country with similar development issues, manages to store five times the water that India does per person, the World Bank estimates. But the Chinese government, with scant public debate, has moved thousands of people to make way for colossal water projects.

India, too, has tried. But here, in the world's largest democracy, the big-money water solution — the big dam — has been the subject of rancorous disputes. Some projects have met resistance for decades.

Proponents say India must build many more reservoirs to meet its growing water and energy needs. India's founding prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, under whose watch the Ukai Dam was built, called them "modern temples" of his newly sovereign nation. India has roughly 4,300 large dams, like the one east of Surat, and an additional 475 under construction.

Critics say that big dams have already proved too costly and too destructive, submerging villages and displacing people without adequate compensation.

They also argue that dams and irrigation canals, like so much Indian infrastructure, are so poorly maintained and managed that already they cannot hold all they are supposed to. According to government estimates, silt deposits make up 10 percent of total capacity. Because of declining rains, India today fills up its reservoirs two out of every three years.

When the Tapi River burst upon Surat on Aug. 7, its swollen waters broke through an already fragile concrete embankment near Abdul Bhai Patel's apartment.

Eventually, the rising waters reduced Mr. Patel's building to a pile of rubble and brick. His wife, Zulekha, was among nearly 40 people who were killed when the building collapsed.

"I screamed," Mr. Patel recalled several days later, as he picked solemnly through the rubble in search of his passport. "No one heard me. There was water all around." The river took away his only source of income, too — the auto-rickshaw that he plied on the streets of Surat.

Downstream, at the industrial park called Hazira, one of the country's largest natural gas plants was forced to shut down. Several petrochemical plants shut down as well. The floodwaters reached as high as 18 feet at Hazira.

Government engineers who manage dams, including the Ukai, have the unenviable task of balancing the competing Indian curses of drought and deluge.

In dry years, they must take measures to store as much water as possible in the reservoir. In wet years, they must guard against drowning those who live downstream.

Whether state officials at Ukai could have taken any steps to forestall the flooding remains uncertain. The officials plead silence, citing a judicial inquiry under way.

Their critics are not silent. They argue that it was reckless to wait so long to discharge so much water, knowing it could submerge the city in a matter of hours, and they have pounced on the drowning of Surat as a model of all that is wrong with the way India uses its reservoirs.

"I call it a management failure," said M. D. Desai, a retired state engineer who once worked at Ukai.

The reservoir was already well over 20 percent full by the time the rains began in July, critics note. Meteorological data forecasted heavy rains in early August. And dam officials should have known that a full moon, on Aug. 9, would bring high tides and further pinch the river's ability to drain into the sea. The Hazira industrial complex, built on the estuary, also compromises the river's ability to drain out.

Often, the wasted water is a double hit to development: Not only does it go unused, it destroys everything in its path, setting back both industry and infrastructure. In Surat, the outpouring of the Ukai Dam snapped electricity and phone lines, and suspended train service and commerce.

The Business Standard, an English-language daily, fumed in an editorial, under the headline "Man-Made Floods," a few days after the deluge.

"Releasing the water in a rush at the monsoon time means that the stored water has gone completely waste, as runoff," it read. "This is criminal profligacy with a scarce and precious resource."

Modern India, urban and rural, continues to live at the whim of the monsoon.

For two-thirds of India's farmers, who have no access to irrigation, a good monsoon is the difference between survival and penury. For fast-growing cities like this one, the monsoon lays bare the frailties of urban infrastructure.

This year, in the perennially drought-stricken agricultural region of Vidarbha, in central India, the monsoon was first tardy and then, unexpectedly furious. Those who had low-lying lands lost their crops entirely. In the western state of Rajasthan, a fluke downpour turned desert to lake.

In the cities, troubles like those in Surat are spread all around, at accumulating costs. Last year, one day's unusually heavy rains brought Mumbai, formerly Bombay and the country's financial capital, to a standstill.

Trains stopped in their tracks. Cars were submerged, sometimes with people inside. Shanties were washed away. All told, 400 people died in the flooding, and then, 60 more, as cholera and dengue fever festered in its waterlogged streets.

Civic scrutiny fell on years of neglect and bad planning: the narrow storm drains bursting with the city's waste; the slums sitting on the city's floodplains; and the sprawling complex of financial services buildings that has eaten up mangroves.

In Surat, prosperity and population growth brought a surge of new development on the river's edge. A city official acknowledged that expanding construction along the riverbank had made it impossible to put up flood walls in some places.

Any lessons will come too late for Tulsi Mistry, 14, and her family. Before dawn, on that fateful Monday in early August, when news of flooding first reached the Rivera Row Houses, they scrambled to higher ground.

From her perch on the roof, Tulsi watched as the river rose and devoured her city. A refrigerator and washing machine coursed down her street. A body floated in the park up the road.

Tulsi and her family ended up virtually stranded on their rooftop terrace for a week. They ate whatever was left in the pantry and shared with neighbors. They drank what was stored in the rooftop tank, forgoing a bath for seven days.

Burma Detains Two More Dissident Figures (WP/AP)

Associated Press

RANGOON, Burma, Sept. 30 -- Burma's military junta detained two former dissident leaders on Saturday as part of a renewed crackdown on pro-democracy activists that followed anniversary celebrations of Aung San Suu Kyi's political party.

Min Zeya, 45, and Pyone Cho, 40, were taken from their homes Saturday, a day after sending a letter to the ruling junta chairman inquiring about the status of three other activists detained Wednesday.

Their arrests brought to six the number of activists detained since Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy marked its 18th anniversary Wednesday.

Min Zeya and Pyone Cho were among the leaders of a nationwide uprising in Burma, also known as Myanmar, in 1988. The military crushed the uprising and seized power. Pyone Cho served nearly 14 years in prison and was released in 2003, while Min Zeya served eight years and was released in 1997.

On Wednesday, the military picked up Min Ko Naing, Ko Ko Gyi and Htay Kywe -- supporters of the detained pro-democracy leader Suu Kyi. The three have not been seen since.

They had helped lead pro-democracy demonstrations in 1988 and served sentences of at least a decade before being released with thousands of other prisoners in late 2004.

The U.S. Campaign for Burma, based in Washington, said a sixth activist -- Aye Myint -- had been arrested. This could not be immediately confirmed.

In 1990, the junta refused to hand over power when Suu Kyi's party won a landslide election victory. Suu Kyi, who received the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize, has spent nearly 11 of the last 17 years in detention, mostly under house arrest, despite worldwide calls to free her and hundreds of other political prisoners.

Canadian Overpass Falls; Deaths Feared (AP)

By Phil Couvrette

AP, October 1, 2006

An overpass near Montreal collapsed Saturday, crushing two cars whose occupants were feared dead, authorities said. At least five people were injured.

Drivers on Highway 19 slammed on their brakes and watched in horror as the overpass slowly collapsed, sending cars plunging and crushing at least two vehicles. Quebec provincial police did not confirm any deaths but spokeswoman Chantal Mackels said police believed it was unlikely that anyone in the two crushed cars survived.

"We watched the overpass slowly come down and two cars fell from it," witness Golda Simon told TVA network.

Manon Joly had just dropped her daughter off at dance school and was in her car about to drive onto Highway 19.

"I slowed down and then all of a sudden everything collapsed like a house of cards," she said. "There were three or four cars that plunged into the hole right in front of me."

Ambulances transported five people. Three were in critical condition including two suffering from head injuries.

Emergency workers had not yet reached people trapped under the wreckage, said Andre Champagne of ambulance service Urgence-Sante. The workers were trying to secure the site before attending to those trapped, he told The Associated Press.

"We know minutes are precious," Champagne said. "It takes a long time. These are heavy structures that have to be moved."

Mackels said three lanes of the overpass plus a pedestrian sidewalk collapsed onto Highway 19. She said four vehicles — a motorcycle, two cars and a minivan — were on the overpass at the time

The incident occurred before 1 p.m. One witness told TVA he noticed that the road sunk an inch or two when he traveled over the overpass minutes earlier and he called emergency dispatchers.

Jean-Nicolas Turcotte, who lives near the overpass, was woken up by the collapse.

"I was sleeping when the large crash woke me up. At first I thought it was an earthquake or an accident. I looked out the window and heard people screaming," Turcotte said. "And I saw large puffs of smoke rising."

Claude Canton was painting his house just off the highway when he heard a loud bang. He said he saw two cars that were stuck under rubble and one started to catch fire before police put it out with extinguishers.

Aerial helicopter shots showed two passenger cars and a van on their backs or on the sides over the wreckage of the collapsed overpass, blocking traffic for miles. Authorities closed the bridge further down connecting Laval with the island on Montreal.

The incident was similar to the 2000 collapse of an overpass, also on the island of Laval north of Montreal, which killed one and injured two.

A New African War Zone (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

PAOUA, Central African Republic

My aim in bringing Casey Parks, the winner of my contest for university students, to this war-torn land wasn't to have her held at gunpoint. That was quite an accident — both times.

My purpose was actually to emphasize the urgency of ending the genocide in Darfur before it destabilizes even more of Africa. The malignancy has already spread to Chad, and now it is beginning to destroy the Central African Republic as well.

Sudan has in effect invaded the Central African Republic with a proxy force of Chadians whom it armed and transported to a remote airstrip in Sudanese Antonov aircraft. Now those troops are living in caves in the northeast part of this country and recruiting local people to fight. When the dry season comes in another month or so, that force of 500 troops will presumably join a larger force of Sudanese puppets in trying to overthrow the government of Chad and perhaps of this country as well.

The north of the Central African Republic is now a war zone, with rival armed bands (some from the government) burning villages, kidnapping children, robbing travelers and killing people with impunity.

The country is already unstable for its own reasons, and its own government has much to answer for, but the Sudanese incursion and the small arms rippling out from Darfur have left this region in complete chaos. The violence has driven 100,000 villagers from their homes, and the U.N. calls it "the world's most neglected crisis."

Casey and I traveled here in a five-vehicle U.N. convoy, including two pickups full of well-armed soldiers. But the presence of soldiers discourages frank interviews with peasants who have been attacked by soldiers, so we twice left the escorts behind and drove through hard-hit villages.

After we had stopped at the eerily empty village of Bottolna and explored a bit, a man named Dominique Dondjoube crept out of a hiding place and told us that most of the villagers were hiding in the bush — where they were dying from bad water, malaria and malnutrition. "Just yesterday, three children died of malnutrition," he said. They were a 6-year-old boy, a 5-year-old girl, and a 3-month-old girl whose mother had no milk because of the lack of food.

In a hospital run by Doctors Without Borders, a French doctor was treating Arthur Demongoy, a 2-year-old suffering from severe malnutrition. Children like Arthur are heartbreakingly impassive; they are so starved that they never cry, for every calorie goes to keeping them alive.

"Everything was burned in our village, and all our money was taken, and that's why we have no food," explained his mother, Sylvie.

But while a handful of brave aid workers and Catholic missionaries, Europeans and Africans alike, work in this region, they have been shot at and robbed. At some point the danger could force them to pull out.

Indeed, as Casey and I drove on one isolated, rutted road that forced us to drive slowly, we encountered just the kind of menace that has terrorized local people and aid workers: Two men stepped out from the brush on the side of the road, waved rifles and ordered us to stop.

The bandits eventually let us go on, and we continued down the road to interview local people. But since there was only one road into the area, we had to go back the same way — and then were held up again, by the same two men.

That kind of random violence is incredibly infectious, and the legacy of Darfur may be that all of Chad and the Central African Republic will collapse into Somalia-style anarchy. In an interview with Casey and me, President François Bozize of the Central African Republic offered an excellent suggestion: With the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers to Darfur delayed indefinitely because of Sudan's defiance, post them in the meantime in Chad and the Central African Republic — while still pushing to get them into Darfur itself.

When President Bozize traveled to the U.S. this month for the U.N. General Assembly, the Bush administration made available a mere deputy assistant secretary of state to talk to him. That's ridiculous, sending a signal that we're not engaged in Darfur's regional crisis and don't care what Sudan does to this country.

If President Bush is serious about genocide, an immediate priority is to stop the cancer of Darfur from spreading further — which means working with France to shore up both Chad and the Central African Republic. (France has troops in both countries.) It also means putting U.N. peacekeepers in both places. Right now.

Don't Let The Andes Trade Pact Expire (LAT)

By Sergio Muñoz, Sergio Muñoz, A Former Times Editorial Writer, Is A Contributing Editor To The Paper, And His Weekly

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Free-trade program has benefited millions while promoting democracy in South America.

VICTORIA Salgado Chambi is a 30-year-old single mother who lives with her young children, Carlos and Ana, in a barrio in El Alto, Bolivia's third-largest city. She is one of tens of thousands of Bolivian artisans who owe their livelihoods to the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act, which the U.S. Congress first passed in 1991. The law allows about 5,600 Bolivian products — among them cut flowers, native fruits and vegetables, jewelry and traditional Indian clothing — to be sold duty-free in the United States.

Salgado, who learned the art of weaving from her Aymara Indian mother and grandmother, specializes in making alpaca coats, sweaters, bags and caps. Her clothing used to sell for less than $20 apiece in the local El Alto market. When the Andean trade law kicked in, an exporter urged Salgado to boost production, and after a local bank loaned her $10,000 to buy the necessary equipment, she hired three women as weavers. Business has been good, and she now employs 15 women. She gets $50 for every clothing item sold in the U.S. for $90.

But the trade program that has created an economic miracle in El Alto — 80,000 new jobs and roughy $250 million in annual income from sales in the U.S. — may lapse in December.

The original goal of the Andean trade act was to combat drug production and traffic in Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru by helping those countries create legitimate jobs, and it has largely worked. In 2001, Congress approved a five-year extension of the program, assuming that by 2006, all four countries would have negotiated free-trade agreements with the United States.

None have, although Peru and Colombia have signed deals that await congressional approval. Ecuador and the U.S. stopped talking free trade a few months ago. And Bolivia is not even on the table.

Furthermore, Bolivian President Evo Morales' decision to nationalize the country's natural gas resources has only made things worse for Bolivia in the U.S. Congress, where many politicians have attacked his plan.

For Bolivia, the expiring trade act is crucial to its economic vitality. In recognition of that, the secretary general of the Organization of American States, Jose Miguel Insulza, has called for an extension of the program, as have all members of the group.

Even Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), whose free-trade voting record is mixed at best, has introduced a bill that would extend the trade provisions for Bolivia by two more years. But Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, opposes any extension because of Morales' move toward nationalization, even though no U.S. companies would be affected.

To end Salgado's and other Bolivian artisans' competitive advantage in the U.S. marketplace would be shortsighted and counterproductive, and it would border on the petty. For Latin Americans, it would be hard to understand why the world's richest country turned its back on the second-poorest in the hemisphere by ending a trade program that benefits about 40% of El Alto's largely impoverished population and amounts to 65% of Bolivia's trade with us.

Washington has a broad interest in promoting democracy in the Andean region, where Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez is using his country's vast oil wealth to spread his "Bolivarian Revolution." With indigenous movements in Ecuador and Bolivia gaining strength, fighting in Colombia continuing and dissatisfaction with the market economy festering in Peru, it would be foolish for Washington to give Chavez more ammunition by denying poor Bolivian Indians access to the U.S. market. Extending the trade program not only would help solve Bolivia's enormous problems but would serve to restore regional trust in the U.S. commitment to democracy.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Secret Reports Dispute White House Optimism (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

On May 22, 2006, President Bush spoke in Chicago and gave a characteristically upbeat forecast: "Years from now, people will look back on the formation of a unity government in Iraq as a decisive moment in the story of liberty, a moment when freedom gained a firm foothold in the Middle East and the forces of terror began their long retreat."

Two days later, the intelligence division of the Joint Chiefs of Staff circulated a secret intelligence assessment to the White House that contradicted the president's forecast.

Instead of a "long retreat," the report forecast a more violent 2007: "Insurgents and terrorists retain the resources and capabilities to sustain and even increase current level of violence through the next year."

A graph included in the assessment measured attacks from May 2003 to May 2006. It showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces and Iraqi authorities was as high as it had ever been -- exceeding 3,500 a month. [In July the number would be over 4,500.] The assessment also included a pessimistic report on crude oil production, the delivery of electricity and political progress.

On May 26, the Pentagon released an unclassified report to Congress, required by law, that contradicted the Joint Chiefs' secret assessment. The public report sent to Congress said the "appeal and motivation for continued violent action will begin to wane in early 2007."

There was a vast difference between what the White House and Pentagon knew about the situation in Iraq and what they were saying publicly. But the discrepancy was not surprising. In memos, reports and internal debates, high-level officials of the Bush administration have voiced their concern about the United States' ability to bring peace and stability to Iraq since early in the occupation.

[The release last week of portions of a National Intelligence Estimate concluding that the war in Iraq has become a primary recruitment vehicle for terrorists -- following a series of upbeat speeches by the president -- presented a similar contrast.]

On June 18, 2003, Jay Garner went to see Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to report on his brief tenure in Iraq as head of the postwar planning office. Throughout the invasion and the early days of the war, Garner, a retired Army lieutenant general, had struggled just to get his team into Iraq. Two days after he arrived, Rumsfeld called to tell him that L. Paul "Jerry" Bremer, a 61-year-old terrorism expert and protege of Henry A. Kissinger, would be coming over as the presidential envoy, effectively replacing Garner.

"We've made three tragic decisions," Garner told Rumsfeld.

"Really?" Rumsfeld asked.

"Three terrible mistakes," Garner said.

He cited the first two orders Bremer signed when he arrived, the first one banning as many as 50,000 members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government jobs and the second disbanding the Iraqi military. Now there were hundreds of thousands of disorganized, unemployed, armed Iraqis running around.

Third, Garner said, Bremer had summarily dismissed an interim Iraqi leadership group that had been eager to help the United States administer the country in the short term. "Jerry Bremer can't be the face of the government to the Iraqi people. You've got to have an Iraqi face for the Iraqi people."

Garner made his final point: "There's still time to rectify this. There's still time to turn it around."

Rumsfeld looked at Garner for a moment with his take-no-prisoners gaze. "Well," he said, "I don't think there is anything we can do, because we are where we are."

He thinks I've lost it, Garner thought. He thinks I'm absolutely wrong. Garner didn't want it to sound like sour grapes, but facts were facts. "They're all reversible," Garner said again.

"We're not going to go back," Rumsfeld said emphatically.

Later that day, Garner went with Rumsfeld to the White House. But in a meeting with Bush, he made no mention of mistakes. Instead he regaled the president with stories from his time in Baghdad.

In an interview last December, I asked Garner if he had any regrets in not telling the president about his misgivings.

"You know, I don't know if I had that moment to live over again, I don't know if I'd do that or not. But if I had done that -- and quite frankly, I mean, I wouldn't have had a problem doing that -- but in my thinking, the door's closed. I mean, there's nothing I can do to open this door again. And I think if I had said that to the president in front of Cheney and Condoleezza Rice and Rumsfeld in there, the president would have looked at them and they would have rolled their eyes back and he would have thought, 'Boy, I wonder why we didn't get rid of this guy sooner?' "

"They didn't see it coming," Garner added. "As the troops said, they drank the Kool-Aid."What's the Strategy?

In the fall of 2003 and the winter of 2004, officials of the National Security Council became increasingly concerned about the ability of the U.S. military to counter the growing insurgency in Iraq.

Returning from a visit to Iraq, Robert D. Blackwill, the NSC's top official for Iraq, was deeply disturbed by what he considered the inadequate number of troops on the ground there. He told Rice and Stephen J. Hadley, her deputy, that the NSC needed to do a military review.

"If we have a military strategy, I can't identify it," Hadley said. "I don't know what's worse -- that they have one and won't tell us or that they don't have one."

Rice had made it clear that her authority did not extend to Rumsfeld or the military, so Blackwill never forced the issue with her. Still, he wondered why the president never challenged the military. Why didn't he say to Gen. John P. Abizaid at the end of one of his secure video briefings, "John, let's have another of these on Thursday and what I really want from you is please explain to me, let's take an hour and a half, your military strategy for victory."

After Bush's reelection, Hadley replaced Rice as national security adviser. He made an assessment of the problems from the first term.

"I give us a B-minus for policy development," he told a colleague on Feb. 5, 2005, "and a D-minus for policy execution."

Rice, for her part, hired Philip D. Zelikow, an old friend, and sent him immediately to Iraq. She needed ground truth, a full, detailed report from someone she trusted. Zelikow had a license to go anywhere and ask any question.

On Feb. 10, 2005, two weeks after Rice became secretary of state, Zelikow presented her with a 15-page, single-spaced secret memo. "At this point Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change," Zelikow wrote.

The insurgency was "being contained militarily," but it was "quite active," leaving Iraqi civilians feeling "very insecure," Zelikow said.

U.S. officials seemed locked down in the fortified Green Zone. "Mobility of coalition officials is extremely limited, and productive government activity is constrained."

Zelikow criticized the Baghdad-centered effort, noting that "the war can certainly be lost in Baghdad, but the war can only be won in the cities and provinces outside Baghdad."

In sum, he said, the United States' effort suffered because it lacked an articulated, comprehensive, unified policy.Lessons From Kissinger

A powerful, largely invisible influence on Bush's Iraq policy was former secretary of state Kissinger.

"Of the outside people that I talk to in this job," Vice President Cheney told me in the summer of 2005, "I probably talk to Henry Kissinger more than I talk to anybody else. He just comes by and, I guess at least once a month, Scooter [his then-chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby] and I sit down with him."

The president also met privately with Kissinger every couple of months, making him the most regular and frequent outside adviser to Bush on foreign affairs.

Kissinger sensed wobbliness everywhere on Iraq, and he increasingly saw it through the prism of the Vietnam War. For Kissinger, the overriding lesson of Vietnam is to stick it out.

In his writing, speeches and private comments, Kissinger claimed that the United States had essentially won the war in 1972, only to lose it because of the weakened resolve of the public and Congress.

In a column in The Washington Post on Aug. 12, 2005, titled "Lessons for an Exit Strategy," Kissinger wrote, "Victory over the insurgency is the only meaningful exit strategy."

He delivered the same message directly to Bush, Cheney and Hadley at the White House.

Victory had to be the goal, he told all. Don't let it happen again. Don't give an inch, or else the media, the Congress and the American culture of avoiding hardship will walk you back.

He also said that the eventual outcome in Iraq was more important than Vietnam had been. A radical Islamic or Taliban-style government in Iraq would be a model that could challenge the internal stability of the key countries in the Middle East and elsewhere.

Kissinger told Rice that in Vietnam they didn't have the time, focus, energy or support at home to get the politics in place. That's why it had collapsed like a house of cards. He urged that the Bush administration get the politics right, both in Iraq and on the home front. Partially withdrawing troops had its own dangers. Even entertaining the idea of withdrawing any troops could create momentum for an exit that was less than victory.

In a meeting with presidential speechwriter Michael Gerson in early September 2005, Kissinger was more explicit: Bush needed to resist the pressure to withdraw American troops. He repeated his axiom that the only meaningful exit strategy was victory.

"The president can't be talking about troop reductions as a centerpiece," Kissinger said. "You may want to reduce troops," but troop reduction should not be the objective. "This is not where you put the emphasis."

To emphasize his point, he gave Gerson a copy of a memo he had written to President Richard M. Nixon, dated Sept. 10, 1969.

"Withdrawal of U.S. troops will become like salted peanuts to the American public; the more U.S. troops come home, the more will be demanded," he wrote.

The policy of "Vietnamization," turning the fight over to the South Vietnamese military, Kissinger wrote, might increase pressure to end the war because the American public wanted a quick resolution. Troop withdrawals would only encourage the enemy. "It will become harder and harder to maintain the morale of those who remain, not to speak of their mothers."

Two months after Gerson's meeting, the administration issued a 35-page "National Strategy for Victory in Iraq." It was right out of the Kissinger playbook. The only meaningful exit strategy would be victory.Echoes of Vietnam

Vietnam was also on the minds of some old Army buddies of Gen. Abizaid, the Centcom commander. They were worried that Iraq was slowly turning into Vietnam -- either it would wind down prematurely or become a war that was not winnable.

Some of them, including retired Gen. Wayne A. Downing and James V. Kimsey, a founder of America Online, visited Abizaid in 2005 at his headquarters in Doha, Qatar, and then in Iraq.

Abizaid held to the position that the war was now about the Iraqis. They had to win it now. The U.S. military had done all it could. It was critical, he argued, that they lower the American troop presence. It was still the face of an occupation, with American forces patrolling, kicking down doors and looking at the Iraqi women, which infuriated the Iraqi men.

"We've got to get the [expletive] out," he said.

Abizaid's old friends were worried sick that another Vietnam or anything that looked like Vietnam would be the end of the volunteer army. What's the strategy for winning? they pressed him.

"That's not my job," Abizaid said.

No, it is part of your job, they insisted.

No, Abizaid said. Articulating strategy belonged to others.

Who?

"The president and Condi Rice, because Rumsfeld doesn't have any credibility anymore," he said.

This March, Abizaid was in Washington to testify before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He painted a careful but upbeat picture of the situation in Iraq.

Afterward, he went over to see Rep. John P. Murtha in the Rayburn House Office Building. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, had introduced a resolution in Congress calling for American troops in Iraq to be "redeployed" -- the military term for returning troops overseas to their home bases -- "at the earliest practicable date."

"The war in Iraq is not going as advertised," Murtha had said. "It is a flawed policy wrapped in illusion."

Now, sitting at the round dark-wood table in the congressman's office, Abizaid, the one uniformed military commander who had been intimately involved in Iraq from the beginning and who was still at it, indicated he wanted to speak frankly. According to Murtha, Abizaid raised his hand for emphasis, held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, "We're that far apart."Frustration and a Resignation

That same month, White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. prepared to leave the administration after submitting his resignation to Bush. He felt a sense of relief mixed with the knowledge that he was leaving unfinished business.

"It's Iraq, Iraq, Iraq," Card had told his replacement, Joshua B. Bolten. "Then comes the economy."

One of Card's great worries was that Iraq would be compared to Vietnam. In March, there were 58,249 names on the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington. One of Kissinger's private criticisms of Bush was that he had no mechanism in place, or even an inclination, to consider the downsides of impending decisions. Alternative courses of action were rarely considered.

As best as Card could remember, there had been some informal, blue-sky discussions at times along the lines of "What could we do differently?" But there had been no formal sessions to consider alternatives to staying in Iraq. To his knowledge there were no anguished memos bearing the names of Cheney, Rice, Hadley, Rumsfeld, the CIA, Card himself or anyone else saying "Let's examine alternatives," as had surfaced after the Vietnam era.

Card put it on the generals in the Pentagon and Iraq. If they had come forward and said to the president, "It's not worth it," or, "The mission can't be accomplished," Card was certain, the president would have said "I'm not going to ask another kid to sacrifice for it."

Card was enough of a realist to see that there were two negative aspects to Bush's public persona that had come to define his presidency: incompetence and arrogance. Card did not believe that Bush was incompetent, and so he had to face the possibility that, as Bush's chief of staff, he might have been the incompetent one. In addition, he did not think the president was arrogant.

But the marketing of Bush had come across as arrogant. Maybe it was unfair in Card's opinion, but there it was.

He was leaving. And the man he considered most responsible for the postwar troubles, the one who should have gone, Rumsfeld, was staying.

Bill Murphy Jr. and Christine Parthemore contributed to this report.

'State Of Denial' (NSWK)

By Bob Woodward, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 1, 2006

It was Bush's decision. But Rumsfeld drove the dynamic on Iraq. How the SecDef blew it. An exclusive excerpt.

A movie of the George W. Bush presidency might open in the Oval Office on January 26, 2001, when Donald H. Rumsfeld was sworn in as defense secretary. A White House photographer captured the scene. Rumsfeld wears a pin-stripe suit, and rests his left hand on a Bible held by Joyce, his wife of 46 years. His right hand is raised. Bush stands almost at attention, his head forward, his eyes cocked sharply leftward, looking intently at Rumsfeld. Vice President Dick Cheney stands slightly off to the side, his trademark half smile on his face. It is a cold, dry day, and the barren branches of the trees outside can be seen through the Oval Office windows.

Back in the days of the Ford presidency, in the wake of Watergate—the pardon of Nixon, the fall of Saigon—Cheney and Rumsfeld had worked almost daily in the same Oval Office where they once again stood. The new man in the photo, Bush, five years younger than Cheney and nearly 14 years younger than Rumsfeld, had been a student at Harvard Business School. He came to the presidency with less experience and time in government than any incoming president since Woodrow Wilson in 1913.

Well into his seventh decade, many of Rumsfeld's peers and friends had retired, but he now stood eagerly on the cusp, ready to run the race again. He resembled John le Carre's fictional Cold War British intelligence chief, George Smiley, a man who "had been given, in late age, a chance to return to the rained-out contests of his life and play them after all."

"Get it right this time," Cheney told Rumsfeld.

In his first Pentagon tour, as Ford's secretary of defense from 1975-1977, Rumsfeld had acquired a disdain for large parts of the system he was to oversee once again. He had found the Pentagon and the vast U.S. military complex unmanageable. One night at a dinner at my house a dozen years after he had left the Pentagon the first time, he said that being secretary was "like having an electric appliance in one hand and the plug in the other and you are running around trying to find a place to put it in." It was an image that stuck with me—Rumsfeld charging around the Pentagon E-ring, the Man with the Appliance, seeking an elusive electrical socket, trying to make things work and feeling unplugged by the generals and admirals.

"After two months on the job, it is clear that the Defense establishment is tangled in its anchor chain," Rumsfeld dictated in a four-page memo on March 21, 2001, two months into his second tour. He was already frustrated. Congress required hundreds of reports. It seemed there might be more auditors, investigators, testing groups and monitors looking over their shoulders than there were "front-line troops with weapons."

"The maze of constraints on the Department force it to operate in a manner that is so slow, so ponderous and so inefficient that whatever it ultimately does will inevitably be a decade or so late."

This "Anchor Chain" memo, which Rumsfeld revised and added to, became notorious among Rumsfeld's staff as they watched and tried to help him define the universe of his problems. It sounded like he had almost given up fixing the Pentagon during the George W. Bush presidency. The task was so hard and would take so long, he dictated in a later version, that "our job, therefore, is to work together to sharpen the sword that the next president will wield."

"I'm the secretary of defense," Rumsfeld insisted repeatedly in his first months in 2001. "I'm in the chain of command." He—not the generals, not the Joint Chiefs of Staff—would deal with the White House and the president on operational matters. Rumsfeld micromanaged daily Pentagon life and rode roughshod over people. In one public confrontation at a hearing with Senator Susan Collins, the earnest Maine Republican, Rumsfeld had put her down in a manner that was stunning even for him. Collins's voice had quivered at one point. Later, Powell A. Moore, Rumsfeld's assistant secretary of defense for legislative affairs, suggested that he call her, try to smooth things over.

"Hell," Rumsfeld said, "she needs to apologize to me."

On one occasion, he led a delegation from Congress to the funeral in Columbia, South Carolina, for Representative Floyd Spence, a Republican who had been a pro-Pentagon hawk for three decades. Moore had arranged the seating on Rumsfeld's plane the way everything was done in Congress, by seniority.

"I don't want this," Rumsfeld declared, and personally re-arranged the seating—putting Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who would soon become the House Armed Services Committee chairman, in the back.

On January 20, 2003, President Bush signed a secret National Security Presidential Directive, NSPD-24. The subject: setting up an "Iraq Postwar Planning Office" within the Defense Department for the expected invasion of Iraq. Rumsfeld picked Jay Garner, a 64-year-old retired three-star general and defense industry executive to head the postwar office. Six weeks later, Garner went to the White House, mid-morning on Friday, February 28, 2003, to meet President Bush for the first time. In the Situation Room, Garner passed around copies of his handout, an 11-point presentation, and dove right in. He said four of the nine tasks his small team was supposed to be in charge of in Iraq under Bush's NSPD-24 were plainly beyond their capabilities, including dismantling weapons of mass destruction, defeating terrorists, reshaping the Iraqi military and reshaping the other internal Iraqi security institutions.

The president nodded. No one else intervened, though Garner had just told them he couldn't be responsible for crucial postwar tasks—the ones that had the most to do with the stated reasons for going to war in the first place—because his team couldn't do them.

The import of what he had said seemed to sail over everyone's heads.

Garner next described how he intended to divide the country into regional groups, and moved on to the interagency plans.

"Just a minute," the president interrupted. "Where are you from?"

"Florida, sir."

"Why do you talk like that?" he asked, apparently trying to place Garner's accent.

"Because I was born and raised on a ranch in Florida. My daddy was a rancher."

"You're in," the first rancher said approvingly. His brother Jeb was governor of the state, and the president visited regularly.

One of Garner's talking points was, "Postwar use of Iraqi Regular Army." He said, "We're going to use the army. We need to use them. They have the proper skill sets."

How many from the army? someone asked.

"I'm going to give you a big range," Garner answered. "It'll be between 200,000 and 300,000."

Garner looked around the room. All the heads were bobbing north to south. Nobody challenged. Nobody had any questions about this plan.

"Thank you very much," Bush said when Garner was done. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice started talking about something else, so Garner figured he was dismissed. As he started to walk out of the room, the president caught his eye.

"Kick ass, Jay," Bush said.

Garner waited for Rumsfeld outside. Soon, Bush and Rice came out and walked three or four steps past Garner. Suddenly Bush turned back.

"Hey, if you have any problem with that governor down in Florida, just let me know," he said.

Shortly after the invasion, while Garner was in Kuwait waiting to move into Iraq, Rumsfeld chose L. Paul "Jerry" Bremer, a 61-year-old terrorism expert and protégé of Henry Kissinger, to effectively replace Garner, but as a presidential envoy. On Garner's first day in Iraq, April 22, he signed on to an agreement to set up an interim Iraqi advisory group, made up of prominent Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis, many of them expatriates, to put an Iraqi face on the postwar occupation government. Two days later, Rumsfeld called to tell him Bremer was coming over, and said he wanted Garner to stay on as well.

"It doesn't work that way," Garner said. "You can't have the guy who used to be in charge and the guy who's now in charge there, because you divide the loyalties of the people. So the best thing for me is just to step out of here."

Rumsfeld convinced Garner to stay temporarily, and the retired general and Bremer clashed, as Bremer quickly unveiled a plan to ban as many as 50,000 members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government employment.

"Hell," Garner told him, "you won't be able to run anything if you go this deep."

The next day, Bremer revealed a second draft order, disbanding the Iraqi ministries of Defense and Interior, the entire Iraqi military, and all of Saddam's bodyguard and special paramilitary organizations. Garner was stunned. The de-Baathification order was dumb, but this was a disaster.

"We have always made plans to bring the army back," he insisted. This new plan was just coming out of the blue, subverting months of work.

"Well, the plans have changed," Bremer replied.

Bremer then met with the Iraqi advisory group Garner had agreed to work with. "One thing you need to realize is you're not the government," he told them. "We are. And we're in charge."

The next day, the group went home.

Garner came back to the U.S. in June and basically hid out for a couple of weeks, not wanting to see anyone at the Pentagon or talk about his experience in Iraq. Finally, on June 18, 2003, alone with Rumsfeld around the small table in the secretary's office, Garner felt he had an obligation to state the depths of his concerns.

"We've made three tragic decisions," Garner said.

"Really?" Rumsfeld said.

"Three terrible mistakes," Garner said. He cited the extent of the de-Baathification, getting rid of the army, and summarily dumping the Iraqi leadership group. Disbanding the military had been the biggest mistake. Now there were hundreds of thousands of disorganized, unemployed, armed Iraqis running around. Garner made his final point: "There's still time to rectify this. There's still time to turn it around."

Rumsfeld looked at Garner for a moment with his take-no-prisoners gaze. "Well," he said, "I don't think there is anything we can do, because we are where we are."

Rumsfeld and Garner went to the White House to see Bush. It was Garner's second time with the president. "Mr. President, let me tell you a couple of stories," Garner said. Describing meetings with Iraqis, Garner painted a positive picture. "I'd get ready to leave," Garner said, "and this is true—as I leave they're all thumbs-up and they'd say, 'God bless Mr. George Bush and Mr. Tony Blair. Thank you for taking away Saddam Hussein.' That was in 70 meetings. That always was the final response."

"Oh, that's good," Bush said.

On the way out, Bush slapped Garner on the back. "Hey Jay, you want to do Iran?"

"Sir, the boys and I talked about that and we want to hold out for Cuba. We think the rum and the cigars are a little better … The women are prettier."

Bush laughed. "You got it. You got Cuba."

Of course with all the stories, jocularity, buddy-buddy talk, bluster and confidence in the Oval Office, Garner had left out the headline. He had not mentioned the problems he saw, or even hinted at them. He did not tell Bush about the three tragic mistakes. Once again the aura of the presidency had shut out the most important news—the bad news.

It was only one example of a visitor to the Oval Office not telling the president the whole story or the truth. Likewise, in these moments where Bush had someone from the field there in the chair beside him, he did not press, did not try to open the door himself and ask what the visitor had seen and thought. The whole atmosphere too often resembled a royal court, with Cheney and Rice in attendance, some upbeat stories, exaggerated good news, and a good time had by all.

Soon Rumsfeld was distancing himself from Bremer, who, on paper, was to report to the president through the secretary of defense. Rumsfeld later confirmed to me in an interview that he felt that Bremer had only "technically but not really" reported to him.

"He didn't call home much," Rumsfeld said of Bremer.

Rumsfeld also stepped away from the hunt for Saddam's alleged WMD. CIA Director George Tenet proposed to Rumsfeld that the person in charge of the WMD hunt report to both of them.

"Absolutely not," Rumsfeld said.

After Bush's re-election in November 2004, the biggest question mark at the White House was Rumsfeld. Should he stay? White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. had to approach the issue with delicacy. The biggest voice for change was outgoing Secretary of State Colin Powell. In one conversation, Powell had told Card, "If I go, Don should go." Bush had decided to replace Powell with Rice, but it was unclear who he wanted at Defense.

Card got out his "hit-by-the-bus" book, an 8½-by-11-inch spiral notebook, a half-inch thick with a blue cover. On separate pages he had lists of possible replacements for all the major administration posts, including his own. The names were listed in no particular order. Card kept the notebook in his desk at the White House and periodically added or deleted names. He had intentionally used a student notebook, something he had bought himself, so it wouldn't be considered a government document or a presidential record that might someday be opened to history. It was private and personal.

His list of 11 possible Rumsfeld replacements included Senator Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who had been Al Gore's running mate in 2000, and Republican Arizona Senator John McCain.

But Card had what he thought was a great idea—a sleeper candidate. The best replacement for Rumsfeld would be James A. Baker III. "Everyone would say, 'Phew,'" Card said. "No learning curve. Great. Interesting." Baker was 74, only two years older than Rumsfeld. He had served in the Marine Corps. He had been the best modern White House chief of staff, Card thought. He had successfully handled the 2000 Florida recount for Bush. Mr. President, this is my quiet counsel, Card said. Put a diplomat in the Defense Department.

The president seemed genuinely intrigued. You don't have to rush to make a decision, Card advised. But the president would not even authorize Card to send out feelers or to enter into any discussion with Baker.

Card spoke with Rumsfeld, who talked as if he presumed there would be no change. Rumsfeld wanted to stay.

Soon Karl Rove weighed in. A contentious session with Congress was coming up. As he saw it, the Democrats were in no mood for a honeymoon. With Rice's confirmation hearing and with the expected nomination of White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales as attorney general, would another Senate confirmation overload the system? And, clearly, the conduct of the war in Iraq would be the subject of confirmation hearings for anyone Bush nominated to be the new secretary of defense.

Rove agreed they did not want to do anything that would prompt hearings on the war. Jesus, no.

In mid-December the president made his final decision. Rumsfeld would stay, he indicated to Cheney and Card. He couldn't change Rumsfeld.

"That didn't mean he didn't want to," Card later said.

Card tried to have a private, candid session with First Lady Laura Bush about every six weeks to hear her concerns. He set aside an hour and a half for each meeting. Sometimes it took 30 minutes, sometimes the full hour and one half and on occasion two hours.

The first lady was distressed about the war, worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband, and her perspective seemed to reflect Rice's concern about Rumsfeld's over-bearing style and tendency to dominate. Card knew that the first lady and Rice often took long walks together on the Camp David weekends.

"I agree with you," Card said. On one level he was trying to educate and explain, but he was also lobbying. So he outlined his problems with Rumsfeld and how he believed it was time for a change. He said, however, so far his advice on the Rumsfeld situation had been considered and rejected.

"He's happy with this," the first lady said, "but I'm not." Another time she said, "I don't know why he's not upset with this."

As the new secretary of state, Rice hired Philip Zelikow, an old friend, as the counselor to the State Department, a powerful but little known top post that would leave him free to undertake special assignments for her, and quickly dispatched him and a small team to Iraq. On February 10, Rice's 14th day as secretary, Zelikow presented her with a 15-page, single-spaced memo classified SECRET/NODIS, meaning "no distribution" to anyone else. "At this point Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change," Rice read. This was a shocking notion—"a failed state," after two years, thousands of lives, and hundreds of billions of dollars.

In midsummer 2005, General Jim Jones, the NATO commander, paid a call on his old friend General Pete Pace, the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs. It was virtually certain that Pace was going to move up to become chairman, the number one military position.

The two Marine generals had been friends for more than three decades. They had been in Vietnam at about the same time, a searing and formative experience for both, and then served side-by-side as first lieutenants in 1970 at the Marine barracks in southeast Washington.

Jones expressed chagrin that Pace would even want to be chairman. "You're going to face a debacle and be part of the debacle in Iraq," he said. U.S. prestige was at a 50- or 75-year low in the world. He said he was so worried about Iraq and the way Rumsfeld ran things that he wondered if he himself should not resign in protest. "How do you have the stomach for eight years in the Pentagon?" he finally asked.

Pace said that someone had to be chairman. Who else would do it?

Jones did not have an answer. "Military advice is being influenced on a political level," he said. The JCS had improperly "surrendered" to Rumsfeld. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder."

His concern was complete. When Senators John Warner and Carl Levin, the chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, visited him at his headquarters in Belgium, Jones told them about all the problems. He said they needed new legislationto re-empower the service chiefs or make some kind of sense of the crazy system.

"The Joint Chiefs have been systematically emasculated by Rumsfeld," Jones said.

Pace soon became chairman. In an interview, he flatly denied that Jones had told him that Iraq was a debacle or that Rumsfeld had systematically emasculated the Joint Chiefs. "He's a good friend. He was in my wedding," Pace said, noting they had known each other for 36 years. "If Jim felt that way he would tell me."

I called Jones at NATO headquarters in Belgium. He said that he had made all those comments to Pace in their meeting in 2005. "That's what I told him," Jones said.

In March 2006, Rumsfeld invited six of the Pentagon's regular outside advisers in to be briefed and ask questions. One was Ken Adelman, a longtime Rumsfeld friend and vehement early supporter of the war who had become entirely disillusioned over the administration's handling of the postwar. His relationship with Rumsfeld was almost over.

"What metrics would you use for success in Iraq?" Adelman asked Rumsfeld. "You know, for winning the war?"

"Oh, there are hundreds," Rumsfeld replied. "It's just so complicated that there are hundreds."

"Wait a minute," Adelman insisted. "A former boss of mine always said identify three or four things, then always ask about, get measurements and you'll get progress or else you'll never get any progress." The former boss was Rumsfeld himself, who had driven the point home to Adelman 35 years ago, when he worked for Rumsfeld at the Office of Economic Opportunity. What are they? Adelman insisted.

Rumsfeld said it was so complicated that he could not give a list. "Hundreds," he insisted.

Adelman believed that meant there was a total lack of accountability. If Rumsfeld didn't agree to any criteria, he couldn't be said to have failed on any criteria.

"Then you don't have anything," Adelman said. He left as dis-turbed as ever. There was no accountability.

On March 16, General John Abizaid, the commander of CENTCOM and thus the top military officer for the Middle East, was in Washington to testify before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He painted a careful but upbeat picture of the situation in Iraq. Afterward, he went over to see Congressman John Murtha, the 73-year old former Marine who had introduced a resolution the previous November calling for the redeployment of troops from Iraq as soon as practicable. Sitting at the round, dark wood table in the congressman's office, Abizaid, the one uniformed military commander who had been intimately involved in Iraq from the beginning and who was still at it, indicated he wanted to speak frankly. According to Murtha, Abizaid raised his hand for emphasis and held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, "We're that far apart."

Rumsfeld circulated a six-page SECRET memo on May 1, proposing some fixes, entitled "Illustrative New 21st Century Institutions and Approaches."

It was almost the latest version of the "Anchor Chain" memos he had written in his first months as secretary in 2001—a cry from his bureaucratic and managerial heart. Not only was the Defense Department tangled in its anchor chain but so was the rest of the U.S. government, and the world.

He dictated, "The charge of incompetence against the U.S. government should be easy to rebut if the American people understand the extent to which the current system of government makes competence next to impossible."

On Wednesday, May 24, 2006, the intelligence division of the Joint Staff, the J-2, circulated an intelligence assessment, classified SECRET, that showed that the forces of terror in Iraq were not in retreat. It put hard numbers on trends that had been reported to Bush all year. Terrorist attacks had been steadily increasing. The insurgency was gaining. Attacks were now averaging 700 to 800 a week. Every IED that was discovered—whether it detonated and caused damage or casualties or was identified and disarmed before it could do any damage—was still counted as an attack. A graph measuring attacks from May 2003 to May 2006 showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks was as high as they had ever been—exceeding 3,500 a month.

I told Rumsfeld that I understood the number of attacks was going up.

"That's probably true," he said. "It is also probably true that our data's better, and we're categorizing more things as attacks. A random round can be an attack and all the way up to killing 50 people someplace. So you've got a whole fruit bowl of different things—a banana and an apple and an orange."

I was speechless. Even with the loosest and most careless use of language and analogy, I did not understand how the secretary of defense would compare insurgent attacks to a "fruit bowl," a metaphor that stripped them of all urgency and emotion. The official categories in the classified reports that Rumsfeld regularly received were the lethal IEDs, standoff attacks with mortars, and close-engagements such as ambushes—as far from bananas, apples and oranges as possible.

During one week in May 2006, enemy-initiated attacks soared to 900, a new record. In June, attacks went down to about 825 one week but then spiked up again. By July it was over 1,000 a week, again a new record. It was even worse considering the level of violence existed after two years spent training, equipping and funding 263,000 Iraqi soldiers and police. The cost had been $10 billion, and American teams had been embedded with most of the Iraqi units for over a year. At an equivalent time in 1971, after several years of Vietnamization, the trend lines of insurgent violence had been down, not up.

In July 2006, I interviewed Rumsfeld on two successive afternoons. I asked him about troop levels—a key issue and point of contention. The record showed that the plan for invading Iraq had a top number of 275,000 ground combat forces, including about 90,000 who were scheduled to flow into Iraq in the weeks and months after March 19, 2003, when the war began. Rumsfeld said it is one of the great "canards" that he had decided or unduly influenced the decision to not bring in the 90,000. It was all on General Franks's recommendation, he said. But by the summer of 2006, Rumsfeld had softened his position on the issue of whether there were enough troops. "It's entirely possible there were too many at some point and too few at some point, because no one's perfect," he said. "In retrospect I have not seen or heard anything from the other opiners that suggests to me that they have any reason to believe that they were right and we were wrong. Nor can I prove we were right and they were wrong. The only thing I can say is they seem to have a lot more certainty than my assessment of the facts would permit me to have."

Asked about the battle with the Iraq insurgency, he said, "It could take eight to 10 years. Insurgencies have a tendency to do that." Overall he said, "Our exit strategy is to have the Iraqis' government and security forces capable of managing a lower-level insurgency and ultimately achieving victory over it and repressing it over time. But it would be a period after we may very well not have large numbers of people there."

I said I understood that General George W. Casey Jr., the top commander of forces on the ground in Iraq, had reported that the insurgency had not been neutralized—key goal of his campaign plan—but only contained. After some typical verbal jousting, I was able to ask directly, "Do you agree it has not been neutralized?"

"Oh clearly not," Rumsfeld answered.

"Only contained?"

"Yeah," he said. "Thus far."

I then read from the May 24, 2006, assessment that said the "Sunni Arab insurgency is gaining strength and increasing capacity." I asked him, "Does that sound right to you?"

Here was one of the central questions in any war. Was the other side "gaining strength and increasing capacity?" General Casey the Joint Chiefs' intelligence staff, and the CIA had all categorically said the insurgency was gaining. Certainly Rumsfeld knew that. I had also quoted from the assessment on a list of 29 sample questions I had submitted in advance, and I know he had spent at least one hour the day before preparing for the interview.

"When was this?" Rumsfeld asked.

Six weeks ago, I answered. The question on the table was whether he agreed or not that the insurgency in the Iraq War was gaining. I was ready for a pure Rumsfeldian moment, and I was not disappointed.

"Gosh, I don't know," the secretary of defense replied. "I don't want to comment on it. I read so many of those intelligence reports"—I had never said it was an intelligence report—"and they are all over the lot. In a given day you can see one from one agency, and one from another agency, and then I'll ask Casey or Abizaid what they think about it, or Pete Pace, 'Is that your view?' And try and triangulate and see what people think. But it changes from month to month. I'm not going to go back and say I agree or don't agree with something like that."

He was right that there might be some changes month to month, but, as he knew, the overall assessment and trend was visibly, measurably and dramatically worse.

I asked Rumsfeld what was the best, most optimistic scenario for a positive outcome in Iraq.

"This business is ugly," he replied. "It's tough. There isn't any best. A long, hard slog, I think I wrote years ago. We're facing a set of challenges that are different than our country understands … They're different than our Congress understands. They're different than our government, much of our government, probably understands and is organized or trained or equipped to cope with and deal with. We're dealing with enemies that can turn inside our decision circles." The enemy can move swiftly, he said. "They don't have parliaments and bureaucracies and real estate to defend and interact with or deal with or cope with. They can do what they want. They aren't held accountable for lying or for killing innocent men, women and children.

"There's something about the body politic in the United States that they can accept the enemy killing innocent men, women and children and cutting off people's heads, but have zero tolerance for some soldier who does something he shouldn't do."

"Are you optimistic?" I asked.

Rumsfeld looked through me and continued. Three of his aides who were sitting with us at the table in his office could not help but register surprise as Rumsfeld plowed on without answering.

"We're fighting the first war in history in the new century," he continued, "and with all these new realities, with an industrial-age organization in an environment that has not adapted and adjusted, a public environment that has not adapted and adjusted."

At the end of the second of two interviews, I quoted former Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara: "Any military commander who is honest with you will say he's made mistakes that have cost lives."

"Um hmm," Rumsfeld said.

DOJ_NMG_0072443

"Is that correct?"

"I don't know. I suppose that a military commander..."

"Which you are," I interrupted.

"No I'm not," the secretary of defense said.

"Yes, sir," I said.

"No, no. Well … "

"Yes. Yes," I said, raising my hand in the air and ticking off the hierarchy. "It's commander in chief, secretary of defense, combatant commander."

"I can see a military commander in a uniform who is engaged in a conflict having to make decisions that result in people living or dying and that that would be a truth. And certainly if you go up the chain to the civilian side to the president and to me, you could by indirection, two or three steps removed, make the case."

Indirection? Two or three steps removed? It was inexplicable. Rumsfeld had spent so much time insisting on the chain of command. He was in control—not the Joint Chiefs, not the uniformed military, not the National Security Council or the NSC staff, not the critics or the opiners. How could he not see his role and responsibility?

I could think of nothing more to say.

Two Months Before 9/11, An Urgent Warning To Rice (WP)

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

On July 10, 2001, two months before the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, then-CIA Director George J. Tenet met with his counterterrorism chief, J. Cofer Black, at CIA headquarters to review the latest on Osama bin Laden and his al-Qaeda terrorist organization. Black laid out the case, consisting of communications intercepts and other top-secret intelligence showing the increasing likelihood that al-Qaeda would soon attack the United States. It was a mass of fragments and dots that nonetheless made a compelling case, so compelling to Tenet that he decided he and Black should go to the White House immediately.

Tenet called Condoleezza Rice, then national security adviser, from the car and said he needed to see her right away. There was no practical way she could refuse such a request from the CIA director.

For months, Tenet had been pressing Rice to set a clear counterterrorism policy, including specific presidential orders called "findings" that would give the CIA stronger authority to conduct covert action against bin Laden. Perhaps a dramatic appearance -- Black called it an "out of cycle" session, beyond Tenet's regular weekly meeting with Rice -- would get her attention.

Tenet had been losing sleep over the recent intelligence he'd seen. There was no conclusive, smoking-gun intelligence, but there was such a huge volume of data that an intelligence officer's instinct strongly suggested that something was coming. He and Black hoped to convey the depth of their anxiety and get Rice to kick-start the government into immediate action.

He did not know when, where or how, but Tenet felt there was too much noise in the intelligence systems. Two weeks earlier, he had told Richard A. Clarke, the National Security Council's counterterrorism director: "It's my sixth sense, but I feel it coming. This is going to be the big one."

But Tenet had been having difficulty getting traction on an immediate bin Laden action plan, in part because Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had questioned all the National Security Agency intercepts and other intelligence. Could all this be a grand deception? Rumsfeld had asked. Perhaps it was a plan to measure U.S. reactions and defenses.

Tenet had the NSA review all the intercepts, and the agency concluded they were of genuine al-Qaeda communications. On June 30, a top-secret senior executive intelligence brief contained an article headlined "Bin Laden Threats Are Real."

Tenet hoped his abrupt request for an immediate meeting would shake Rice. He and Black, a veteran covert operator, had two main points when they met with her. First, al-Qaeda was going to attack American interests, possibly in the United States itself. Black emphasized that this amounted to a strategic warning, meaning the problem was so serious that it required an overall plan and strategy. Second, this was a major foreign policy problem that needed to be addressed immediately. They needed to take action that moment -- covert, military, whatever -- to thwart bin Laden.

The United States had human and technical sources, and all the intelligence was consistent, the two men told Rice. Black acknowledged that some of it was uncertain "voodoo" but said it was often this voodoo that was the best indicator.

Tenet and Black felt they were not getting through to Rice. She was polite, but they felt the brush-off. President Bush had said he didn't want to swat at flies.

As they all knew, a coherent plan for covert action against bin Laden was in the pipeline, but it would take some time. In recent closed-door meetings the entire National Security Council apparatus had been considering action against bin Laden, including using a new secret weapon: the Predator unmanned aerial vehicle, or drone, that could fire Hellfire missiles to kill him or his lieutenants. It looked like a possible solution, but there was a raging debate between the CIA and the Pentagon about who would pay for it and who would have authority to shoot.

Besides, Rice seemed focused on other administration priorities, especially the ballistic missile defense system that Bush had campaigned on. She was in a different place.

Tenet left the meeting feeling frustrated. Though Rice had given them a fair hearing, no immediate action meant great risk. Black felt the decision to just keep planning was a sustained policy failure. Rice and the Bush team had been in hibernation too long. "Adults should not have a system like this," he said later.

The July 10 meeting between Tenet, Black and Rice went unmentioned in the various reports of investigations into the Sept. 11 attacks, but it stood out in the minds of Tenet and Black as the starkest warning they had given the White House on bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Though the investigators had access to all the paperwork on the meeting, Black felt there were things the commissions wanted to know about and things they didn't want to know about.

Philip D. Zelikow, the aggressive executive director of the Sept. 11 commission and a University of Virginia professor who had co-authored a book with Rice on Germany, knew something about the July 10 meeting, but it was not clear to him what immediate action really would have meant. In 2005 Rice hired Zelikow as a top aide at the State Department.

Afterward, Tenet looked back on the meeting with Rice as a tremendous lost opportunity to prevent or disrupt the Sept. 11 attacks. Rice could have gotten through to Bush on the threat, but she just didn't get it in time, Tenet thought. He felt that he had done his job and had been very direct about the threat, but that Rice had not moved quickly. He felt she was not organized and did not push people, as he tried to do at the CIA.

Black later said, "The only thing we didn't do was pull the trigger to the gun we were holding to her head."

Editor's Note: How much effort the Bush administration made in going after Osama bin Laden before the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, became an issue last week after former president Bill Clinton accused President Bush's "neocons" and other Republicans of ignoring bin Laden until the attacks. Rice responded in an interview that "what we did in the eight months was at least as aggressive as what the Clinton administration did in the preceding years."

Did I Say That? No, Not Really, Maybe, Sort Of (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

In Washington, there is no higher art form than the non-denial denial, in which politicians try to rebut a storyline without quite denying the specifics.

That is what is underway now with Bob Woodward's latest book, "State of Denial," an unflattering portrait of an administration riven by discord over the Iraq war.

Mr. Woodward's narrative is unsurprising to anyone who has closely followed the Bush administration: the first-term loyalty of aides devolved into infighting as soon as no weapons of mass destruction were found in Iraq. Then the intramural squabbling turned into public protestations of "if-only-they-had-listened-to-me."

For its part, the White House did deny that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld have a private war of their own underway. But what about another disclosure that Andrew H. Card, the former White House chief of staff, twice suggested booting Mr. Rumsfeld? Mr. Card, in an interview, acknowledged the recommendation but said it came in the context of broader discussions of cabinet changes.

And what about the officials in the Bush administration who were ignored when they called for an increase in the number of troops in Iraq? Among them were Robert D. Blackwill, the Iraq coordinator at the White House, and L. Paul Bremer III, the senior American overseeing the Iraq occupation. But none, said Tony Snow, the press secretary, were in the "chain of command," meaning that they were not generals asking for more troops.

Did Mr. Bush listen only to his generals? Of course not, said the White House.

So what happened to all those recommendations? No one is willing to say.

So You Call This Breaking News? (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

IF your head hurts from listening to the Washington furor over the latest National Intelligence Estimate, by all means tune it out. The entire debate is meaningless except as a damning election-year indicator of just how madly our leaders are fiddling while Iraq burns.

The supposedly shocking key finding in the N.I.E. — that the Iraq war is a boon to terrorism — isn't remotely news. It first turned up in a classified C.I.A. report leaked to the press in June 2005. It's also long been visible to the naked eye. The latest

New York Times/CBS News poll, conducted before any revelations from the N.I.E., found that nearly half the country believes that the Iraq war is increasing the terrorist threat against America and only 12 percent thinks the war is decreasing that threat. Americans don't have to pore over leaked intelligence documents to learn this. They just have to turn on the television.

Tonight on "60 Minutes," Bob Woodward will spill another supposedly shocking intelligence finding revealed in his new book: a secret government prediction that the insurgency will grow worse next year. Who'd have thunk it? Given that the insurgency is growing worse every day right now — last week suicide bombings hit a record high in Baghdad — the real surprise would be if the government predicted an armistice. A poll released last week by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland found that about 6 in 10 Iraqis approved of attacks on American forces. Tardy investigative reporting is hardly needed to figure out that the insurgency is thriving.

"The insurgents know what they are doing," Mr. Woodward is to say on CBS, according to an advance excerpt. "They know the level of violence and how effective they are. Who doesn't know? The American public." He accuses the administration of keeping such information out of sight by stamping it "secret." All this, too, apparently comes as eye-opening news to Mr. Woodward three and a half years into the war; his new book's title, "State of Denial," has a self-referential ring to it. But the American public does know the level of violence all too well, and it also knows how the administration tries to cover up its failures.

That's why long ago a majority of that public judged the war a mistake and Mr. Bush a dissembler. It's only the variations on the theme that change. When the president declared last month that "the Iraqi government and the Iraqi military is committed to keeping this country together," reality was once more busily contradicting him. The Los Angeles Times reported that a third of that government wasn't showing up to parliamentary sessions and that only 1,000 Iraqi soldiers answered the American call for 4,000 reinforcements in the do-or-die battle to secure Baghdad.

Against this ominous reality, the debate over the N.I.E. is but a sideshow: politics as usual on both sides. The president reluctantly declassified what had already been leaked, somehow hoping he could override the bad headlines with Pavlovian repetition of shopworn slogans. (He said America must "stay on the offense" four times in one speech on Friday alone.) Democrats are huffily demanding that the White House release more than a few scraps of the 30-page-plus N.I.E., a debating point with no payoff. The N.I.E. is already six months out of date, and Americans can guess most of it, classified or not. In this war at this late stage, the devil can be found everywhere, not merely in the details.

The facts of Iraq are not in dispute. But the truth is that facts don't matter anyway to this administration, and that's what makes this whole N.I.E. debate beside the point. From the start, honest information has never figured into the prosecution of this war. The White House doesn't care about intelligence, good or bad, classified or unclassified, because it believes it knows best, regardless of what anyone else has to say. The debate over the latest N.I.E. or any yet to leak will not alter that fundamental and self-destructive operating principle. That's the truly bad news.

This war has now gone on so long that we tend to forget the early history that foretold the present. Yet this is the history we must remember now more than ever, because it keeps repeating itself, with ever more tragic results. In the run-up to the war, it should be recalled, the administration did not even bother to commission an N.I.E., a summary of the latest findings from every American intelligence agency, on Iraq's weapons.

Why not? The answer can be found in what remains the most revealing Iraq war document leaked to date: the Downing Street memo of July 23, 2002, written eight months before the invasion. In that secret report to the Blair government, the head of British intelligence reported on a trip to Washington, where he learned that the Bush administration was fixing the "intelligence and facts" around the predetermined policy of going to war in Iraq. If we were going to fix the intelligence anyway, there was no need for an N.I.E., except as window dressing, since it might expose the thinness of the administration's case.

A prewar N.I.E. was hastily (and sloppily) assembled only because Congress demanded it. By the time it was delivered to the Capitol after much stalling, on Oct. 1, 2002, less than two weeks remained before the House and Senate would vote on the Iraq war resolution. "No more than six senators and only a handful of House members got beyond the five-page executive summary," according to an article last spring in Foreign Affairs by Paul Pillar, the C.I.A. senior analyst for the Middle East from 2000 to 2005. In a White House press briefing after the war started, an official said Condi Rice hadn't read it at all, leaving that menial duty to her retinue of "experts."

When one senator who did read the whole N.I.E., the now retired Democrat Bob Graham of Florida, asked that a declassified version be made public so that Americans could reach their own verdicts on the war's viability, he was rebuffed. Instead the administration released a glossy white paper that trumpeted the N.I.E.'s fictions ("All intelligence experts agree that Iraq is seeking nuclear weapons") but not its doubts about much-hyped evidence like aluminum tubes and uranium from Africa. The only time the president cared about the N.I.E., a document he never wanted, was when he thought it would be politically useful in fighting growing criticism in 2003 that he had manipulated prewar intelligence. Then he authorized his own cherry-picked leaks, which Scooter Libby fed to Mr. Woodward and Judith Miller of The Times. (Neither wrote about it at the time.)

As the insurgency continued to grow in the fall of 2003, the White House again showed scant interest in reality. The American military's Central Command called for an N.I.E. instead. The existence of this second N.I.E. was only discovered in February of this year by Warren Strobel and Jonathan Landay of Knight Ridder Newspapers. It found that the growing violence in Iraq was "fueled by local conditions — not foreign terrorists — and drew strength from deep grievances, including the presence of U.S. troops." Yet the president ignored that accurate intelligence, refusing to raise troop levels and continuing to argue erroneously that the insurgency was mainly linked to Saddam and Al Qaeda. Three years later, he still makes that case rather than acknowledge that our troops are caught in the cross-fire of a civil war.

Having ignored the facts through each avoidable disaster, the White House won't change its game plan now. Quite the contrary. Its main ambition seems to be to prop up its artificial reality no matter what the evidence to the contrary. Nowhere could this be better seen than in Ms. Rice's bizarre behavior after the Bill Clinton-Chris Wallace slapdown on Fox News. Stung by the former president's charge that the Bush administration did nothing about Al Qaeda in the eight months before 9/11, she couldn't resist telling The New York Post that his statement was "flatly false."

But proof of Ms. Rice's assertion is as nonexistent as Saddam's W.M.D. As 9/11 approached, both she and Mr. Bush blew off harbingers of the attacks (including a panicked C.I.A. briefer in Crawford, according to Ron Suskind's "One Percent Doctrine"). The 9/11 commission report, which Ms. Rice cited as a corroborating source for her claims to The Post, in reality "found no indication of any further discussion" about the Qaeda threat among the president and his top aides between the arrival of that fateful Aug. 6 brief ("Bin Laden Determined to Strike in U.S.") and Sept. 10.

That the secretary of state would rush to defend the indefensible shows where this administration's priorities are: it's now every man and woman in the White House for himself and herself in defending the fictions, even four-year-old fictions, that took us into the war and botched its execution. When they talk about staying the course, what they are really talking about is protecting their spin and their reputations. They'll leave it to the 140,000-plus American troops staying the course in a quagmire to face the facts.

Blinded By Hindsight (NYT)

By Richard A. Clarke

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

FIVE years after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, three years after the 9/11 commission report, and just weeks before a national election, the issues of what happened before those attacks have resurfaced. Suddenly, we are again witnessing heated disputes about such insignificant issues as whether the Clinton administration prepared a draft "strategy" or, alternatively, "a series of required decisions" about Al Qaeda for the incoming Bush administration.

This spectacle was set off by a partisan rewriting of history billed as a television docudrama and shown on the anniversary of the attack. Mr. Clinton, justifiably, denounced the untruths about his administration's record.

But the effect of his comments was to send the nation's attention in the wrong direction — toward an argument over the minutiae of what happened a decade ago rather than on an intelligent debate of what to do now. What followed was as predictable as it was unfortunate: talk shows, Web sites and others responded with a heated, partisan exchange of accusations of who did what when.

For most Americans the history is clear and well told in the 9/11 commission report: Almost 3,000 people were killed. In the years before that terrible day, the Clinton administration prevented some attacks and tried to destroy Al Qaeda and its leadership, but was unable to do so, in part because the institutional bureaucracy did not believe the magnitude of the threat.

As for the Bush administration, it deferred action on Al Qaeda until after 9/11, and then took a number of steps in response, including invading Iraq, but was also unable to destroy Al Qaeda or its leaders.

In short, both administrations failed.

All the finger-pointing and hunting for scapegoats last week won't rectify those failures, or help us avoid future ones. Fortunately, unlike too many of our political leaders and pundits, most Americans are far more concerned about what we are doing now in the name of fighting terrorism than about petty partisan bickering about the past.

The greatest problem we face is that while the 9/11 attacks should have united us as a nation — and for a while they did — such unity has badly eroded. To recreate that national purpose, we need to understand why the erosion occurred.

First and most obviously, the invasion and occupation of Iraq shattered the post-9/11 American consensus. The ham-handed attempts to erroneously link Iraq with the Qaeda attacks destroyed the government's credibility with much of the country. That needed trust was undermined further last week in a National Intelligence Estimate that showed that our soldiers' sacrifices have not weakened the terrorist movement.

A broad consensus in America on Iraq may now be impossible. President Bush could, however, move in that direction by admitting there is a serious problem with the current strategy and taking advice from a bipartisan group of respected experts to recommend a way forward that concentrates on protecting such basic national interests as preventing Iraq from continuing to be an anarchic failed state where terrorists can train. The Iraq Study Group, created at the urging of Congress in March and led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Representative Lee Hamilton, might perform that service.

A second erosive factor was what appeared to many as the administration's willingness to use 9/11 as an excuse to strengthen presidential power and erode fundamental American civil liberties. Particularly troublesome to me, as someone who was at the nexus of the government's intelligence networks for many years, was the National Security Agency's illegal wiretapping of phones in the United States without a warrant, and also the abandoning of our treaty obligations under the Geneva Conventions by engaging in "alternative interrogation techniques" at the C.I.A.'s secret prisons.

This is not to say our holdover intelligence rules are adequate. Congress refused to give the Clinton administration the broadened terrorism wiretapping and surveillance authority it sought, but is now swinging to the other extreme of being willing to do away with effective judicial supervision of surveillance in the United States. It should be possible to devise a system that permits needed surveillance of the vast traffic in voice and e-mail messages, but requires judicial involvement before information is disseminated and periodic Congressional oversight to prevent abuse.

Third, and perhaps most disruptive to national unity on terrorism, is a widespread sense that some in government have been waving the bloody shirt — scaring voters with the hobgoblin of Al Qaeda to reap political advantage.

If we are going to defeat the enemy, we must learn again to discuss our differences about Iraq and terrorism in civil and analytical terms. We must reject the use of fear and terrorism to divide America for political advantage. And we must not let ourselves get trapped in pointless, partisan debates that result only in having the past obscure the future.

Detainee Memo Created Divide In White House (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

In June 2005, two senior national security officials in the Bush administration came together to propose a sweeping new approach to the growing problems the United States was facing with the detention, interrogation and prosecution of terrorism suspects.

In a nine-page memorandum, the two officials, Gordon R. England, the acting deputy secretary of defense, and Philip D. Zelikow, the counselor of the State Department, urged the administration to seek Congressional approval for its detention policies.

They called for a return to the minimum standards of treatment in the Geneva Conventions and for eventually closing the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. The time had come, they said, for suspects in the 9/11 plot to be taken out of their secret prison cells and tried before military tribunals.

The recommendations of the paper, which has not previously been disclosed, included several of the major policy shifts that President Bush laid out in a White House address on Sept. 6, five officials who read the document said. But the memorandum's fate underscores the deep, long-running conflicts over detention policy that continued to divide the administration even as it pushed new legislation through Congress last week on the handling of terrorism suspects.

When the paper first circulated in the upper reaches of the administration, two of those officials said, it so angered Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld that his aides gathered up copies of the document and had at least some of them shredded.

"It was not in step with the secretary of defense or the president," said one Defense Department official who, like many others, would discuss the internal deliberations only on condition of anonymity. "It was clear that Rumsfeld was very unhappy."

The internal debate over detention issues that began within weeks after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, has come to light before. But interviews show that the struggle, pitting top officials against one another, intensified behind the scenes over the last year as criticism of the administration's approach grew in the United States and abroad. Crucial elements of that approach were struck down by the Supreme Court on June 29, forcing a resolution of disputes that had gone on for months.

On one side of the fight were officials, often led by Vice President Dick Cheney, who said the terrorism threat required that the president have wide power to decide who could be held and how they should be treated. On the other side were officials, primarily in the State Department and the Pentagon, who portrayed their disagreement as pragmatic. They said the administration had claimed more authority than it needed, drawing widespread criticism and challenges in the courts.

Those officials initially hailed the president's Sept. 6 announcement. Mr. Bush publicly discussed the Central Intelligence Agency's secret detention program for the first time, saying he had ordered its remaining 14 prisoners sent to Guantánamo and tried before military tribunals. The same day, Pentagon officials presented new directives that effectively renounced military use of highly coercive interrogation methods.

But even as the White House negotiated with Congress in recent weeks, administration forces led by the vice president's office reasserted themselves. Officials said Mr. Cheney's staff and its bureaucratic allies — having agreed reluctantly to the disclosure of the C.I.A. operation and other changes — were closely involved in guiding the talks with Republican senators. Their adversaries in the administration, meanwhile, had to scramble just to keep up with details of the bargaining.

"Basically, they were left to get back whatever they could from Congress," one senior administration official said of the Cheney group. "And they did."

In the end, the White House pressed Republican senators to accept a broad definition of "unlawful enemy combatants" whom the government can hold indefinitely, to maintain some of the president's control over C.I.A. interrogation methods and to allow the government to present some evidence in military tribunals that is based on hearsay or has been coerced from witnesses.

The administration did concede to the senators on some rules for military commissions, as the tribunals are called. It also backed off its effort to limit its obligations under the Geneva Conventions, but fought to ensure that government personnel would be immunized from prosecution for any treatment of detainees before the end of 2005 that was cruel, inhuman or degrading.

Still, several officials said privately that the detainee legislation might fail to meet a primary goal of those inside the administration who had advocated change: quelling domestic and international criticism and moving past the federal lawsuits that have tied up parts of the detention apparatus since 2002.

"There have been so many times when we thought we had broken through and turned things around, and then the forces on the other side kept charging back," said one administration lawyer who has supported such changes. Now, the official added, "even after what was supposed to be this major legislation to resolve these issues, we are going to be back at it."

At the time the England-Zelikow memorandum was written, in mid-June 2005, several officials said they saw little enthusiasm for reconsidering the detention system that had been set up after 9/11, primarily by a small group of lawyers in the White House, the Justice Department and the Defense Department.

That system had begun to come under increasing attack. An erroneous item in Newsweek magazine, about a Koran being flushed down a toilet at Guantánamo, led to violent demonstrations overseas. Criticism of the detention camp grew sharper in Europe. Some influential Republicans in Congress began to voice complaints as well.

Mr. Zelikow, who served as staff director for the national commission that investigated the 9/11 attacks, joined the State Department in early 2005 with strong views on the detention issue, other officials said. Early on, he began to push the idea that high-level C.I.A. captives held in connection with the 9/11 attacks should be brought to justice, these officials said.

Mr. England took over as Mr. Rumsfeld's acting deputy in April 2005 while continuing to serve as secretary of the Navy. (He was confirmed as deputy secretary in April 2006.) He, too, had experience with the detainee issue, having spent months working to overhaul what many military officers saw as a flawed screening process for prisoners at Guantánamo.

Two other officials who had worked extensively on detention issues during Mr. Bush's first term also participated in the drafting of the memorandum, officials said. One of them, Matthew C. Waxman, was Mr. Rumsfeld's chief aide for detainee issues. The other, John B. Bellinger III, was the State Department's legal counsel.

The proposals in the paper were not entirely new. But what was different, one administration official said, was an effort at "a big-bang solution," to persuade senior officials or the president himself to adopt a comprehensive new approach to the detention problems of the policy. Failing that, officials said, the authors hoped to foster new debate about how to shape a strategy that would be more sustainable diplomatically, politically and in the federal courts.

Three years after Mr. Bush had determined he would not apply the Geneva Conventions in fighting terrorists, the memorandum urged a return to the conventions' minimum standards, including the ban on "humiliating and degrading treatment" contained in the provision known as Common Article 3. The authors advocated that move not because they believed it was required by international law, officials said, but to win broader support from American allies and make court intervention less likely.

The paper did not advocate abandoning the covert interrogation program, but restricting it to the shorter-term questioning of more important suspects, officials said. After repatriating many of the Guantánamo detainees, the authors argued, the detention center could be shut down and the remaining prisoners transferred to a long-term detention facility in the United States. They did not specify what kind of facility it should be, two of the officials who read the paper said.

In a passage that underscored the views of Mr. Zelikow, one official said, the paper argued that efforts to bring to justice the perpetrators of the 9/11 attacks must produce more than the chaotic trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the French-born militant who remains the only person to have been charged in an American court with involvement in the attacks.

The paper specifically called for taking Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and others held by the C.I.A. before military commissions, officials said, arguing that much of the information that would be disclosed by their trials was already widely known.

Officials said the memorandum was well received by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who forwarded it to senior officials at the National Security Council. But the hope that it would lead to a broader discussion of options within the administration was quashed by Mr. Rumsfeld, they said.

Some of the defense secretary's ire over the paper appeared to be substantive, several Pentagon officials said. At various times, Mr. Rumsfeld raised objections to taking over responsibility for the C.I.A. detainees, and he was reluctant to consider closing Guantánamo without a viable alternative in sight, the officials said.

Most important, they said, Mr. Rumsfeld was angered that his new deputy, Mr. England, had worked on the memorandum with officials outside the Pentagon without his authorization. "England's wings got clipped after that," one Defense Department aide said.

A spokesman for the department, Col. Gary L. Keck, said it would not discuss its deliberations on detainee policy or any "predecisional documents." But he denied that Mr. Rumsfeld was ever angered by those deliberations or instructed anyone to destroy documents.

"This is a difficult and complex issue that has profound operational, diplomatic, legal and political implications not only for the Department of Defense, but for many other executive agencies," Colonel Keck said in a statement. "In any discussion on such an important topic there will be differences of opinion — this is to be expected."

In early August 2005, after a long internal debate, new rules for the Guantánamo military tribunals were published which did not include changes that many military lawyers had advocated. Officials said David S. Addington, who was then Mr. Cheney's counsel and is now his chief of staff, was prominent among those who opposed modifications like an explicit ban on evidence obtained by torture, contending that it would wrongly hint that the government had sanctioned torture at all.

At the Pentagon, Mr. England continued to pursue the idea of adopting Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions in a directive that would set guidelines for prisoner treatment and interrogations. In late August, he called a meeting with some of the vice chiefs of staff of the armed forces and senior uniformed and civilian lawyers to consider the matter.

According to officials who attended the meeting, several of those present spoke in favor of the Geneva provision, including the senior Army lawyer, Maj. Gen. Thomas J. Romig. In an unusual move, Mr. England called for a show of hands. All but two of those present endorsed the provision. But those two officials were among the most influential in the room: the department's under secretary for intelligence, Stephen A. Cambone, and its general counsel, William J. Haynes II.

Their concerns, which were later echoed by aides to Mr. Cheney, started with the fact that the president had explicitly rejected the Geneva standard in February 2002. They also disputed the idea that Article 3 would necessarily give clear guidance to soldiers, citing what they called its vague prohibition on "outrages upon personal dignity."

Debate over both the proposed prisoner-treatment directive and an Army field manual for interrogations would go on for another year. For the time being, though, the idea of adopting Common Article 3 directly as the standard of treatment went no further.

There was little high-level discussion of alternatives to Guantánamo, several officials said. But the C.I.A.'s secret prisons had been a subject of rising concern since at least 2004, when unease over the open-ended detentions became evident within the agency and the Supreme Court ruled that detainees held by the United States at Guantánamo — and, by implication, elsewhere around the world — could challenge their detention in American courts.

By late 2005, as reports in The Washington Post and other news media about the secret prisons raised a storm of complaints among foreign governments, the C.I.A. began to move more quickly to transfer some captives to the custody of their own and other foreign governments, officials familiar with the program said.

By the end of 2005, military lawyers also began to review the C.I.A.'s evidentiary files on the high-value detainees to consider their possible prosecution by the military commissions at Guantánamo. Ultimately, military officials concluded that they could make solid cases against the C.I.A. prisoners without unduly exposing the agency's covert program or even having to depend heavily on statements that had been obtained during highly coercive interrogations, several officials said.

There was also new pressure for action from within the C.I.A. Intelligence officers involved in detention and interrogations were increasingly worried about the legal implications of the program, officials said. Some foreign governments had declined to house covert detention centers, and the furor over those sites created friction with other intelligence agencies, the officials said.

Still, some senior figures in the administration, including Mr. Cheney and his chief of staff, Mr. Addington, remained unconvinced that the C.I.A. program could be made public and its prisoners taken before military commissions while continuing to protect what they saw as a vital intelligence asset, several officials said.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, Lea Anne McBride, said his office would have no comment on its role in policy deliberations, as did spokesmen for the State Department and the National Security Council.

"The problem fell for some period of time into the too-hard category," one senior administration official said. "It fell so far into the too-hard category that it was lost from view."

Interagency meetings on the detention issue with officials just below the cabinet level went around and around for months, officials said. In the late spring, they added, the president's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, began pushing senior officials to agree on options they could present to the president.

Many officials said the most important factor in forcing a new approach was the Supreme Court's ruling in June that the military commissions set up by the administration could not proceed. That decision, which also upheld the minimum Geneva standards of prisoner treatment as binding law, led the administration to seek Congressional authorization for new tribunals and, some officials said, left the C.I.A.'s interrogation program on even more tenuous ground.

In late July, two officials said, Mr. Rumsfeld and his aides dropped their longstanding concerns about taking custody of the C.I.A. detainees, and Mr. Hadley moved to approve the arrangements for their transfer to Guantánamo.

The two officials said that Mr. Cheney was never entirely persuaded of the wisdom of emptying the C.I.A.'s detention sites and making its interrogation program public, but supported the move when Mr. Bush decided in late August to go ahead.

"The vice president knows the president has made the right decisions to make Americans safer and support the men and women on the front lines in the war on terror who are fighting this brutal enemy," Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman, Ms. McBride, said.

The element of the new legislation that raised the sharpest criticism among legal scholars and human rights advocates last week was the scaling back of the habeas corpus right of terrorism suspects to challenge their detention in the federal courts. But in dozens of high-level meetings on detention policy, officials said, that provision was scarcely even discussed.

Profiles In Cowardice (WP)

On prisoner abuse and detention, President Bush finds enablers in both parties.

ONCE AGAIN, with a midterm election looming, President Bush stoked and won a major legislative confrontation over a complex national security question. Four years ago, it was the Iraq war resolution and reorganization of the government's homeland security functions. In both cases, hindsight suggests that haste and political pressure foreclosed the kind of nuanced debate that might have served the nation well. The same is likely to prove true of legislation passed last week on the treatment, detention and trial of enemy combatants.

But the artificial emergency Mr. Bush created has served his political purpose. His goal was to press opponents to cave to his will, against their better judgment, or to create an issue allowing his party to tar the opposition as soft on terrorism. In this case, thanks in part to the Democrats' weak-hearted abdication, he got both.

Congress had to act immediately, Mr. Bush insisted, or else terrorists could not face justice and the CIA could not interrogate the enemy. But the president says the CIA is not holding anyone, and the administration has dawdled for years without getting military trials off the ground. The only relevant deadline was Nov. 7.

Mr. Bush must bear responsibility for his cynical pursuit of the wrong answer, but he could not have prevailed without a lot of help. Republicans in both chambers, forgetting that Congress is supposed to be an independent branch, snapped to attention when the president told them what to do. At least some of them obviously knew better. Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) courageously championed an amendment to restore the judicial oversight that Mr. Bush opposed. When his amendment failed on a 51 to 48 vote, the senator said he would vote against the bill, calling it "patently unconstitutional on its face." Then he voted for it. The bill, he explained, had good points, and the courts "will clean it up."

Democrats hoped that they could duck behind Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and two other Republicans who for a time fought a lonely fight for a better bill. When the three renegades settled for very little, the Democrats were left exposed, and it wasn't pretty. Nearly all of them voted for Mr. Specter's amendment, yet 12 -- including Joe Lieberman (Conn.) and three other senators facing reelection -- voted for the bill afterward. The rest contented themselves by voting no but did not lift a finger to slow it down or stop it.

"By allowing this administration to further stretch the definition of what is and is not torture," Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) said, "we lower our moral standards to those whom we despise, undermine the values of our flag wherever it flies, put our troops in danger and jeopardize our moral strength in a conflict that cannot be won simply with military might." Stirring words -- but apparently not stirring enough to justify a filibuster.

Only a couple of weeks ago, the Senate was poised to move constructive legislation that would have given the administration the tools it needs but not the power to disappear people into secret prisons and interrogate them using techniques too shameful to name in public. Yet Mr. Bush's pressure tactics worked again. He has the lamentable legislation he wanted -- which will bring discredit onto this country in any number of ways -- and Republicans are busily blasting Democrats as terrorist-coddlers anyway.

What My Father Saw At Nuremberg (LAT)

By Christopher Dodd, Sen. Christopher Dodd (d-conn.) Is A Senior Member Of The Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Sixty years ago today, my father watched the U.S. win the battle of ideas. Have we lost our way?

DOJ_NMG_0072451

SIXTY YEARS AGO today, at the Palace of Justice in Nuremberg, Germany, the verdicts were read in a trial that will forever define the punishment of war criminals. One by one, the 22 top surviving Nazi officers of Adolf Hitler were sentenced. By the time the gavel sounded, three had been acquitted, seven sent to prison and 12 condemned to death.

One of the people in court that day was my father, 38-year-old attorney Thomas Dodd, who was the No. 2 prosecutor for the United States behind Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson. My father always considered Nuremberg to be the most meaningful experience of his life.

My father wrote more than 400 letters to my mother from Nuremberg. Many are devoted to how much he missed his wife and children; others to the Nazis he had met.

But some of his harshest words were reserved for the Russians, who had little interest in a fair trial. In one letter, he tells the story of a toast offered by a visiting Soviet dignitary, who raised a glass and said: "May the road for these war criminals from the courthouse to the grave be a very short one."

"I winced," my father wrote, "and I could see that Judge [John J.] Parker, the American alternative, was certainly embarrassed."

But of course, a quick trial that led to quick executions was the temptation. The world had seen a monstrous regime try to conquer the world. It had seen them take the lives of more than tens of millions of men, women and children.

Why not just give in to vengeance? Why not just shoot them, as Winston Churchill wanted to do? Why not just succumb to the law of power politics and impose our will without any regard to principle? Why not just give in to violence, which was certainly within our ability and, many argued, within our right?

Why not? Because the United States has always stood for something more.

When we entered World War II, we did not fight for land or for treasure — we fought for an idea. The idea that laws should rule the land, not men; that the principles of justice embodied in our Declaration of Independence and Constitution — of due process, of innocence until proven guilty, of the right to a fair trial — do not get suspended for vengeance.

At Nuremberg, we rejected the certainty of execution for the uncertainty of a trial. The test was one of principle over power, and the United States passed.

President Harry Truman understood that our nation's ability to bring about a world of peace and justice was rooted not in our military might but in our moral authority; not on the ability to compel people with our tanks and planes but to convince them that our values and our ideals were right. He understood that our ability to succeed in spreading American values of freedom and human rights are only as effective as our willingness to uphold them.

Over the last six decades, that moral authority helped persuade more than half the nations of the world to embrace freedom and free markets. But now that they are walking with us, why are we walking away from them?

Today, we debate secret prisons, suspension of habeas corpus, warrant-less searches and wiretaps. The president even asks us to reinterpret the Geneva accords to sanction the torture of enemy prisoners.

Just as the word "Nuremberg" once defined the United States' moral authority and commitment to justice, what we risk today is that, one day, the loss of that moral authority and a commitment to injustice may also be defined by a single word: "Guantanamo."

Once again, the question is being asked: Why not just give in to vengeance and show our enemies less mercy than they showed their victims? Why not just abandon due process and the rule of law and the right to a fair trial?

Because the United States stands for something more.

Now, as then, this nation should never tailor its eternal principles to the conflict of the moment, because if we do, we will be walking in the footsteps of the enemies we despise. By abandoning the rule of law, as Congress did last week, we will lose much more than what we gain.

In the end, it's not about them — it's about us. It's about staying true to the values and principles that have always made our nation unique.

We would do well to remember the words of Justice Jackson: "We must never forget that the record on which we judge these defendants today is the record on which history will judge us tomorrow. To pass these defendants a poisoned chalice is to put it to our own lips as well."

Australian At Guantanamo To Be Among First Tried By U.S. Military Commissions (HC/AP)

By Rod Mcguirk, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia — The only Australian held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, will be among the first terror suspects tried by the overhauled U.S. military commission system within months, Australia's attorney general said Sunday.

With domestic pressure mounting on the center-right government over how long alleged Taliban fighter David Hicks has spent at the U.S. naval base in Cuba, Attorney General Philip Ruddock met with his U.S. counterpart Alberto Gonzales last week to press for a speedy resolution. He returned home Sunday.

"It ought to be a matter that can be dealt with quickly. We've said it should be dealt with quickly and they've said to us it will be among the first cases to be heard," Ruddock told Australian Broadcasting Corp. television.

"They don't think it will be within weeks — obviously the process of regulations, choosing those who will serve on the commissions will take perhaps even some months — but they're very conscious of our view that this needs to happen very expeditiously," he said.

Hicks, a 31-year-old former kangaroo skinner, was arrested by the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan in December 2001 and was later charged with attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy.

Congress last week approved legislation that addressed a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that the commissions were illegal. But regulations have yet to be put in place and new charges would need to be drafted, Ruddock aid.

The legislation Congress sent President Bush Friday endorses his plan to interrogate and prosecute terror suspects and sets the rules for court proceedings. It would only apply to those selected by the military for prosecution and leaves mostly unaffected the majority of the 14,000 prisoners in U.S. custody, most of whom are in Iraq.

The Pentagon had previously selected 10 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay prison to be tried and Bush is expected also to try some or all of the 14 suspects held by the CIA in secret prisons and recently transferred to military custody at Guantanamo.

Gulf Nations Fortify Against Terror Attacks (WT)

By From Combined Dispatches

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates -- America's allies in the Persian Gulf are at least as worried about terrorism as the United States, spending billions of dollars on security fences in the desert, eye-scanning machines at airports and other measures to keep out militants.

Saudi Arabia, for example, has ordered the construction of a 550-mile fence with state-of-the art technology to seal off its troubled northern neighbor, Iraq.

The barrier, which will be equipped with ultraviolet night-vision cameras, buried sensor cables and thousands of miles of barbed wire, will snake across the vast and remote desert frontier between the countries, the London Sunday Telegraph reported in today's editions.

The fence will be built despite the hundreds of millions of dollars that the Saudi kingdom has spent in the past two years to beef up patrols on its border with Iraq, with officials saying the crisis in Iraq is now so dangerous it must be physically shut out.

"Surveillance has already been stepped up over the past 18 months," said Nawaf Obaid, the director of the Saudi National Security Assessment Project, an institute that advises the government on security affairs.

"But the feeling in Saudi is that Iraq is way out of control, with no possibility of stability. The urgency now is to get that border sealed -- physically sealed," Mr. Obaid said.

Al Qaeda's warning that the Gulf is among its next targets is prompting increased security measures among the affluent Arab countries that have largely been spared major violence so far.

They have a lot to lose. Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Bahrain, Oman and the United Arab Emirates are enjoying tremendous economic growth, boosted by oil money and also because they are seen by investors as islands of stability in a volatile region.

Saudi Arabia asked American forces to leave in 2003, ending a presence that fueled militants' anger against the kingdom and sparked terrorist attacks, including the truck bomb that killed 19 U.S. service members and a Saudi citizen in 1996.

In a video posted Monday on the Internet, al Qaeda's No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahri, said al Qaeda would soon turn to the other Gulf states.

He addressed Americans, saying "you will be thrown out [of the Gulf] after you are defeated in Iraq, at which point your economic ruin will be achieved." He also threatened Israel.

So far, al Qaeda's main effort in the Gulf has been in Saudi Arabia, Osama bin Laden's homeland, where the terror group's branch has killed dozens over the past few years.

The kingdom responded with a vigorous anti-terrorism campaign and says it has killed or capturing most of al Qaeda's local leadership. Militants have not carried out a major attack in Saudi Arabia since February, when al Qaeda guerrillas tried to bomb an oil refinery.

Saudi Arabia has announced it will spend $12 billion on a complex border defense system of electronic sensors, bases, and physical barriers to be built first along its long frontier with Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0072453

It is also considering a special oil-sector security force and an intelligence agency focusing on threats to the energy industry, Mr. Obaid told the Associated Press.

Saudi Arabia's success might not translate into security for its neighbors, however.

"It's gotten harder and harder for al Qaeda to strike inside Saudi Arabia, so we may see them move into one of the other Gulf countries," Mr. Obaid said.

Kuwait, the main U.S. military staging area for the war in Iraq, saw heavy battles with anti-American militants in 2005. Government forces learned the guerillas planned to attack U.S. military targets and responded with raids that killed nine militants and captured dozens. Four policemen were killed.

In Qatar, militants used a car bomb to attack a theater in March 2005, killing a Briton and wounding 12 persons.

The UAE has not seen any attacks, but there are many factors that could make it a prime target.

The country is home to a U.S. air base and the freewheeling and cosmopolitan UAE also welcomes Westerners for beach vacations that can involve alcohol and prostitution.

It also has in Dubai the Middle East's busiest airport, accepts more U.S. Navy port visits than any other country in the world, and contributes a special forces team to fight the Taliban in Afghanistan.

That hasn't escaped notice by militants. A government official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said several plots had been broken up and would-be terrorists arrested -- some of whom were handed over to American authorities.

The UAE already maintains what is believed to be the world's largest identity database of iris scans, which allows ironclad identity checks aimed at preventing those deported from the country from re-entering with false documents.

At the same time, it is building a wall along its border with Oman -- mainly to keep out illegal workers, though militants could try to exploit the porous frontier.

U.S., EU Unable To Reach Deal On Passenger Data (WT/AP)

By Leslie Miller, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

The United States and the European Union failed to reach a new deal on sharing air passenger data by yesterday's deadline, though officials disagreed about the impact on trans-Atlantic air travel.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the failure to agree wouldn't disrupt trans-Atlantic air travel.

Mr. Chertoff said in a telephone interview that he was sending EU representatives "an initial proposed agreement, which I think embodies what their fundamental requirements for data protection are so we can do what we need to protect our borders.

"If they're prepared to accept and sign, great. If we have to have additional talks, fine."

European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said there would be a "legal vacuum" as of midnight.

"We have to discuss on commission level what to do next," Mr. Todd said. He said the EU executive would debate the issue Thursday.

Mr. Chertoff said he'd been assured that European airlines would continue to transmit passenger data and said he didn't think European governments would penalize them for doing so.

"The talks did not break down," Mr. Chertoff said. "Their delegation had to go home and that's fine."

Data including passengers' names, addresses and credit card details must be transferred to U.S. authorities within 15 minutes of a flight's departure for the United States.

The EU's top court in May ruled that the deal put in place after the September 11 attacks on the United States was illegal because it was not using the right legal basis under EU law. It did not rule on the deal's content.

An EU court allowed the data to keep flowing until Sept. 30 to give officials time to negotiate a new deal.

Washington has warned that airlines failing to share passenger information face fines of up to $6,000 per passenger and the loss of landing rights.

Without the deal, airlines that hand over passenger data to U.S. authorities could face legal action from national data protection authorities in EU states, the commission said.

Mr. Chertoff, though, said he had been assured that airlines would continue to transmit the data. "There's no intention for them to interfere with the continued transmission," he said.

He also said he didn't expect airlines to be fined.

"I don't envision that while we're in these discussions any country in Europe is going to take some precipitous step to put the airlines in a difficult position," he said.

Mr. Chertoff said there is no legal vacuum because U.S. law is clear that airlines have to provide information about people entering this country.

"This should not be a big issue," he said. "I can tell you from dealing with the negotiators who were over here that everybody's negotiating in good faith."

Senate Unanimously Ratifies U.S., U.K. Extradition Treaty (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, October 1, 2006

Sept. 30 (Bloomberg) -- The Senate early today unanimously ratified an extradition treaty between the U.S. and the U.K., three years after it was signed, according to the U.S. embassy in London.

The treaty, which speeds extradition of prisoners between the two countries, was negotiated in 2003. The British have granted the U.S. some of the pact's benefits pending ratification by the Senate. The lack of U.S. approval had become a political issue in the U.K., highlighted by protests in July over the extradition of three British bankers accused of fraud in the Enron Corp. scandal.

The British bankers were sent to face trial in Houston after fighting extradition for three years. They pleaded not guilty to fraud charges July 14. The bankers are accused of bilking their former employer, Royal Bank of Scotland Group Plc's Greenwich NatWest subsidiary, of millions of dollars from the sale of an Enron off-the-books partnership.

``We can now have a fully modernized extradition relationship that helps to protect citizens of both of our countries and to improve the administration of justice," Robert Tuttle, U.S. ambassador to Britain, said in a statement on the embassy's Web site.

British Home Secretary John Reid said he was ``delighted" senators had backed the treaty, Agence France-Presse reported.

``The treaty is an important measure in our fight against serious international crime," Reid said in a statement, AFP reported.

The treaty, first sent to the Senate for approval in April 2004, lowers the level of proof the U.S. must show to win extradition of a suspect. It also permits temporary surrender of fugitives for trial who are already serving a prison sentence in the other country.

Ratification had been slowed by complaints from some Irish- American groups that the treaty would create new legal jeopardy for U.S. citizens who opposed British policy in Northern Ireland.

Exclusive film of suicide pilots at Bin Laden's HQ

FILM of the ringleader of the September 11 hijackers reading his "martyrdom" will inside Afghanistan at Osama Bin Laden's headquarters has emerged five years after the Al-Qaeda outrage.

It is the first time that a videotape has appeared of Mohammed Atta — who flew an American Airlines plane into the north tower of the World Trade Center — at a training camp in Afghanistan. It fills in a significant gap in the timing of the build-up to the attacks on the United States.

Dates on the tape show Atta was filmed on January 18, 2000, together with Ziad Jarrah, the pilot of United Airlines flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania after the passengers apparently stormed the flight deck.

The Sunday Times has obtained a copy of the video through a previously tested channel. The tape has no soundtrack and a US source said lip readers had tried without success to decipher what was being said.

Despite the deadly tasks the men had been assigned, they appear in high spirits, laughing and smiling in front of the camera. Only when Atta, with an AK-47 propped on a wall beside him, reads a document marked in Arabic "the will", does he become solemn. Both are well groomed, without the haggard appearance of the identity mugshots issued after September 11.

The high quality, unedited film shows Bin Laden addressing his followers at the mud-walled complex near Kandahar. One of the main figures in the September 11 plot, Ramzi Binalshibh, is identifiable in the crowd, as is a bodyguard whose task was to kill Bin Laden with two bullets to the head if he faced capture.

Dating on the tape indicates that the Al-Qaeda leader was filmed on January 8, 2000, 10 days before Atta and Jarrah recorded their wills.

American and German investigators have struggled to find evidence of Atta's whereabouts in January 2000 after he disappeared from Hamburg. The hour-long tape places him in Afghanistan at a decisive moment in the development of the conspiracy when he was given operational command. Months later both he and Jarrah enrolled at flying schools in America.

Investigators have also puzzled over the fact that unlike the rest of the hijackers — most of whom were young Saudi fundamentalists — Atta and Jarrah were well educated and appeared to fit into western society while studying in Germany. The video indicates how easily they slipped from a western identity to a fundamentalist one. It also shows up the subterfuge they maintained in Germany and America that they did not know each other, all part of evading detection.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Anthrax Dispute Suggests Bioshield Woes (AP)

By Paul Elias

By now, millions of anthrax vaccine shots developed through cutting-edge genetic engineering were supposed to be filling a new national stockpile of biodefense drugs. Instead, five years after anthrax attacks left five dead, sickened 17 and panicked the country, the nearly $1 billion contract awarded by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to a tiny and struggling San Francisco Bay Area biotechnology company is plagued with misfortune and delays.

Delivery has been put off until at least 2008 — and maybe later — while the government and VaxGen Inc. trade barbs over who is at fault. The dispute has further tarnished Project Bioshield, a government program that has alienated many potential biodefense contractors.

"We have all come to understand that there is more complexity than it originally appeared," said Thomas Inglesby, deputy director of the University of Pittsburgh's Center for Biosecurity.

The anthrax attacks of 2001 prompted passage of Project Bioshield, which promised to build national drug stockpiles to be used in case of a bioterror attack.

The project was supposed to jump start a national security renaissance among drug makers by guaranteeing contracts to develop drugs for combatting potential bioweapons. But it has been greeted with skepticism by many in the industry.

The anthrax project, the first and largest Bioshield contract, was to be the crown jewel.

In November 2004, the $877.5 million contract was awarded to VaxGen to genetically engineer a replacement for the current anthrax vaccine, which requires six shots to be administered over 18 months. VaxGen's is expected to require no more than three shots.

Since winning the contract, however, VaxGen has repeatedly stumbled, starting with its disclosure it would miss the original deadline of November 2005 by a year.

Even before winning the contract, the Brisbane-based company had a checkered past highlighted by the 2003 flop of its experimental AIDS vaccine, which failed to protect inoculated volunteers from getting infected.

Since then, it was dropped from the Nasdaq Stock Market for failing to file financial reports, its chief scientific officer left the company in July, and its stock price hovers near $4.40 — at the low end of its 52-week range — as VaxGen and the government try to work out their differences.

Then, in March, the government said it wouldn't pay VaxGen until the company completed a costly and time-consuming human test to ensure the vaccine was safe. The new requirement forced the company to sell its stake in another biotechnology company for $79 million to stay afloat and finance the new test.

"We don't get paid until we deliver product and we have to shoulder the carrying cost," said VaxGen spokesman Lance Ignon. "The burden it puts on our company is abundantly clear to Wall Street as shown by our stock price."

For its part, VaxGen blames the government for the latest delays.

"The heart of the problem right now is the government's willingness to change the goal line," Ignon said. "The government unilaterally, and without compensation to VaxGen, changed the contract."

The government counters that the safety data was always required and that it made minor changes that allowed VaxGen to deliver the vaccine later than it had initially promised.

Last month, Sens. Joe Lieberman and Susan Collins called for a congressional investigation of the VaxGen contract.

VaxGen's difficulties underscore the industry's disappointment with Bioshield, which has done little but generate indifference among the big pharmaceutical companies the government hoped to woo. Instead, drug makers are snubbing the program because of liability and intellectual property issues and confusion over what the government wants.

New legislation that would address many of the critics' concerns — such as protecting drug makers from liability lawsuits — has been bottled up in Congress for months and the prospect of a bill passing this year are dimming.

Big pharmaceutical companies, which can spend upward of $1 billion developing a single drug that can earn billions annually, are also turned off by the relatively paltry $5.6 billion available under Bioshield, analysts said.

Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the Washington-based trade group that represents drug makers, wouldn't comment on why its members have shunned Project Bioshield but said it supports the program.

"PhRMA continues to work closely with the Congress and the Administration to help ensure that America has the necessary tools to help prepare for and respond to a possible bioterror attack," Ken Johnson, the group's senior vice president, said in a statement.

Producing defensive measures has been largely left to small, financially struggling companies such as the oft-troubled VaxGen.

Despite its laundry list of failures, HHS has defended VaxGen's qualifications.

"The incentive is not there for the large pharmaceutical companies," said Noreen Hynes, director of research and development coordination in the HHS office responsible for biodefense. "Biotech companies, for the most part, are more inexperienced."

Since awarding the contract to VaxGen, HHS has doled out another $1 billion in contracts, including two this year worth a combined $505 million to the Canadian company Cangene Corp. for another anthrax treatment, as well as a drug to treat botulism.

None of the other drug developers have stumbled as spectacularly as VaxGen.

"The fact that a company doesn't deliver is always disappointing," Hynes said. But in vaccine and biological development, "delays are more the rule than the exception."

Why I'm Banned In The USA (WP)

By Tariq Ramadan

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

LONDON

For more than two years now, the U.S. government has barred me from entering the United States to pursue an academic career. The reasons have changed over time, and have evolved from defamatory to absurd, but the effect has remained the same: I've been kept out.

First, I was told that I could not enter the country because I had endorsed terrorism and violated the USA Patriot Act. It took a lawsuit for the government eventually to abandon this baseless accusation. Later, I reapplied for a visa, twice, only to hear nothing for more than a year. Finally, just 10 days ago, after a federal judge forced the State Department to reconsider my application, U.S. authorities offered a new rationale for turning me away: Between 1998 and 2002, I had contributed small sums of money to a French charity supporting humanitarian work in the Palestinian territories.

I am increasingly convinced that the Bush administration has barred me for a much simpler reason: It doesn't care for my political views. In recent years, I have publicly criticized U.S. policy in the Middle East, the war in Iraq, the use of torture, secret CIA prisons and other government actions that undermine fundamental civil liberties. And for many years, through my research and writing and speeches, I have called upon Muslims to better understand the principles of their own faith, and have sought to show that one can be Muslim and Western at the same time.

My experience reveals how U.S. authorities seek to suppress dissenting voices and -- by excluding people such as me from their country -- manipulate political debate in America. Unfortunately, the U.S. government's paranoia has evolved far beyond a fear of particular individuals and taken on a much more insidious form: the fear of ideas.

In January 2004, I was offered a job at the University of Notre Dame, as a professor of Islamic studies and as Luce professor of religion, conflict and peace-building. I accepted the tenured position enthusiastically and looked forward to joining the academic community in the United States. After the government granted me a work visa, I rented a home in South Bend, Ind., enrolled my children in school there and shipped all of my household belongings. Then, in July, the government notified me that my visa had been revoked. It did not offer a specific explanation, but pointed to a provision of the Patriot Act that applies to people who have "endorsed or espoused" terrorist activity.

The revocation shocked me. I had consistently opposed terrorism in all of its forms, and still do. And, before 2004, I had visited the United States frequently to lecture, attend conferences and meet with other scholars. I had been an invited speaker at conferences or lectures sponsored by Harvard University, Stanford, Princeton and the William Jefferson Clinton Presidential Foundation. None of these institutions seemed to consider me a threat to national security.

The U.S. government invited me to apply for a new visa and, with Notre Dame's help, I did so in October 2004. But after three months passed without a response, I felt I had little choice but to give up my new position and resume my life in Europe. Even so, I never abandoned the effort to clear my name. At the urging of American academic and civic groups, I reapplied for a visa one last time in September 2005, hoping that the government would retract its accusation. Once again, I encountered only silence.

Finally, in January, the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Academy of Religion, the American Association of University Professors and PEN American Center filed a lawsuit on my behalf, challenging the government's actions. In court, the government's lawyers admitted that they could establish no connection between me and any terrorist group; the government had merely taken a "prudential" measure by revoking my visa. Even then, the government maintained that the process of reconsidering my visa could take years. The federal court -- which issued a ruling recognizing that I have been a vocal critic of terrorism -- rejected the indefinite delay. In June, it ordered the government to grant me a visa or explain why it would not do so.

On Sept. 21, the long-awaited explanation arrived. The letter from the U.S. Embassy informed me that my visa application had been denied, and it put an end to the rumors that had circulated since my original visa was revoked. After a lengthy investigation, the State Department cited no evidence of suspicious relationships, no meetings with terrorists, no encouraging or advocacy of terrorism. Instead, the department cited my donation of $940 to two humanitarian organizations (a French group and its Swiss chapter) serving the Palestinian people. I should note that the investigation did not reveal these contributions. As the department acknowledges, I had brought this information to their attention myself, two years earlier, when I had reapplied for a visa.

In its letter, the U.S. Embassy claims that I "reasonably should have known" that the charities in question provided money to Hamas. But my donations were made between December 1998 and July 2002, and the United States did not blacklist the charities until 2003. How should I reasonably have known of their activities before the U.S. government itself knew? I donated to these organizations for the same reason that countless Europeans -- and Americans, for that matter -- donate to Palestinian causes: not to help fund terrorism, but because I wanted to provide humanitarian aid to people who desperately need it. Yet after two years of investigation, this was the only explanation offered for the denial of my visa. I still find it hard to believe.

What words do I utter and what views do I hold that are dangerous to American ears, so dangerous, in fact, that I should not be allowed to express them on U.S. soil?

I have called upon Western societies to be more open toward Muslims and to regard them as a source of richness, not just of violence or conflict. I have called upon Muslims in the West to reconcile and embrace both their Islamic and Western identities. I have called for the creation of a "New We" based on common citizenship within which Buddhists, Jews, Christians, Muslims and people with no religion can build a pluralistic society. And yes, I believe we all have a right to dissent, to criticize governments and protest undemocratic decisions. It is certainly legitimate for European Muslims and American Muslims to criticize their governments if they find them unjust -- and I will continue to do so.

At the same time, I do not stop short of criticizing regimes from Muslim countries. Indeed, the United States is not the only country that rejects me; I am also barred from Tunisia, Saudi Arabia and even my native Egypt. Last month, after a few sentences in a speech by Pope Benedict XVI elicited protests and violence, I published an article noting how some governments in the Muslim world manipulate these imagined crises to suit their political agendas. "When the people are deprived of their basic rights and of their freedom of expression," I argued, "it costs nothing to allow them to vent their anger over Danish cartoons or the words of the Pontiff." I was immediately accused of appeasing the enemies of Islam, of being more Western than Muslim.

Today, I live and work in London. From my posts at Oxford University and the Lokahi Foundation, I try to promote cultural understanding and to prevent radicalization within Muslim communities here. Along with many British citizens, I have criticized the country's new security laws and its support for the war in Iraq. Yet I have never been asked to remain silent as a condition to live or work here. I can express myself freely.

I fear that the United States has grown fearful of ideas. I have learned firsthand that the Bush administration reacts to its critics not by engaging them, but by stigmatizing and excluding them. Will foreign scholars be permitted to enter the United States only if they promise to mute their criticisms of U.S. policy? It saddens me to think of the effect this will have on the free exchange of ideas, on political debate within America, and on our ability to bridge differences across cultures.

After Homework, Duty As An Imam (WP)

With Cleric's Visa Denied, Va. Center Enlists Its Most Learned: Two Teens

The boy, round-faced and thin, stood in front of the hundred or so men, his arms crossed, his eyes closed. When he knelt, they knelt. When he stood, they stood. When he stumbled for a word, squinting to access the search engine of his mind, they waited.

In a few hours, 13-year-old Aman Chhipa would be back at home sitting in front of his computer playing a video game, pretending he was a knight slaying giant spiders with a gem-laden sword. But at that moment, and for an hour each night this month, he is a boy leading a room full of men.

Aman and another teenager, Uzair Jawed, 16, were thrust into the revered role of imam, or prayer leader, at the Islamic Community Center of Northern Virginia, mostly out of desperation. A cleric from South Africa was supposed to lead the center's nightly prayer for Ramadan, the holiest month for Muslims, as he had done for the past three years. But after Ismail Mullah arrived at Dulles International Airport on Sept. 22, he was detained by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials and sent back to South Africa.

The center, in Woodbridge, had prepared for months for Mullah's arrival and had paid thousands of dollars for his airfare. Without him, its leaders had less than a day to find a hafiz -- someone who had memorized the more than 6,200 Arabic verses of the Koran and could recite them without looking at the text.

They searched among the adults. No one. They called other mosques. No one.

They then turned to the two boys, the only ones among them who had mastered the text enough to guide the congregation through the 30 sections in 30 days. The Koran is divided into 114 chapters containing more than 6,200 verses comprising about 80,000 words. It is like learning part of the Bible in Latin when you don't speak Latin.

"I thought, how am I going to do this?" Aman said. "I was nervous. It's a huge responsibility."

Aman is an eighth-grader at Fred M. Lynn Middle School in Woodbridge whose family is from India. He memorized the Koran by age 10. Uzair, 16, is a ninth-grader at Woodbridge Senior High School whose family is from Pakistan. He memorized it by the time he was 13.

Together, they lead the nightly prayer, correcting each other when needed, as is custom. Days that were once spent perched in front of a PlayStation 2 for hours, they said, are now heavy with studying that starts about 5 a.m. and stretches to about 11:30 p.m., with school and life in between.

"Before we were hafiz, we were just kids," Uzair said.

He and Aman might be the nation's youngest imams, said Nihad Awad, the national executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, the largest Islamic civil liberties group in the United States. The two are also a testament to the post-9/11 need for U.S. Muslims to groom their own leaders and stop depending on those from other countries, he said.

"Imams who come from overseas, sometimes they bring a different mentality. They come from Muslim-majority places. They have different cultures, norms and traditions," Awad said. "I think it's important that we develop our own."

Aman's father, Nasir Chhipa, a director at the center, agreed. Mullah's inability to enter the country left the community disappointed and with many questions, he said. Some men who came to pray in the first few days left in frustration to search for another scholar. The ones who have stayed, he said, have come to depend on the boys.

The teenagers have taken on their community's burden and hopes -- at least for a month.

"In some sense, I think whatever happened, it happened for the good," Chhipa said. "We learned a lesson from this. . . . We have to produce our own scholars."Long Days With the Koran

When Aman was 7, his father enrolled him in a school in Pennsylvania where he took academic classes for three hours a day and studied the Koran for 8 1/2 . "When I first dropped him off, it was very hard for me. I literally cried," Chhipa said. "Every day I called them and said, 'Could I talk to my son?' The principal said, 'You have to be patient.' "

About three years later, in the middle of Ramadan, the principal called him and said that Aman, whose name means peace, had finished memorizing the text. "When I saw him reciting the Koran without looking at the book, that was the moment of my life," Chhipa said.

Memorizing the text is only part of the challenge in becoming a hafiz. He must practice daily. "It's easy to memorize; it's very hard to remember," Chhipa said. "The Koran is nobody's friend. If you forget the Koran, the Koran will forget you."

Aman studied daily before, but now it consumes almost every moment of his downtime. He begins reading the Koran shortly after waking at 4:30 a.m. for breakfast and continues reading it at any possible moment during the day, even taking the Koran to lunch with him. "They ask me, 'What's that book?' " he said of the other students.

His classmates don't know he's a hafiz, he said. But at the center, the men who stand behind him in prayer each night don't call him just Aman anymore, they call him "Hafiz Aman" -- like Dr. or Mr. or Professor.

"People will greet me properly, not as if I'm their friend but as if I'm their senior," Aman said.

It was strange at first, he said, but he's getting used to it.

"When I was small, I used to always think that I wanted to be something big when I grew up," said Aman, whose upper lip is showing the start of a mustache.

Uzair, who wears a respectable beard, said that as the community has started giving him more respect, he's started behaving differently, trying to act in a way that deserves it. When his father told him on that Friday that he would have to recite the prayers the next day, he said it was both an honor and terrifying.

"I was nervous. I was thinking I wouldn't be able to do it," he said, adding that with each day it has become easier, almost fun. "We're just trying to enjoy it because we have no other option."

His schedule has become much like Aman's. Wake up before sunrise, study the Koran, go to school, come home, study the Koran, break the Ramadan fast and study the Koran. In between, he prays five times and does his homework.

The Woodbridge center is simple, consisting mostly of a large community room and small office, hidden behind a Subway and video rental store on Jefferson Davis Highway. The center has a regular imam, but he has not memorized the Koran.

Those who congregate there said they are grateful for the boys. Still, they know they lost something when Mullah's entry was denied. In addition to leading the prayer, he would have guided donations and doled out advice if needed. The teenagers cannot play such a role, because it is the equivalent of asking them to have a master's degree in Islam.

"A young kid and a grown priest is a big difference," said Fahad Mirza, 29, adding that the boys are "wonderful" but that "they are there just because we have no choice."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations is writing letters to politicians demanding to know why Mullah and other scholars were turned away at the last minute. Nationwide, at least four other Islamic scholars were denied entry, without explanation, Muslim community leaders said.

They are questioning why the government waited until the men arrived in the country instead of denying their visas early enough for the mosques to find replacements.

"We don't want this to fall in the cracks and to just be forgotten. We need to get answers from our government," Awad said. "We want people to be abiding by the law. We want to protect our country. . . . At the same time, we just want to make sure we do not step on people's rights and that we continue to be an open and welcoming society."

Officials with U.S. Customs and Border Protection would not say why Mullah was turned away but said more than 1,000 people are denied entry every day for a variety of reasons. Kelly Klundt, a spokeswoman, said: "The State Department may issue a visa which allows someone to apply for admission into the U.S. It is not necessarily a guarantee that they will be permitted."

Those at the center describe Mullah as a soft-spoken man who was born in Gujarat state in India. They said his speeches were not extreme.

Chhipa said he had spoken briefly with him since the incident. "He said, 'I don't know why they did it to me.' . . . He said they only said, 'We're only doing our job.' "

Mullah was glad to hear that the center had found a replacement for him, Chhipa added.Leaders, and Now Friends

The teenagers weren't really friends before, seeing each other only occasionally during prayer time at the Woodbridge center. But now their parents say they are attached, having developed a friendship through their shared responsibility.

After the prayers ended one recent night, the boys shuffled out of the center, looking as tired as the older men among them.

Waiting for Uzair at home was algebra, English and Spanish homework.

Aman, who had finished his homework earlier that day, would get to steal a few rare moments of play. Within minutes of walking into his house, he shed his traditional garb for sweat pants and a T-shirt emblazoned with the word "basketball" -- his favorite sport. He then swooshed down in front of the computer, clicked on his favorite video game and within seconds was lost in a wooded area of imaginary beasts. In one corner of the screen, he chatted with friends in a language far from Arabic: "Sup?" and "Kool."

La. Voters OK Consolidating Levee Boards (AP)

By Doug Simpson

AP, October 1, 2006

Louisiana voters on Saturday approved consolidating the New Orleans area's levee boards, the generations-old agencies whose politically appointed members were criticized after Hurricane Katrina for failing to maintain the area's levees and floodwalls.

The constitutional amendment — passing with about 80 percent of the vote — will combine 10 southeast Louisiana boards into two, one for each bank of the Mississippi River. Members of the new boards will be required to have expertise in engineering, geology and hydrology, mandates that advocates of the new structure hope will convince Congress and the nation that Louisiana has shed a system mired in cronyism.

"I think it shows that people really care about basic reform in Louisiana," said Gov. Kathleen Blanco, who supported the measure. "They want everything to be professional."

With about 97 percent of precincts reporting, voters supported the measure by a 4-1 margin. The amendment was passing in every parish that was hit hard by Katrina in August 2005.

After Katrina breached New Orleans' levees last August, the boards were criticized as disorganized, full of patronage and badly lacking in technical knowledge to manage the system of levees that protect New Orleans, which is largely below sea level.

Members of the existing boards are appointed by the governor and need no expertise in flood protection. The boards are responsible for levee upkeep and inspections, but critics say they have become distracted with other projects. The board in New Orleans, for example, runs marinas, an airport and a police force.

Blanco said she wants to have the two new levee panels in place by January.

Republican state Sen. Walter Boasso, who sponsored the levee board amendment in the Legislature, toured Louisiana drumming support for the amendment. He told north Louisiana voters that the proposal affects the entire state because the New Orleans area is home to a third of Louisiana's economy.

U.S. Rep. Bobby Jindal, R-La., said passage of the amendment would reassure Congress that Louisiana is cleaning up its act as the federal government invests billions of dollars to rebuild New Orleans and surrounding parishes.

There was no public campaign opposing the amendment, though state lawmakers from the New Orleans area tried to block the measure in the Legislature. They argued the existing levee boards should be allowed to finish flood-protection projects that are under way.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Confronts Critics Of Iraq Policies (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 1, 2006

Gloves-off election-year rhetoric hit the radio Saturday, as President Bush argued that critics are wrongheaded to argue for a different policy in Iraq while Democrats suggested Bush is more interested in politically helpful slogans than success in the war.

With just over five weeks to go before midterm elections in which GOP control of Congress could be at risk, Democrats have been citing a government intelligence assessment to bolster their criticism of Bush's approach to Iraq. The classified National Intelligence Estimate, parts of which Bush declassified earlier this week, says the Iraq war has contributed to a global growth in the terrorist movement, but it also says success there could drain jihadists of momentum.

The president has been fighting back against the Democratic attacks with a series of appearances, and he recycled many lines from earlier in the week in his Saturday radio address.

"Some in Washington have selectively quoted from this document to make the case that by fighting the terrorists in Iraq, we are making our people less secure here at home," Bush said. "Five years after the 9/11 attacks, some people in Washington still do not understand the nature of the enemy. The only way to protect our citizens at home is to go on the offense against the enemy across the world."

Democrats chose Tammy Duckworth, an Army helicopter pilot who lost both legs in Iraq and now is running for Congress in Illinois, to respond.

"Anyone who challenges our failed policies, or suggests the need for a new strategy, is accused of 'cutting and running,'" Duckworth said. "Well, I didn't cut and run, Mr. President. Like so many others, I proudly fought and sacrificed. ... And I believe the brave men and women who are serving in Iraq today, their families and the American people deserve more than the same empty slogans and political name-calling."

Duckworth, who faces Republican Peter Roskam for an open seat, was referring to a Bush speech Thursday at a GOP fundraiser in Alabama. "The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run," Bush said then.

He also charged in Alabama that "some in Washington, some decent people, patriotic people, feel like we should not be on the offensive in this war on terror," without offering any evidence of such remarks.

White House press secretary Tony Snow acknowledged Friday that no Democrats have said directly that they do not want to take the offensive against terrorists, but he defended Bush's no-holds-barred politicking.

"I think there's been a lot of ratcheting up of rhetoric on the other side where the president has been accused of everything from dereliction of duty to not caring about what happens to people who have been claimed on the battlefields," Snow said. "The point the president is trying to make is, there are going to be some clear choices."

Bush argued Saturday that maintaining the U.S. presence in Iraq is crucial to winning the broader war on terror.

"Our safety depends on the outcome of the battle in Iraq," he said. "Withdrawing from Iraq before the enemy is defeated would embolden the terrorists."

Bush Says Iraq War Isn't Making Americans Less Secure (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson

Bloomberg, October 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072461

Sept. 30 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said today that fighting in Iraq isn't making Americans less secure at home.

``This argument buys into the enemy's propaganda that the terrorists attack us because we are provoking them,'' Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast. ``We do not create terrorism by fighting terrorism.''

This is the seventh week in the past eight that Bush has made the war on terrorism the topic of his radio address. His comments capped a week in which Democrats used the findings of a National Intelligence Estimate to argue that the Iraq invasion has made the U.S. less safe from terrorist attacks.

Bush's address also follows publicity about a new book by Washington journalist Bob Woodward that says the president and his advisers have mishandled the war. ``State of Denial,'' set for publication Oct. 2, says Bush and his advisers responded too slowly to Iraq's growing insurgency.

With congressional elections less than six weeks away Democrats are making criticisms of Republican Bush's conduct of the war a central part of their midterm election campaigns. Republicans respond that defeating extremists in Iraq would be a major blow to terrorists globally. At the same time, they argue that the invasion of Iraq didn't provoke jihadists' anti-American campaign.

Hating America

``Iraq is not the reason the terrorists are at war against us,'' Bush said. ``The terrorists are at war against us because they hate everything American stands for, and because they know we stand in the way of their ambitions to take over the Middle East.''

U.S. troops were not in Iraq when terrorists first attacked the World Trade Center in 1993, Bush noted. Nor were they in Iraq when terrorists bombed U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998 and the USS Cole in 2000, or when they launched the Sept. 11 attacks of 2001, he said.

``The only way to protect our citizens at home is to go on the offense against the enemy across the world,'' Bush said.

Bush also brought up the National Intelligence Estimate, whose key judgments he ordered declassified this week after elements of the report were leaked to the New York Times and the Washington Post.

U.S. Politics

Both major U.S. political parties can point to parts of the April estimate to bolster their cases. The estimate was a consensus of analysts from 16 federal agencies including the Central Intelligence Agency.

Democrats point to excerpts that say anger over the war in Iraq is fueling Muslim radicalism and that the dispersal of terrorist cells around the world poses a greater risk of attacks on the U.S. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, said yesterday that Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress ``stubbornly refuse to change course, even when it's clear their failed course is making America less safe.''

``We simply can't go on this way,'' said Tammy Duckworth, a candidate for the House of Representatives in Illinois, in the Democratic Party's weekly radio address today. ``It's time for a new direction.''

The sixth district of Illinois, where Duckworth is running, is considered one of the closely contested congressional races that will help determine which party gains a majority in the House. The seat is held by retiring Republican Henry Hyde. Duckworth's Republican opponent is Peter Roskam, a former member of Hyde's staff and a member of the state Senate.

Helicopter Shot Down

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats in the House of Representatives to win a majority.

Duckworth, a veteran of the Iraq War who lost both legs after the Black Hawk helicopter she copiloted was shot down north of Baghdad, said the president has only offered slogans and electioneering rather than leadership.

Republicans point to a finding in the estimate that U.S. counterterrorism efforts have ``seriously damaged'' al-Qaeda's leadership. Bush noted a finding that ``should jihadists leaving Iraq perceive themselves, and be perceived, to have failed, we judge fewer fighters will be inspired to carry on the fight.''

``Withdrawing from Iraq before the enemy is defeated would embolden the terrorists,'' Bush said today. ``It would help them find new recruits to carry out even more destructive attacks on our nation, and it would give the terrorists a new sanctuary in the heart of the Middle East with huge oil riches to fund their ambitions.''

Candidate-Veteran Attacks Bush On Iraq (AP)

By Dennis Conrad

AP, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - An Illinois congressional candidate who lost both her legs during combat in Iraq said Saturday that President Bush has no real strategy for securing the war-ravaged nation, just political talk designed to appeal to voters.

"Instead of a plan or a strategy, we get shallow slogans like 'mission accomplished' and 'stay the course,'" former Army Capt. Tammy Duckworth said in the Democrats' weekly radio address. "Those slogans are calculated to win an election. But they won't help us accomplish our mission in Iraq."

Duckworth's address served as a response to the president's weekly radio talk and gave the Democratic Party a chance to showcase one of its strongest candidates as it seeks to regain control of the House in November's elections.

Duckworth, who copiloted a Black Hawk helicopter that crashed while under a rocket grenade attack almost two years ago, also criticized Bush and others in his administration for accusing anyone who challenges the president's policies of "cutting and running."

Full Image"Well, I didn't cut and run, Mr. President. Like so many others, I proudly fought and sacrificed," Duckworth said. "My helicopter was shot down long after you proclaimed 'mission accomplished.'"

At a GOP fundraiser Thursday in Alabama, Bush said, "The party of FDR and the party of Harry Truman has become the party of cut and run."

Duckworth is seeking the suburban Chicago seat being vacated by conservative Republican Rep. Henry Hyde. She is running against Illinois state Sen. Peter Roskam, the man Hyde has endorsed.

In her address, Duckworth, now a major in the Illinois National Guard, also lashed out at the GOP-led Congress for refusing to do its job of holding the Bush administration accountable for its flawed Iraq policy.

"We need a Congress that will ask the tough questions and work together for solutions rather than attacking the patriotism of those who disagree," she said. "It is time to encourage Iraqi leaders to take control of their own county and make the tough choices that will stop the civil war and stabilize the country."

She offered no proposal for an immediate withdrawal or a timetable for withdrawal.

More Troops Not Solution To Iraq Crisis, Experts Say (BSUN)

By David Wood

The Baltimore Sun, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Renewed allegations that the White House and Pentagon blundered by not deploying sufficient troops in Iraq to deal with the aftermath of the 2003 invasion swarmed around the administration this weekend, stirred by publication of Bob Woodward's new book, State of Denial.

More than four years of combat in Iraq have left 2,711 Americans dead and 20,568 wounded. Today, with the 147,000 American troops deployed there apparently unable to stem a widening and increasingly bloody sectarian war, the issues raised in Woodward's book are adding fuel to a bitter election-year debate about the Bush administration's conduct of the war.

But while the debate swirls, some hard-eyed military officers and analysts assessing the situation in Iraq conclude that it would be difficult and costly to scrape up enough troops to raise levels in Iraq significantly and that even raising troop levels now might not work.

"We keep confusing troop levels with the fact that there was no plan for stability operations, no commitment in terms of aid, no understanding of the political challenges," said Anthony H. Cordesman, who is senior strategist at the nonpartisan Center for Strategic and International Studies and generally regarded as Washington's senior independent analyst. "The critical mistake wasn't one of troop levels, although I think if there had been a plan it would have called for significantly more troops and a longer troop presence."

Eventual success depends not just on the number of deployed troops, Cordesman said, but on whether their presence "is buying the time for reconciliation and effective governance and building the kind of Iraqi security forces that can take over the job - or not. This is a very high-risk operation where the odds of success are even at best."

Arguing over troop levels in Iraq "is a nice debate to have, but it doesn't have a bearing on the real world," said Michael O'Hanlon, military analyst at the Brookings Institution in Washington. The military is already under such strain that "we don't have that option."

"The time for more American troops is clearly over," said Thomas E. Ricks, author of Fiasco, a best-selling history of the war. "There aren't any more troops available."

The size of the force needed for the Iraq war was a contentious issue even before 90,000 American troops lanced across the Kuwait-Iraq border in March 2003 in pursuit of Saddam Hussein. The Army's first estimate, that 400,000 to 450,000 would be needed for the occupation, was extrapolated from its peacekeeping experience in Bosnia and Kosovo in the 1990s. But that plan was rejected by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, according to the memoirs of retired Gen. Tommy Franks, the top U.S. commander at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0072463

Before 2003 was out, rising violence prompted senior U.S. officials in Baghdad to press Washington for more troops, requests that went unanswered. Woodward reports that in the early summer of 2003, James Dobbins, a senior U.S. diplomat with long experience in the postwar Balkans and elsewhere, drew up a plan calling for 500,000 troops, a staggering increase over the 148,900 troops then deployed in Iraq. His plan was forwarded to Washington. There was no response, Woodward wrote.

Despite optimistic White House and Pentagon assurances of progress in Iraq, top aides and commanders were increasingly worried that the country was sliding out of control, and top Bush aides mounted two efforts to oust Rumsfeld, Woodward reported.

"If we have a military strategy, I can't identify it," complained then-deputy national scurity adviser Stephen J. Hadley, according to Woodward's book. "I don't know what's worse - that they [the Pentagon] have one and won't tell us or that they don't have one."

By late last year, even the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. John Abizaid, was fed up. "Rumsfeld doesn't have any credibility anymore," he remarked to a friend, in Woodward's account.

Today, there is rising anger and frustration among top American officers whose concern is two-fold: the risk of permanent damage to the U.S. military the longer the war drags on, and concern that despite tactical military success against insurgents, not enough is being done politically to prevent Iraq from sliding into chaos. Many are concerned, as well, that the burden of the war is falling unfairly on a small number of volunteers.

"There are a lot of good people out there in terrible stress and danger, because the judgments of our national leaders have been faulty," one three-star officer said privately last week. "You come back here and people just don't have a clue."

The continuing demand for troops in Iraq has wrecked the Army's plan to sustain troop rotations indefinitely by rotating combat brigades through Iraq on one 12-month tour every three years. That would enable battered units to return home for refitting and retraining and then to serve for 18 months as part of the U.S. strategic reserve, John Medve, senior Army war planner, said in a recent interview.

But the Army has had to send brigades back into action after just a year at home, keeping the troops scrambling and, according to some critics, eroding the nation's capability to respond to crises. Last week, Rumsfeld extended the 12-month tour of a brigade of the 1st Armored Division by 46 days to allow its replacement unit a full 12 months at home before heading to Iraq.

Allowing soldiers barely 12 months at home between combat tours is "putting people at risk not only of losing their lives, but losing their families," said O'Hanlon.

Bush and Rumsfeld have angrily denied that they have ever turned down a request from U.S. commanders in Iraq for more troops - or anything else. Early this year, Rumsfeld disputed an assertion in the memoirs of L. Paul Bremer, the former top U.S. civilian official in Iraq, that Bremer had asked for additional troops in the summer of 2003 and been ignored.

"I thanked him for his suggestion and said we would look into it and we did," Rumsfeld told reporters. He then decided on the advice of the military command in Iraq not to increase troop levels. Rumsfeld said by the time that decision had been made, Bremer had retired.

The argument against raising troop levels, then and now, has turned on the issue of whether the U.S. military presence helps quell the violence or stimulates it, military officers said. Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has said there are continuing deliberations on this point, with senior officers attempting to calibrate and adjust troop levels to respond to the security situation.

Abizaid told reporters last month that an increased U.S. military presence can set back the goal of having Iraqi security forces take over, because when American combat units show up, the Iraqis tend to step back.

Despite such arguments, a review of the record shows that the Bush administration made decisions to keep troop levels low in Iraq and that in the uncontrolled chaos that followed, the insurgency took hold.

"We were undermanned from the beginning, lost an opportunity to secure the country, and have yet to regain the initiative," Army Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who commanded the 1st Infantry Division in Iraq before abruptly quitting a year ago in protest, told a forum organized by congressional Democrats last week.

Four months before the March 2003 invasion, Rumsfeld pointedly recalled that during Desert Storm in 1991, U.S. troops had ousted Iraqis from their occupation of Kuwait in just four days of ground combat in which Iraqi soldiers surrendered by the "tens of thousands."

Turning to the prospective invasion of Iraq, Rumsfeld explained, "So the idea that it's going to be a long, long, long battle of some kind, I think, is belied by what happened in 1991."

The United States, he added, is "determined to do the job and to finish it fast."

Powell Tried To Warn Bush On Iraq, Book Says (NYT)

By John M. Broder

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Colin L. Powell, in his last face-to-face meeting with President Bush before stepping down as secretary of state in January 2005, tried to impress upon him one last time the dangers he saw the United States facing in Iraq, according to a new Powell biography.

The insurgency was growing and the country was spiraling into sectarian bloodshed, Mr. Powell warned. Elections in Iraq would not solve the problems, and the president's ability to act decisively was being crippled by divisions within his own administration, according to the account in "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell" (Knopf, 2006) by Karen DeYoung, an associate editor at The Washington Post. Mr. Bush appeared disengaged, the book says, and brushed off Mr. Powell's complaints about dysfunction in his government.

The book is among the latest accounts of the divisions in the administration as it hurtled toward war and stumbled through its aftermath. The Powell biography provides further detail on his early misgivings about the war and the size of the force assembled to fight it, doubts that have been reported in several other books, including those by Ms. DeYoung's colleague at The Post, Bob Woodward.

Despite his doubts, however, Mr. Powell never threatened to resign or go public with his complaints, according to these accounts, because such acts would betray the ethic of the loyal soldier he felt he was.

A 7,600-word excerpt from the Powell biography appears in Sunday's Washington Post Magazine. The book's publication date is Oct. 10.

Mr. Powell, who gave Ms. DeYoung several interviews for her book and encouraged others to cooperate, said in a telephone interview on Saturday that he had not read the book or the excerpts. He did not take issue with portions read to him, except to question the context of one anecdote involving an exchange with Vice President Dick Cheney.

"The real issue right now is not the various books that are out but how things are going in Iraq and Afghanistan," Mr. Powell said. He would not share his views on the current state of affairs there, however.

A White House spokesman said officials there had not read the book and would not comment.

Since leaving office last year, Mr. Powell has kept his views to himself, with a few notable exceptions. He was openly critical of the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina last year and weighed in vigorously in the debate over treatment of detainees in the war on terror.

He has quietly cooperated with Ms. DeYoung, Mr. Woodward and other authors, while keeping his counsel in public on Iraq, the broader war on terrorism and the diplomatic struggles of his successor at the State Department, Condoleezza Rice. He does not want to undermine the president, but he also wants to make sure that his point of view is accurately reflected in histories, associates said.

"It's a matter of behaving with dignity when you're out of office," said Richard L. Armitage, Mr. Powell's former deputy and his closest confidant. "You don't want to be seen as criticizing those who took your place. On differences of principle, like the Geneva Conventions, he will speak out. On differences of approach, he probably will not."

In answer to those who ask why he has not been more outspoken, Mr. Powell generally replies, "There's a war on."

The common thread of many of the recent accounts is of warnings ignored about flaws in the prewar intelligence, in the war-fighting doctrine and in plans for occupying the shattered country. Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, dismissed some of these accounts as the grumblings of people on the losing side of internal arguments.

The Powell biography fleshes out a tale already widely known in Washington of infighting among Mr. Powell, Mr. Cheney and Donald H. Rumsfeld, the secretary of defense. Mr. Powell, who served as secretary of state through Mr. Bush's first term, came out on the losing end of the majority of their arguments.

The book provides an inside account of the preparation for Mr. Powell's pivotal presentation before the United Nations six weeks before the start of the Iraq war in March 2003. Mr. Powell told Ms. DeYoung that he spent much of the five days he had to prepare for the presentation "trimming the garbage" that Mr. Cheney's staff had provided by way of evidence of Iraq's weapons programs and ties to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Powell later conceded that the United Nations speech was full of falsehoods and distorted intelligence and was a "blot" on his record.

Running throughout this book and other recent accounts are the defeats and humiliations Mr. Powell suffered in service to Mr. Bush. Though Mr. Powell remained an admired figure in America, it was not enough to protect him against attacks.

"There are people who would like to take me down," he is quoted as saying while motioning toward the White House during his last year in office. "It's been the case since I was appointed. By take down, I mean, 'keep him in his place.' "

The Washington Post, September 30, 2006

Colin Powell's most significant moment turned out to be his lowest

ON WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 2004, eight days after the president he served was elected to a second term, Secretary of State Colin Powell received a telephone call from the White House at his State Department office. The caller was not President Bush but Chief of Staff Andrew Card, and he got right to the point.

"The president would like to make a change," Card said, using a time-honored formulation that avoided the words "resign" or "fire." He noted briskly that there had been some discussion of having Powell remain until after Iraqi elections scheduled for the end of January, but that the president had decided to take care of all Cabinet changes sooner rather than later. Bush wanted Powell's resignation letter dated two days hence, on Friday, November 12, Card said, although the White House expected him to stay at the State Department until his successor was confirmed by the Senate.

After four long years, Powell had anticipated the end of his service and sometimes even longed for it. He had never directly told the president but thought he had made clear to him during the summer of 2004 that he did not intend to stay into a second term.

There had been public speculation as the election drew near that the president might ask the secretary of state to reenlist, at least temporarily. Powell was still the most popular member of Bush's team, far more popular with the public than the president himself. Senior Powell aides were convinced that the secretary anticipated an invitation to stay, and they were equally certain that he intended to accept. The approaching elections in Iraq, hints of progress in the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and the rumored departure of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, a principal Powell nemesis, made the next six months look like a rare period of promise for diplomacy.

The president himself made no contact with Powell after Card's call. For two days, the only person at the State Department Powell told about it was his deputy and friend of decades, Richard Armitage. Powell dropped off his resignation letter, as instructed, after typing it himself on his home computer. (The White House later pointed out a typo and sent it back to be redone.) Loath to reveal either surprise or insult, he used the letter to claim the decision to leave as his own.

"Dear Mr. President:" he wrote. "As we have discussed in recent months, I believe that now that the election is over the time has come for me to step down as Secretary of State . . . effective at your pleasure."

He was pleased, Powell said, to "have been part of a team that launched the Global War Against Terror, liberated the Afghan and Iraqi people, brought the attention of the world to the problem of proliferation, reaffirmed our alliances, adjusted to the Post-Cold War World and undertook major initiatives to deal with the problem of poverty and disease in the developing world. In these and in so many other areas, your leadership was the driving force of our success."

AFTER HIS DEPARTURE FROM THE STATE DEPARTMENT IN JANUARY 2005, Powell traveled the lecture circuit, making paid speeches on leadership and U.S. foreign policy to corporate boards and industry conventions. He never spoke publicly about the specific circumstances of his resignation as secretary of state except to say, when asked, that Cabinet reshuffles were normal at the end of a four-year mandate, and that his departure had been a "mutual decision" between him and the president.

He artfully brushed aside inquiries about the many published accounts of deep ideological schisms that had rent Bush's national security team throughout the first term and the private humiliations he reportedly had endured at the hands of powerful colleagues.

Audiences often asked about his public role in promoting and defending what many now consider to be the most ill-advised act of Bush's presidency: the March 2003 invasion of Iraq. Powell usually offered a tepid defense, allowing only that he wished there had been more troops committed to the war and its aftermath, and a better plan to rebuild the country.

Powell had thrown his considerable personal and professional reputation behind the administration's charges that Iraq possessed chemical, biological and perhaps even nuclear weapons, and posed an imminent threat to the United States. In a crucial speech to the United Nations Security Council six weeks before the invasion was launched, he had single-handedly convinced many skeptical Americans that the threat posed by Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein was real.

But the war had gone sour almost from the moment U.S. troops rolled triumphantly into Baghdad two months later. Powell's credibility had been seriously undermined when the weapons he cited as the main justification for invasion turned out not to exist.

No one in his legions of admirers wanted to believe that Powell had been duped by the White House -- or, worse yet, that he had knowingly betrayed the nation's trust. Many assumed that he had privately argued against such a clearly misguided adventure and been overruled.

In fact, Powell had never advised against the Iraq invasion, although he had warned Bush of the difficulties and counseled patience. He had no reason to resign over Iraq, he told questioners. But the larger mystery of his tenure as the nation's chief diplomat, fourth in line for succession to the presidency, remained.

When Bush selected Powell as his secretary of state in December 2000, it was seen as a stroke of political genius that instantly assuaged concerns at home and abroad about the president-elect's conspicuous lack of foreign policy experience. As national security adviser to one president and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under two more, Powell had helped guide the nation through the end of the Cold War and had brought the military to victory in the Persian Gulf War. By the time he retired from the Army as a four-star general in 1993, he was a national icon of wise leadership -- the "most trusted man in America," according to polls.

Yet Powell had constantly found himself on the losing side of regular ideological combat inside the Bush administration, particularly against Rumsfeld and the powerful vice president, Dick Cheney, over Iraq and a host of other foreign policy issues. Though Powell had scored some victories, the rumored humiliations had been real. He had been purposely cut out of major foreign policy decisions more than once, and his advice often had gone unheeded or been only grudgingly accepted by the president. Why hadn't he resigned?

The easy answer had the virtue of truth: Soldiers didn't quit when they disagreed with the decisions of their commanders. The fact that he had been out of uniform for nearly a decade was irrelevant to Powell; he would be a soldier until he drew his last breath.

AS TEXAS GOV. GEORGE W. BUSH BEGAN HIS CAMPAIGN FOR THE PRESIDENCY IN 1999, Powell's initial impression was that Bush was "still getting his sea legs" on foreign policy and national security issues. Powell knew "Sonny," as he referred to him, only in passing, and his private preference was for another Republican candidate: Arizona Sen. John McCain, a fellow military officer and Vietnam veteran.

But Powell had served in the administration of Bush's father and considered himself part of the extended Bush family, with the personal loyalty that kinship entailed. "It wasn't as if I was a stranger, or that anybody had to worry or could imagine that I would not be for Sonny when the time came," he later reflected. He wrote a $1,000 check to McCain and contributed an equal amount to Bush.

Worried that Powell would outshine their candidate and suspicious of his Republican credentials, Bush's handlers ignored him for most of the campaign -- even as they regularly implied to the media that the respected general was a behind-the-scenes member of the governor's brain trust. Once McCain was vanquished in the Republican primaries and Bush began a head-to-head battle against Democrat Al Gore, the campaign hinted that Powell would accompany Bush on fact-finding trips overseas and would become his secretary of state. But no one on the Bush team ever approached Powell about such a trip, and there was no substantive discussion of a Cabinet position.

Powell later recalled that the only conversations he and Bush had had about foreign affairs came just weeks before the election, in the back seats of cars between events on the four days they had campaigned together that fall. He had no memory of an explicit invitation from Bush to serve in his Cabinet. Once the U.S. Supreme Court declared the Florida recount officially over in early December, Powell later said, "It just sort of happened as it was assumed to happen."

On December 16, three days after Gore conceded defeat, Powell flew to Bush's ranch in Texas to be unveiled as his first Cabinet nominee.

Powell and Cheney stood on either side of the president-elect as he read from prepared remarks to reporters gathered in a Crawford school auditorium. Turning to Powell, Bush invoked Harry Truman's tribute to his own iconic secretary of state, retired Army general George Marshall: " ' He is a tower of strength and common sense. When you find somebody like that, you have to hang on to them.' I have found such a man." When reporters later asked Bush about tears they had seen in his eyes, he replied that it was an emotional moment because "I so admire Colin Powell -- I love his story."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE SAW THE PRESIDENT FREQUENTLY, THOUGH RARELY ALONE. Powell found Bush better-spoken and more thoughtful in private than his public posturing as a rough-hewn, plain-spoken Texan would indicate, although he found Bush's fidgety impatience irritating, along with his tendency to interrupt everyone, from his Cabinet officers to visiting heads of state. While the president publicly praised the secretary's abilities and stature, their relationship remained stiff and formal.

Powell insisted to disbelieving aides that Bush listened to, and even acted on, his advice. "The president has good instincts . . . an instinctual grasp" of issues, he often told them. But he usually followed with an acknowledgment that Bush "has got these rough edges -- his cowboy, Texan rough edges -- and when he gets them exposed, there are other people who know how to use them" to their advantage.

Time and time again during the administration's bumpy first year, Powell had seen Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney intervene to nudge a willing Bush away from moderation and diplomacy, and toward a hard line on foreign policy issues from

North Korea to the Middle East. After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks by al-Qaeda on New York and Washington, their attention turned sharply toward Iraq, and by the following summer it was clear that the administration was headed toward war with Saddam Hussein.

Powell found little evidence to support thinly veiled White House suggestions that Hussein had had a hand in the September 11 attacks. But he saw no reason to doubt the CIA's assessment, fervidly promoted and expanded upon by Cheney and the Defense Department, that the Iraqi leader had stockpiles of chemical, biological and perhaps even nuclear weapons, which he was ready to hand over to terrorists bent on destruction of the United States.

Powell's own war to drive Iraq out of Kuwait in 1991 had been fought with half a million U.S. troops, broad foreign support and a U.N. mandate. He believed the decision to invade was Bush's to make, but that international backing was essential for both political and military success. In August 2002, he succeeded in convincing Bush -- for once, over Cheney's objections -- that there would be no multinational support unless the administration first visibly tried to tame Hussein without war.

It took five months for Powell's efforts at the U.N. Security Council to craft a solution short of war to reach the point of collapse, caught in the crossfire of administration intransigence, international mistrust of Bush's justification and motives, and Hussein's perfidy. As the Pentagon's war plans were completed and March 2003 was secretly set as the internal deadline for invasion, Bush still found himself with little foreign support and an uncertain American public.

"We've really got to make the case" against Hussein, Bush told Powell in an Oval Office meeting in late January, "and I want you to make it." Only Powell had the "credibility to do this," Bush said. "Maybe they'll believe you." It was a direct order from his commander in chief, and it never occurred to Powell to question it.

He was told that the case had already been put together by the White House, and he assumed that with a little tweaking he could turn it into a speech that would fit his voice and style. He was taken aback on Tuesday, January 28, when he received the bulk of the document, a 48-page, single-spaced compilation of Hussein's alleged weapons of mass destruction program, replete with drama, rhetorical devices and a kitchen sink full of allegations. The most extreme version of every charge the administration had made about Hussein, the document had been written, Powell concluded, under the tutelage of Cheney's chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who shared all of his boss's hard-line views and then some.

Delivery of the speech had been set for the following Wednesday, February 5. Bush planned to announce the date that very night in his State of the Union address to Congress. Acutely aware that he would be selling his own reputation as much as the specific facts, Powell picked up the telephone to tell Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security adviser, that he needed more time to get the speech into shape.

"Condi, please," Powell implored, "let's just tell the president that we're going to put in the State of the Union that Secretary Powell will be going to the U.N. next week. Don't put a date."

"She said, 'Right, right, of course,' " Powell recalled, "and she runs away to change the speech. Then runs back about five minutes later" to call him and say, " ' There's good news and bad news. The good news is we can change the speech.' " The bad news, she said, was that the White House had already told the media, in a preview of the State of the Union address, that Powell's presentation would be made on February 5.

"I could have gotten two more days," Powell later said wistfully. "Whether it would have made any difference or not, I don't know."

"HERE YOU GO," POWELL SAID, as he dropped the White House document on the desk of his chief of staff, Lawrence Wilkerson. Wilkerson quickly agreed it read more like a badly written novel than something designed to persuade the world. That afternoon, he assembled a State Department team-- including speechwriter Lynne Davidson and Barry Lowenkron, a senior CIA officer before he joined Powell's policy planning staff -- to set up shop at CIA headquarters, across the Potomac River in Virginia. They would examine the evidence themselves and turn the document into what Wilkerson called "a Colin Powell speech." Cheney aide John Hannah and William Tobey, the counterproliferation director at the White House National Security Council, would meet them there to answer any questions.

"We were going out to the agency and live there until we got the presentation ready," Wilkerson later said.

Their job was to make the most convincing, evidence-backed case possible. Powell had little more than a cursory knowledge of the intelligence underlying some of the most damning charges, but in recent months, as pressure built inside the administration and his frustration with the United Nations grew, Powell's language on Iraq had become almost as loose as Cheney's. In a speech to an international economic conference just the week before, he had made charges that his own State Department analysts questioned, mentioning allegations that Iraq had attempted to import uranium and nuclear-related equipment, as well as the presumed ties between Hussein and al-Qaeda.

But that had been only an indictment; this would have to be a complete, trial-worthy prosecution, designed to convince a skeptical jury that capital punishment, in the form of decapitating the Iraqi regime, was warranted.

In addition to proving the charges against Iraq, Wilkerson believed, they had to protect Powell's integrity against those within the administration who had long been out to tarnish it. There was a widespread belief among the secretary's loyal aides -- privately shared by Powell himself, although he brushed it off as meaningless political gamesmanship in conversations with them -- that both White House political adviser Karl Rove and Cheney had actively plotted to undermine him for the past three years. Powell had laughed when he described to his aides how the vice president, after a discussion of the upcoming U.N. speech, had poked him jocularly in the chest and said, "You've got high poll ratings; you can afford to lose a few points." Cheney's idea of Powell's U.N. mission, Wilkerson thought, was to "go up there and sell it, and we'll have moved forward a peg or two. Fall on your damn sword and kill yourself, and I'll be happy, too."

BY THE NEXT DAY, Wilkerson and his team were huddled in the CIA director's conference room, taking the document apart sentence by sentence. Things were not going well. Hannah had brought a clipboard with a three-inch stack of paper that he thumbed through to cite the origin of each allegation -- reports from the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency, foreign intelligence, the Iraqi National Congress and even newspaper articles.

CIA Director George Tenet and his deputy, John McLaughlin -- backed up by Robert Walpole, the chief CIA officer for nuclear programs; Lawrence Gershwin, the agency's top adviser on "technical" intelligence; and several other specialists -- were constantly dispatching aides to find the original source material.

In some instances, the "evidence" was, in fact, found in an official intelligence report, but only as unconfirmed information that did not appear in the report's conclusions. "They had left out all the caveats, all the qualifiers," Wilkerson recalled. In a few instances, he thought, they had even changed the meaning of the intelligence. A Senate investigation of the speechwriting process conducted after the invasion would later conclude that the Powell team had had to eliminate "information that the White House had added . . . gathered from finished and raw intelligence," some of which had come from only a single source with no corroboration at all.

By late afternoon, Tenet and Wilkerson agreed to put the White House draft aside and start over, basing the speech on a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq that had been compiled by the CIA the previous fall.

That night, after the senior CIA and White House officials had left for the day, Wilkerson and his colleagues watched a film he had borrowed from the State Department archives of Adlai Stevenson's historic presentation to the Security Council at the height of the Cuban missile crisis in 1962.

The Soviet Union had angrily denied charges that it had deployed nuclear-armed missiles on the island 90 miles off the Florida coast. Stevenson, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations at the time, had responded with irrefutable proof in the form of 26 grainy, poster-size black-and-white photographs of missile sites shot from a U-2 reconnaissance plane, displayed on easels at the front of the council chamber for all the world to see. That "Stevenson moment," Wilkerson told them, was the effect they were after.

Powell, Libby and Stephen Hadley, Rice's deputy, joined the process the next day.

Cheney had called Powell to say he hoped the secretary would "take a good look at Scooter's stuff." State Department spokesman Richard Boucher, who accompanied Powell to the CIA sessions, later recalled Libby himself appealing to Powell to look more carefully at the now-discarded White House material. "Powell said: 'I don't want to. I want to use what Larry's been working on.' "

They settled into a routine over the next few days. The CIA turned over the office suite of the National Intelligence Council -- the internal organization that coordinated with other members of the intelligence community to write National Intelligence Estimates -- to Wilkerson and the others engaged in the nitty-gritty of composing the speech and providing material to the graphic designers lodged in the agency's basement. At around 5 p.m., the writing and research team would move to Tenet's conference room with senior officials, eventually including Rice and Armitage, to spend hours going over the new text and verifying the sourcing for Powell.

Powell insisted that they eliminate any intelligence that had come from Ahmed Chalabi, an Iraqi exile favored by the Pentagon and the vice president's office, but widely mistrusted as a charlatan within the State Department. Powell was told by the CIA that evidence that Hussein had built mobile laboratories to conceal his biological weapons programs -- one of the most damning charges -- had been corroborated by four separate sources, including an Iraqi chemical engineer, a civil engineer and an Iraqi military defector. It was, Tenet said, "totally reliable information."

They argued over how to interpret intercepted communications about Iraq's weapons between Iraqi military officers. None seemed definitive, and Wilkerson was worried that they might not mean what the analysts said they meant. But amid the scant information the CIA officials were willing to declassify for public consumption, they said this was the best they had.

The team examined satellite imagery said to reveal prohibited items. Powell was shown, and rejected, a grainy picture of what analysts said was an unmanned aerial vehicle (UAV) site near Basra. It was impossible to tell where it was or even what it was, he argued. Instead, he approved a U.N. photograph of a generic Iraqi UAV, taken years earlier, to illustrate charges that Hussein was developing drones that could spray deadly weapons of mass destruction on population centers.

CIA analysts showed the team additional photographs they said conclusively revealed chemical weapons production and storage facilities, but then insisted that the pictures were too sensitive to be used in a public presentation. Those they were willing to release often appeared -- at least to the uninitiated in the room -- to illustrate nothing more than trucks parked beside buildings. "Don't you have a picture of chemical weapons canisters being moved around?" Boucher later recalled asking Tenet. "Something we can point to and say: 'That's a chemical weapon.' " Tenet replied that no country had left prohibited weapons "out on the lawn" since the Cuban missile crisis. "They know we're looking at them. So we have to go with other things that tell us what they're doing."

They spent hours discussing the aluminum tubes Hussein had tried to import. The Energy and State departments continued to disagree with the CIA's assessment that the tubes were designed for nuclear enrichment. McLaughlin, who had brought one of the intercepted tubes to the table and rolled it back and forth as they argued, insisted that the CIA analysis was correct. The agency, Powell later recalled, "pulled in their experts and swore on a stack of Bibles that they'd done every analysis imaginable, and [the tubes] simply were not for rockets, but for [uranium] centrifuges." The tubes stayed in the speech, although with a brief mention of the disagreement among U.S. government agencies as to their purpose. (U.S. investigators in Iraq after the war later concluded they were meant for rockets.)

Bush had referred in his State of the Union address to Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Africa -- the same information the CIA had successfully argued should be excised from a speech he gave the previous October because of questionable sources. No one suggested that it be included in Powell's presentation.

The White House document detailing Hussein's ties to terrorism was, if anything, even more problematic than the portion on weapons of mass destruction.

Powell retreated with Tenet to the director's private office to talk through "what we really know" about the relationship between Iraq and al-Qaeda. Powell was shown the transcript of an interrogation of a captured Osama bin Laden aide who swore that al-Qaeda operatives had received biological and chemical weapons training from Iraq, and the charge became a lengthy portion of the speech. (A year after the invasion, the agency acknowledged that the information had come from a single source who had been branded a liar by U.S. intelligence officials long before Powell's presentation.)

Tempers began to fray as the sessions continued into the weekend. Tenet and McLaughlin became irritated with Hadley, who kept pressing to reinsert jettisoned White House language and information. Powell exploded at McLaughlin, who supplied tortured, five-minute answers to seemingly simple questions. Increasingly, the secretary looked to Tenet for reassurance. "George would give the kind of answers the secretary liked," Wilkerson recalled. "Whether you liked that 'slam-dunk' language or not, George, to his credit, would say, 'Absolutely, Mr. Secretary, I stand by that.' "

Powell later recalled that most of their time was spent "trimming the garbage" of the White House's overwrought verbiage and uncorroborated specifics from the speech. Once that was done, Wilkerson concluded long afterward, "what we were all involved in -- groupthink isn't the right word -- it was a process of putting the data to points in the speech rather than challenging the data itself." As they probed for proof of Hussein's lies, no one thought of looking for evidence that might have raised questions about their assumptions that the weapons existed.

WHEN HE ARRIVED IN NEW YORK ON MONDAY AFTERNOON, Powell was as nervous as Wilkerson had ever seen him. He was worried that the language in the speech was still too methodical and technical to win over an audience. Powell's best performances were modeled on what he had learned as a young instructor at Fort Benning and later at the Pentagon: Use a map or some slides, a rough outline or a few key phrases, and then speak naturally. He always knew his material cold, but it was technique that clinched a sale. This time, however, each sentence had been carefully crafted and debated ad nauseam, and he was going to have to read directly from the text.

On Tuesday night, the team had a final, full-dress rehearsal. The cafeteria on the top floor of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations had been reconfigured into a mock-up of the Security Council chamber. Powell used a stopwatch to check his timing, clicking it off every time someone interrupted with a question or comment. The speech was 75 minutes long.

When he finished, the tension of the last several days seemed to dissipate like the air escaping a balloon, leaving him calm and tired. He believed he had done everything he could do. Departing for his room at the Waldorf, where he hoped to get a good night's sleep, he reminded Tenet that "you're going to be there with me tomorrow." He expected the CIA director to sit in full view of the television cameras, just behind him at the Security Council table. Tenet replied, only half-jokingly, that he was the one who would have to face the intelligence committees in Congress if there were any mistakes. Powell told his executive assistant, Craig Kelly, and Boucher to make sure that Tenet was waiting in the side room they would pass through on their way into the Security Council chamber the next morning. Later, he changed his mind and called Tenet to tell him he would swing by the CIA director's hotel and pick him up on the way to the United Nations, just to make sure there were no glitches.

On Wednesday, February 5, Powell entered the chamber just before 10:30 a.m., smiling and stopping to shake hands as he made his way across the floor. With war hanging in the balance, and the power and prestige of the United States on full display, it was a moment of high drama that owed as much to the player as to the play. A nationwide poll released just that morning had found that "when it comes to U.S. policy toward Iraq," Americans trusted Powell more than Bush by 63 to 24 percent.

"I cannot tell you everything that we know," he began after a brief introduction. "But what I can share with you, when combined with what all of us have learned over the years, is deeply troubling." The facts and Iraq's behavior "demonstrate that Saddam Hussein and his regime have made no effort -- no effort -- to disarm as required by the international community."

"My colleagues," Powell said, "every statement I make today is backed up by sources, solid sources. These are not assertions. What we are giving you are facts and conclusions based on solid intelligence."

The next day, opinion polls indicated that national opinion had shifted literally overnight; most Americans surveyed said they believed an invasion was justified to protect the nation. Those closest to Powell were relieved, but worried about both him and the nation. His wife, Alma, had a sense of foreboding; her husband, she thought, was being used by the White House. Powell's daughter Linda, who had listened to the speech on the radio, had found his performance unsettling. His voice was strained, she thought, as if he were trying to inject passion into the dry words through the sheer force of his will.

Wilkerson, who had left the United Nations immediately after the speech and returned to his hotel room to fall into a deep sleep, awoke depressed. Later, when it became clear that much of the speech on which he had worked so hard was based on lies, he would come to think of that week as "the lowest moment of my life." Back in Washington, he ordered special plaques with Powell's signature made up for the State Department aides who had worked so hard to make the presentation happen.

When they were handed out, Powell asked Wilkerson why he hadn't ordered one for himself. Wilkerson replied that he didn't want one.

AS 2004 BEGAN, U.S. TROOPS WERE HEADED TOWARD A SECOND YEAR IN THE IRAQI QUAGMIRE. No weapons of mass destruction had yet been found, and each day's news brought fresh indications that the administration had exaggerated its case against Hussein. Powell's own prominent role came under increasing question. It was now clear that "a lot of probables, a lot of maybes" had been left out of the assessment of Iraq's capabilities, a reporter confronted him. Given a second chance, would he have "rephrased" his U.N. speech?

"No," Powell replied firmly. "I knew exactly the circumstances under which I was presenting that speech . . . The whole world would be watching, and there would be those who would applaud every word, and there would be those who were going to be skeptical of every word." Whatever doubts were now being raised, he said, the basic conclusions had been solid. "I am confident of what I presented last year. The intelligence community is confident of the material they gave me; I was representing them . . . they stand behind it."

But on Friday, January 23, the CIA announced without explanation that David Kay, the head of its Iraq Survey Group hunting for weapons of mass destruction, was being replaced. Later that day, Kay told reporters he doubted the weapons existed. When Congress demanded answers, Kay said the same thing.

As Powell flew the next day to attend a presidential inauguration in the Republic of Georgia, journalists aboard his plane asked him to reconcile his U.N. speech with Kay's conclusions. "You said a year ago that you thought there was between 100 and 500 tons of chemical weapons [in Iraq]," one reporter said. "Who's right?"

"I think the answer to the question is I don't know yet," Powell replied.

"What is the open question is: how many stocks they had, if any? And if they had any, where did they go? And if they didn't have any, then why wasn't that known beforehand?"

Powell thought there was no sense denying the obvious questions Kay had raised. But it was the first doubt that any senior administration official had publicly expressed about the central justification for the war. The story made headlines around the world, and an agitated Condoleezza Rice called him the next morning in Georgia. Powell was not surprised; it was not the first time that the White House had blown up at him over what he considered honest comment. Rice, he later recalled, was usually the one to make the call. "She'd say, 'Oh, we've got a problem, what are we going to do about this? How are we going to fix this?' "

On this issue, he thought, there was little to be done. "The fact of the matter is, you can't ignore the possibility, since the guy we sent there for eight months as our guy says there's nothing there," he later recalled telling Rice with exasperation. "So, to say there's got to be something there when he, who has been there for eight months, says there's nothing there . . . You can't do that. You've got to at least accept the possibility."

The White House, he advised, should "just be quiet" for now.

ON HIS RETURN, POWELL SPENT THE WEEKEND carefully reading Kay's congressional testimony, highlighting portions with a yellow marker and scribbling notes in the margins. With the first anniversary of his U.N. speech just days away, the Sunday newspapers and television talk shows were filled with comparisons between the charges he had made and Kay's conclusions.

On Monday, February 2, he arrived for an interview at The Washington Post carrying a blue folder with the marked-up testimony inside. He was "absolutely convinced" that the invasion had been the right thing to do, Powell emphatically told the two dozen reporters and editors crowded around a conference table in the newspaper's eighth-floor boardroom.

Would he still have "recommended the invasion" if Tenet had told him a year before "that there are no stockpiles?" one reporter asked.

"I don't know, because it was the stockpiles that presented the final little piece that made it more of a real and present danger and threat to the region and to the world," Powell replied. But there was no point discussing hypotheticals, he said, because "the fact of the matter" was that the CIA, as well as intelligence agencies in Britain and elsewhere, had "suggested the stockpiles were there."

But what if he had known they weren't there? the reporter pressed.

"The absence of a stockpile changes the political calculus," Powell acknowledged. "It changes the answer you get with the little formula I laid out."

To a White House already reeling from the one-two punch of Kay's conclusions and Powell's comments en route to Georgia, it was another worrisome example of the secretary of state's unwillingness to stay "on message." When his remarks appeared in The Post the next morning, "I think the whole White House operation was mad . . . the NSC, the president -- everybody was annoyed," Powell recalled. "White Houses do not respond well to immediate problems in the morning . . . all the white corpuscles race to the source of the infection, so all the white corpuscles raced to me."

After Rice's inevitable irate telephone call, presidential aides quickly began contacting the media to counteract the secretary's remarks. Annoyed but not surprised, Powell issued a White House-requested "clarification" insisting that Hussein had had the "capability and intent" to produce the weapons even if none had yet been found. Bush, he repeated, had been right to invade.

Still mulling over the situation a week later with a visitor in his dimly lit office, he criticized a persistent White House machismo that took aim at "anything . . . that suggests any weakness in the [administration's] position," regardless of common sense. That, and what he saw as a never-ending effort to humble him personally.

"There are people who would like to take me down," he said, jerking his thumb in the direction of the White House. "It's been the case since I was appointed. By take down, I mean 'keep him in his place'. . . And there are those who, whether it was me or anyone else, just love somebody getting in trouble, because it's usually to the detriment of the person getting in trouble and to the advantage of someone else."

The episode reinforced his already deep-seated disdain for politics and its practitioners. Political thought and decision-making were often polluted by ideology and the exigencies of the election cycle; soldiers breathed a purer, more rational air. "I was not trained as a politician or a think tank guy or anything else," Powell insisted. "I was trained to consider all possibilities."

"I mean, if you're attacking and suddenly you get attacked from the flank," he continued, using his hands to illustrate a military maneuver, "you don't say, 'I'm going to keep attacking straight ahead [and] ignore this new threat coming at my flank.' " He had been asked whether different information would have changed his assessment of the Iraq situation, and "all of my instincts and all of my background and training at that point said the answer to the question is, 'I'd have to reconsider.' "

He shrugged and brought his hands to rest. "But that's the way it goes."

Powell's irritation at the White House was coupled with a growing anger at the CIA. Right or wrong, at least Bush had willingly shouldered the ultimate responsibility for the decision to go to war. Powell felt he had done his own duty by privately voicing caution even as he gave the president his full support. But it was increasingly apparent that the intelligence community had been careless with the truth and hence with Powell's most precious commodity -- his credibility with the American people.

For a week after Kay's report, the CIA had continued publicly to stand by its prewar weapons assessment. But in a hastily arranged speech at Georgetown University on February 5, Tenet finally admitted the possibility of error. His "provisional bottom line," he said, was that the intelligence community had been "generally on target" in its warnings that Hussein was developing long-range missiles. But the CIA "may have overestimated the progress Hussein was making" on nuclear weapons.

As for biological weapons stockpiles and mobile laboratories, he said, "we are finding discrepancies in some claims made by human sources" to whom the agency "lacked direct access." The CIA, Tenet said, "did not ourselves penetrate the inner sanctum" of Hussein's programs but had "access to emigres and defectors" along with high-level information from "a trusted foreign partner." They were now in the process of "evaluating" questions such as, "Did we clearly tell policymakers what we knew, what we didn't know, what was not clear, and identify the gaps in our knowledge?"

Although Powell had been advised in recent months of problems with some of the intelligence sourcing, Tenet's speech was "the first time I heard that the CIA was no longer sticking behind its story" in public, he later recalled. He had been given no advance copy of the CIA director's remarks and listened in his office to a broadcast of Tenet's acknowledgment of "discrepancies" and uncertainties.

Powell stared silently at Wilkerson after Tenet finished speaking. "But the question is," Wilkerson said, reaching for a joke, "are you still friends?"

"I don't think so," Powell replied.

As the evidence continued to unravel, some in the media suggested that Powell should apologize publicly for peddling false information that had pushed the nation toward war. "Is everyone else going to apologize?" he railed within the four walls of his office. "It's not [just] me getting had. I'm not the only one who was using that intelligence . . . they all stood up in the Senate. The president stood up on this material. [British Prime Minister] Tony Blair stood up on this material . . . The whole global intelligence community bears responsibility."

But there was no denying that he had been the most visible and effective salesman. He already knew that the label would follow him around forever. "I'm the guy who will always be known as the 'Powell Briefing' . . . I'm not being defensive, because I did it. But Powell wasn't the only one."

PRESENTATION WAS NEARLY AS IMPORTANT TO POWELL AS SUBSTANCE, and after his inelegant dismissal as secretary of state, he wanted at least to control the way his departure was announced. After submitting his letter on Friday, he spent the weekend putting together a plan: He would inform his inner-office staff at exactly 8:20 a.m. the following Monday, November 15. He would tell his senior aides at their regular 8:30 staff meeting. At 10:15, he would send an e-mail to his friends and extended family. He called Card and told him he expected the White House would then publicly announce his resignation.

At midmorning Monday, the White House released five separate statements under Bush's name, reporting the resignations of the secretaries of agriculture, energy, education and state, and the head of the Republican National Committee. Each statement was three paragraphs long and titled "President Thanks [official's name]." When White House spokesman Scott McClellan briefed the media shortly after noon, all but one of the resignation questions were about Powell. Had Bush tried to persuade him to stay? Had Powell offered? If so, had the president turned him down? McClellan avoided a direct answer. "I think you saw from Secretary Powell's letter that this is a discussion that they've had for some months now, or over recent months at least . . . And Secretary Powell made a decision for his own reasons that this was now the time to leave."

The next morning, Bush nominated Rice as his new secretary of state.

Powell saw Bush regularly over the next two months, passing through the Oval Office for routine meetings that took place as if nothing had transpired. Eventually, the White House contacted his office to schedule what it described as a "farewell call" with the president. Such calls were being arranged for each departing Cabinet secretary.

When Powell saw the January 13 appointment on his calendar, his staff told him they assumed it was a goodbye photo opportunity with Bush. They suggested that perhaps he should bring his family.

"We've got a houseful of pictures," Powell replied dryly. Was he supposed to talk to the president? Or was the president supposed to talk to him?

"Am I supposed to say: 'This is what I think?' Or what?"

He didn't have to say anything, he was told. It was just a "farewell call."

As the meeting approached, the White House -- which had scheduled it in the first place -- inexplicably called the State Department to ask for "talking points" that aides could use to brief the president.

The appointed time found Powell already in the Oval Office for a routine meeting; when it concluded, he lingered as the others left. As Powell later remembered it, Bush seemed puzzled and called after his departing chief of staff, "Where you going, Andy?"

"Mr. President, I think this is supposed to be our farewell call," Powell prompted.

"Is that why Condi ain't here?" he recalled the president asking.

That was probably the reason, Powell replied.

Card walked back inside, and the three men sat down. Powell had already decided to use the opportunity -- likely his last as secretary of state -- to unload.

The war in Iraq was going south, he said after a few moments of small talk, and the president had little time left to turn it around. The administration's hope was that the upcoming election there would change the dynamics on the ground, and the Iraqi people would finally be ready and able to begin standing up to the insurgents on their own.

But the administration, he pointed out, had entertained such hopes before over the past two years -- when it had set up a new legal framework for Iraq, when it had first turned a modicum of government power over to handpicked Iraqis and when ousted dictator Saddam Hussein had been captured -- and those hopes had been dashed every time. There would be a window of about two months after the election "to start to see progress," he told Bush. "If by the first of April this insurgency is not starting to ameliorate in some way, then I think you really have a problem."

Elections, and talking about democracy, were unlikely to stop the insurgency, he said. Only the fledgling Iraqi army could do that, and it was unclear whether it would ever succeed. Its competence was not just a matter of training, Powell said; it was a question of whether the troops believed in what they were fighting for.

Powell warned about serious internal problems in Bush's own administration, saying that the power he had given the Pentagon to meddle in diplomacy on issues as widespread as North Korea, Iraq and the Arab-Israeli conflict, along with poisoned personal relations between his State and Defense departments, were seriously undermining the president's diplomacy. Bush dismissed his concern. It wasn't any worse, he said, than the legendary battles between State and Defense during the Reagan administration.

The session ended with a cordial handshake, and the secretary returned to the State Department. "That was really strange," he reported to Wilkerson. "The president didn't know why I was there."

U.S. Military Is Still Waiting For Iraqi Forces To 'Stand Up' (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Security Personnel Increase, but Insurgency Is Unabated

The strategy in Iraq, President Bush has said often over the past year, is to stand down the U.S. military as Iraq's security forces stand up.

By strict numbers, the Iraqi side of that equation is almost complete. Training programs have developed more than 300,000 members of the Iraqi army and national police, close to the desired number of homegrown forces. Yet as that number has grown, so, too, has violence in Iraq. The summer was worse than ever, with July the deadliest month in three years, according to U.S. military data.

With the insurgency undiminished and Iraqi forces seemingly unable to counter it, U.S. commanders say they expect to stay at the current level of U.S. troops -- about 140,000 -- until at least next spring. That requirement is placing new strains on service members who leave Iraq and then must prepare to return a few months later. Tours of duty have been extended for two brigades in Iraq to boost troop levels.

So is the "stand down as they stand up" policy defunct? Not according to the Bush administration. But the meaning of the phrase appears to have changed, as leaders have begun shifting the blame for Iraq's problems away from the U.S. military and onto the country's own social and governmental institutions.

When Bush began invoking "stand up, stand down" in 2005, he repeatedly indicated that he was talking about getting Iraqi defense forces trained and on the job. For example, on Nov. 15, he said, "The plan [is] that we will train Iraqis, Iraqi troops, to be able to take the fight to the enemy. And as I have consistently said, as the Iraqis stand up, we will stand down."

More recently, Bush has insisted that "the 'stand up, stand down' still holds." But he added more conditions, saying the troops can come home "when our commanders say . . . the Iraqi government is capable of defending itself and sustaining itself and governing itself."

Military officers and other experts interviewed in recent days said that the Iraqi training program has worked but that its success is undercut by the lack of strong Iraqi political leadership. "You fix the government, you fix the problem," said an Army battalion commander who has seen hard fighting near Baghdad this summer.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld landed squarely in this camp recently. Referring to numbers of trained Iraqi forces, he told a reporter: "If we look at it one-dimensionally like that, there's no answer to the question, because the problem is not a military problem. In fact, the reality is that it's a political governance problem, and it's a governmental problem, and it's a problem of reconciliation."

In this view, it doesn't matter how many Iraqi troops are trained if there is no government to lead them. "I believe that you could have a million Iraqis within the Iraqi security forces and still be ineffective against the insurgents," said an Army colonel who recently returned from a year in Iraq.

Besides weapons and training, an army needs a reason to fight -- and so far, the Iraqi government has not been as persuasive as the insurgency or the militias in providing that key element. "There isn't yet an Iraq to defend," explained Thomas Donnelly, a defense expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "A nation, as well as an army, needs to be stood up."

Other military insiders say that regardless of Iraq's broader problems, the security forces remain an issue because they are not ready for action. The training program may have achieved raw numbers, but it needs more time to finish the job.

"I believe that our U.S. forces need to be here at these numbers for three to five more years, to be honest," concluded Army Maj. Daniel Morgan, a 101st Airborne officer who just completed his second tour in Iraq.

When asked about training of Iraqis, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander for Iraq and the rest of the Middle East, spoke of an even longer term. "It's a generational level of work, not something that's going to be done overnight," he told PBS's Jim Lehrer last week. "And we're making good progress."

This school of thought emphasizes that "standing down" would apply only to U.S. combat forces. Even if Iraqi forces eventually stand up in the promised numbers and fight effectively, they still will need U.S. help in logistics, intelligence, maintenance and other specialized support functions for years to come, said an Army officer experienced in Iraq. He said he has heard from some comrades that providing such support may require a fairly substantial U.S. military presence in Iraq for as long as a decade more.

Some experts believe that the U.S. training program itself is flawed, lacking both funding and enough U.S. advisers and trainers. The training effort is "grossly insufficient, concentrated at battalion and brigade headquarters only," said retired Army Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton, who oversaw the program in 2003 and 2004. He and others believe that the effort will not really succeed until it expands to attach more advisers to smaller units, such as companies and platoons -- which Eaton said would take thousands of additional personnel.

The United States failed to send out enough really good advisers with language skills to work in the training program, added retired Marine Col. T.X. Hammes, another Iraq veteran. "Thus we train Iraqis, push them out the door and fail to support them," he said. This makes them unable to reach the real goal of providing security to Iraq, he added -- "or worse yet, due to lack of U.S. supervision, [they] become part of the problem."

Other experts say the "stand up, stand down" formula has not worked because the target number is insufficient, or because the number is the wrong measurement. The target of 325,000 trained security forces "is arguably inadequate to start with," said Bruce Hoffman, a Georgetown University defense specialist. Given the total population in unstable parts of Iraq and a standard ratio of population to security forces of 20 to 1, he said, "Iraq really needs 500,000 troops and police."

Alternatively, some say it is not the number of Iraqi troops that counts; it is the quality. " 'Standing up' is a far broader term than many have understood," argued Army Lt. Col. James Gavrilis, a counterinsurgency expert and a Special Forces officer who participated in the invasion of Iraq. "I don't think a lot of people in uniform understood that it would entail developing the quality and character of those forces as well as their numbers."

Finally, some specialists contend that "standing up" Iraqi soldiers and police forces may in fact be contributing to the current outburst of sectarian violence, because the police especially are not seen as impartial players.

"To the degree that 'standing up' a Shia-dominated force is perceived as a security threat to Sunnis, you get a stronger and stronger reaction the more you stand up," said Frank Hoffman, a strategic expert and retired Marine officer. "This may account for what you are seeing -- the sense that national institutions that do not reflect political concerns will produce more violent reactions and a greater reliance on local militias."

A Marine officer who has fought in Anbar province and an Army captain who just returned from Baghdad agreed, both saying they fear that all the U.S. military is doing is training and arming Iraqis to fight a looming civil war.

The State Of Iraq: An Update (NYT)

By Nina Kamp, Michael O'hanlon And Amy Unikewicz

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

FACTS have a way of shrinking under the weight of politics. The fierce partisan debate last week set off by the new National Intelligence Estimate on the struggle against terrorism was a case in point. Similarly, our own tracking statistics from the last four years in Iraq will provide ammunition for both supporters and critics of the war. But one fact seems clear: this year's violence was the worst since liberation, and probably the worst over all since 1991.

American troop fatalities, thankfully, declined somewhat this summer, but it is hard to view that as a positive development since much of the modest improvement was due to the reduced rate of American patrols (down from a daily average of 400 to, in the last year, 100 a year). When American forces do venture out of their base, they are in as much peril as ever. Similarly, the drastic falloff in kidnappings of foreigners primarily reflects the fact that foreigners now rarely leave the Green Zone in Baghdad. Iraqis continue to be kidnapped in large numbers.

While the economy is far from healthy, it has shown some improvement. Oil production has returned, at least for the moment, to levels seen at the end of Saddam Hussein's rule, and electricity production is at higher levels, especially outside of Baghdad. School enrollment continues to increase; childhood vaccination rates are now respectable; Iraq's media continue to flourish.

However, unemployment remains at 30 percent or more, as coalition and Iraqi authorities continue to resist the notion of adopting a Roosevelt-style public works program to mitigate joblessness. Inflation is up; private sector investment remains weak because of the security environment; gross domestic product growth has been modest and will probably slow because of the decline in global oil prices. Fuel supplies are stagnant in the face of rising demand.

Public optimism has rebounded a bit since spring, especially among Shiites and Kurds. But Iraqi optimism about the future is still not where it once was. Nor is it clear on what that optimism is based. The Iraqi government continues to flounder in attempts to rein in militias, ensure fair distribution of the nation's future oil revenue, rehabilitate former low-level Baathists into public life and rebuild the economy. On balance, the data suggest that while Iraq is not lost, the United States and its allies there are hardly winning either.

U.S. Detains Sunni Leader's Bodyguard

BAGHDAD, Sept. 30 -- The streets of Baghdad were mostly quiet Saturday, with the capital under total lockdown a day after U.S. troops arrested a bodyguard of a Sunni Arab political leader on suspicion of planning suicide bombings inside the fortified Green Zone.

The day-long curfew in this city of 7 million people was the first to ban both pedestrian and vehicle traffic since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, underscoring the security concerns enveloping Baghdad. It was requested by U.S. military officials concerned about the surge in suicide bombings and other violence since the Muslim fasting month of Ramadan began last weekend.

"There is no single reason," said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman. "What we found was that implementing curfews from time to time helps break up the cycle of violence. It seemed like a prudent measure at this time to recommend a curfew."

The measure was announced Friday night, a few hours after U.S. troops raided the residence of Adnan al-Dulaimi, the leader of the largest Sunni Arab coalition in Iraq's parliament, and took into custody his bodyguard, identified by Dulaimi's supporters as Khudir Farhan Zargan.

"Credible intelligence indicates the individual, a member of Dr. Dulaimi's personal security detachment, and seven members of the detained individual's cell were in the final stages of launching a series of [car bomb] attacks inside the International Zone, possibly involving suicide vests," the U.S. military said in a statement.

The suspect, the statement added, was linked to a car bomb-producing network based in south Baghdad and was believed to be a member of the group al-Qaeda in Iraq. U.S. soldiers searched a security trailer and the suspect's car, but did not enter Dulaimi's home, said the statement.

On Saturday, Dulaimi denied that the bodyguard had any connection to terrorists.

"In the name of God, this news is absolutely not true. This is a suspicion only," Dulaimi said on al-Arabiya television. "This guard has joined the security force one month ago, and we have not noticed anything suspicious. The investigation will prove his innocence."

Dulaimi said his rivals had provided the U.S. military with false intelligence to "corrupt" his reputation and stop his work in parliament.

"This is unacceptable, both from a legal and ethical point of view," said Hussein al-Faluji, another Sunni member of parliament. "This bodyguard does not have any credentials which enable him to get into the Green Zone."

A few hours later, the U.S. military altered its statement to say that "this operation in no way implies [Dulaimi] was associated with any illegal activity; he was not the target in this operation."

In Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood on Saturday, the main road was empty save for police cars. Some food stalls remained open, and some young residents flouted the curfew and walked on the streets. Many expressed frustration, saying the curfew would do little to ease their lives.

"My life is destroyed because of the politicians and the government," said Firas Hatem, 31. "What have we gained from the curfew? Did they destroy the militias? Have they provided us with gas or electricity, or food? The curfew has pushed prices up, and everything is expensive, and the cheapest thing is us, meaning the human being."

In Tall Afar, 40 miles west of the northern city of Mosul, a suicide bomber detonated his explosives-rigged car, killing two civilians and injuring 30.

In the southern city of Basra, provincial Gov. Mohammed al-Waeli escaped an attempt on his life Saturday morning, when gunmen attacked his convoy, wounding three of his bodyguards.

In an interview on al-Iraqiya television, Waeli said the attack was carried out by gang members who had infiltrated Basra's police.

"My bodyguards were ready for them and returned the fire, which made the attackers, whose identities are now known to us, flee," Waeli said. "We are going to prosecute them. . . . They are members of gangs who have recently joined the Major Crime Unit and are using the unit's cars and weapons."

Baghdad Is Quiet With Strict Curfew In Place (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 30 — After a troubling and deadly week, Iraq's capital was mostly silent and still on Saturday, except for the occasional whup-whup of a military helicopter overhead and the rare pedestrian testing the limits of a daylong curfew.

Uncertainty remained, however, over what exactly prompted the curfew on vehicle and pedestrian traffic, called Friday night without explanation by the Iraqi prime minister's office. Although vehicle bans have been frequent, it was the first time since the war began that pedestrians had been banned from Baghdad's streets.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a United States military spokesman, said a number of factors, including an increase in suicide bombings and the rash of violence since the start of Ramadan last week, had led military officials to ask the Iraqi government to impose the curfew.

"We've found curfews implemented intermittently have been very effective in the past," he said.

But Brig. Qasim al-Moussawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi Defense Ministry, referred to a more specific threat. "We have information about a group of terrorists planning to attack civilians by car bombs," he said.

Some residents flouted the curfew on Saturday, shopping for groceries for the evening meal to break the fast for Ramadan, running errands and loitering on the street, albeit mostly off the main roads.

In Toubchi, a mostly Shiite neighborhood in western Baghdad, a line of people waited at a bakery on Saturday afternoon to buy bread, and a few shoppers stopped at the lone pharmacy that was open. Other people headed to prayer at the mosque.

In Adhamiya, a Sunni neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad, the shops were mostly closed.

Ahmed Khalaf was driving alone on Army Canal Highway, which bisects eastern Baghdad, but was puzzled by how empty it was, when he was stopped at a police checkpoint. He had gone to sleep and woke up without turning on the news. He said he had told the officers, "I have no idea about the curfew."

The police were understanding and let him go, he said, telling him that others had been making the same mistake.

The curfew was announced Friday night shortly after news began to leak on Iraqi television that the compound of Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the largest bloc of Sunni parties, had been raided by the United States military and that a man connected to him was being held on suspicion of helping to plan a bombing.

The United States military said in a statement on Saturday that it had detained a member of Mr. Dulaimi's security detail, identified by Mr. Dulaimi as Khodar Farhan Ghargan, 35. The guard is believed to be a member of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the statement said, adding that the government had intelligence indicating that he was part of a terrorist cell that was planning a series of attacks, possibly using suicide vests, in the heavily guarded Green Zone.

The troops did not enter Mr. Dulaimi's residence, the statement said, but did search the guard's car and the security trailer. Colonel Johnson, the American spokesman, said no explosive devices had been found.

Military officials later issued a second statement emphasizing that the detention of Mr. Dulaimi's bodyguard "in no way implies" that the Sunni political leader was associated with "any illegal activity."

Mr. Dulaimi denounced the charges against his guard, comparing them to the faulty American intelligence about illicit Iraqi weapons before the war. "This information caused them to occupy Iraq," he said. "Now they are doing the same thing with me just to stop my hard work for Iraqi unity."

But Friday's raid is likely to bolster accusations long made by rival Shiite political leaders against their Sunni Arab counterparts that their guards and staff are insurgents. The American military has expressed concerns that Iraqi political parties have been largely unwilling to sever their links with the militias that many command.

Mithal al-Alousi, a respected independent Sunni Arab, said most Iraqis knew that many political leaders were also militia commanders. "The government should work to investigate this incident and if they discover that Dulaimi knew about this stuff in his house, they should arrest him," he said. "There is no parliamentary immunity for killers."

Violence persisted elsewhere in the country. In the northern city of Tal Afar, a car bomb exploded at 8 a.m., killing two people and wounding 33 others, all civilians. In Kirkuk, a car bomb exploded at 8:30 a.m. at the home of a police official, wounding him, his wife and four others. Another one exploded at 8 p.m. at the home of another police official, wounding 17 civilians. An American soldier from the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, Second Infantry Division, died in a Humvee accident near Mosul.

But at Yarmuk Hospital in western Baghdad, the only patients who came in Saturday had complained of illness, an emergency worker said. It was a rare respite from the normal.

Baghdad Shut Down On Suspicion Of Attack (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, October 1, 2006

The U.S. military said a captured al-Qaida suspect and members of his cell were "in the final stages" of planning an attack on the Green Zone. An unprecedented curfew prompted by the arrest left millions of Baghdadis stranded at home on Saturday without supplies during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

The U.S. military said the suspected al-Qaida in Iraq member was arrested late Friday at the home of senior Sunni Arab political leader Adnan al-Dulaimi, where he was working as a personal bodyguard.

Al-Dulaimi is a member of the Iraqi Accordance Front — the largest Sunni coalition in the 275-member parliament, where it holds 44 seats — and the military was quick to distance the politician from the raid, stressing that he was "not the target."

"This operation in no way implies Dr. al-Dulaimi was associated with any illegal activity," the military said, adding that the suspect was captured in a security trailer at al-Dulaimi's home.

After the arrest, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was advised by the U.S. military to shut down the capital and order its 7 million residents to stay at home.

"They have information terrorists entered Baghdad," Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Kaim Khalaf told The Associated Press. "The prime minister agreed to give our security forces the freedom of movement to raid certain places."

The curfew was rare both in its scope and severity, catching many residents of Baghdad by surprise. Many people are fasting during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, eating and drinking only after sunset, and they were caught without supplies and fresh bread — a Baghdad staple. Most residents did not have a chance to shop on Friday because of a regular, weekly vehicle curfew to prevent attacks against mosques during prayers.

The U.S. military said the suspected terrorist, identified as Khudhir Farhan, and seven members of his al-Qaida cell "were in the final stages of launching a series" of car bomb attacks "possibly involving suicide vests."

"The detained individual is suspected of involvement in the planning of a multi-vehicle suicide operation inside Baghdad's International Zone," the military said, referring to the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Khalaf said the "intelligence information we received was that there are car bombs and that terrorist Takfiris wearing belts with explosives have entered Baghdad to target civilians." Takfiri is a reference to Sunni Arab extremists.

The Green Zone, also known as the International Zone, is located in downtown Baghdad and is surrounded by layers of concrete blast walls and guarded by Coalition forces and the Iraqi army. The Iraqi government lives and works there, the parliament is housed there and it is also home to the U.S. embassy.

As a bodyguard for al-Dulaimi, Farhan could have had access to the parliament, often attended by the prime minister and his staff, and possibly to offices used by Cabinet members. It is doubtful he could ever have reached the heavily guarded U.S. embassy compound inside the Green Zone.

Farhan also was suspected of having links to a car bomb network operating in the southern area of Baghdad, the military said.

Immediately after his arrest Friday afternoon, al-Dulaimi denied the bodyguard had any terrorist links, but when contacted by the AP on Saturday he acknowledged he could have been mistaken.

"That individual joined my residence as a guard no more than a month ago, therefore I haven't got complete data about his background," al-Dulaimi said. "Anyhow, they are only suspicions about his involvement, which have not been proved."

The U.S. command said al-Dulaimi "did meet the force and offered his home to be searched, which was declined as the operation had no association with him. They only searched the security trailer and the suspect's vehicle."

There have been fears that insurgents would try to stage a spectacular attack during Ramadan following a series of calls from al-Qaida in Iraq's new leader.

Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri, has ordered intensified attacks against Americans and the country's Shiite majority, which dominates the government and parliament.

Al-Muhajer — who is believed to have succeeded slain al-Qaida in Iraq leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi — began issuing the calls — including orders to kidnap Westerners — on Sept. 7.

He has followed al-Zarqawi's belief that starting a sectarian war between the Shiites and Sunni Arabs is the best way to defeat the United States in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0072478

Following his calls, attacks intensified against both Shiites and the Coalition, and a senior U.S. military official said the first week of Ramadan was the worst for suicide bombings since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

Sectarian violence has surged in recent months and has brought the country to the brink of civil war.

Although Baghdad was quiet Saturday, police said violence persisted in other areas of the country.

Gunmen killed Malik Jebbar, an Iraqi man who had been working as an interpreter for the U.S. military, in an area about 60 miles south of Baghdad. Another person was killed and five others were wounded in nearby Iskandariyah when a bomb exploded in the city center.

In Tal Afar, 260 miles northwest of Baghdad, police opened fire on a suspected car bomber. The vehicle detonated, killing two and wounding 30 others, police Lt. Nejim Abdullah said.

Baghdad police on Saturday found six corpses in the eastern section of the capital, more apparent victims of the sectarian death squads that roam the city.

Two other bodies were turned in to the morgue in Kut, 100 miles southeast of Baghdad.

North of Kut, a policeman was shot and killed by unknown assailants outside his home, police said.

Iraqi Guard Arrested In Green Zone Bomb Plot (WT/AP)

By Patrick Quinn

The Washington Times/AP, October 1, 2006

BAGHDAD -- The U.S. military said yesterday that it had arrested a leading Sunni politician's security guard, who was in the final stages of preparing suicide attacks inside the heavily guarded Green Zone in central Baghdad.

An unprecedented pedestrian curfew prompted by the arrest forced millions of Baghdad residents to remain indoors yesterday, during the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

The U.S. military said the suspected al Qaeda in Iraq member was arrested late Friday at the home of senior Sunni Arab political leader Adnan al-Dulaimi, where he was working as a personal bodyguard.

Mr. al-Dulaimi is a member of the Iraqi Accordance Front -- the largest Sunni coalition in the 275-member parliament, where it holds 44 seats -- and the military was quick to distance the politician from the raid, stressing that he was "not the target."

Green Zone Suicide Plot Foiled, U.S. Says (LAT)

A Sunni official's guard is arrested on suspicion of planning to strike inside Baghdad's fortified area. Curfew is tightened in the capital.

BAGHDAD — The government clamped a 24-hour curfew on the capital Saturday shortly after U.S. forces arrested the bodyguard of a prominent Sunni leader on suspicion of plotting a suicide attack inside Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone.

A statement from the U.S. Army said the man was part of an Al Qaeda cell "in the final stages of launching a series of … attacks" that would have used several vehicles and possibly suicide vests.

It said a seven-member cell believed to be linked to vehicle bombings in south Baghdad was planning the attacks on the area that houses the Iraqi government and U.S. and other embassies under heavy military protection.

The Army did not say whether it had detained others.

The guard was arrested at the home of Adnan Dulaimi, one of the main figures in the minority Sunni bloc of parliament. Dulaimi was not under suspicion, the Army said.

U.S. and Iraqi officials denied any connection between the curfew announcement late Friday and the politically sensitive arrest. An Army spokesman said the U.S. had recommended the curfew in hopes of quelling violence that has increased during the monthlong observance of Ramadan.

"We have found these curfews are effective in bringing down the level of violence," the spokesman said. "It just seemed prudent at this time."

An Iraqi police official gave a different explanation, saying the curfew was a reaction to a plot that sounded similar to the one described by U.S. officials but was instead aimed at Baghdad residents.

"We received precise intelligence about the intentions of moving car bombs and terrorists with suicide belts to Baghdad," said Brig. Gen. Qassim Musawi, a spokesman for the Ministry of Defense.

Both the U.S. Army and Dulaimi sought to minimize political fallout from the arrest of the man, who had recently joined his personal security detail.

In television interviews, Dulaimi strongly proclaimed the innocence of the guard, accusing unnamed enemies of trying to damage his reputation and derail attempts at national reconciliation.

He said the guard, Khudhir Farhan Marjan, had no connection to terrorists and wouldn't have been hired if he had.

Even though Dulaimi was not implicated, the arrest left the lawmaker open to scrutiny over his reputed associations with Sunni Muslim insurgent groups. After initially boycotting American-sponsored elections, Dulaimi urged Sunnis to join the political process. But suspicions persist.

In January, U.S. journalist Jill Carroll was abducted and her driver killed as they were leaving Dulaimi's headquarters after the lawmaker failed to show up for a scheduled interview.

Shiite Muslim political leaders reacted cautiously to the arrest of his guard.

"This is a serious sign when the security of a high-ranking official has been infiltrated by terrorist groups," said Abbass Bayati, a spokesman for the United Iraqi Alliance, the Shiite bloc that leads the Iraqi government.

But Bayati said he would withhold judgment until an investigation was complete.

"The people and the nation really need to know the facts, so the investigation should be finished as soon as possible," Bayati said.

As Saturday's curfew began, the capital was abuzz with another rumor, that the government had called the curfew after uncovering a coup attempt by an element of the military. Officials denied it.

"These rumors are being spread by the terrorists themselves who want to shake the confidence of the Iraqi people," said Musawi, the military spokesman.

The latest curfew, which followed a Friday overnight curfew, was imposed from early Saturday until early this morning. It was widely observed. Some of the capital's 6 million people walked to work despite the curfew, taking up to two hours. But most stayed home.

The normally chaotic traffic all but vanished, leaving the streets empty except for hundreds of police and army checkpoints and American armored patrols.

Baghdad residents are accustomed to curfews, which are in force on Fridays from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. All-day curfews have been imposed intermittently, but usually with more warning.

Some residents complained of the inconvenience caused by the 11 p.m. announcement, which they said did not give them time to prepare.

"There was not enough time for us to shop for today; as you know, we shop day by day for Ramadan," said a resident of the Qadisiya neighborhood who owns a vegetable shop about two miles away. "We are out of gas today to run the generators, and we can't go out even on foot to buy gas."

No new attacks were reported in Baghdad, but police continued to tally the casualties from previous violence.

A mortar shell that landed late Thursday in Zafaraniya in the southeast part of the city killed five people.

Police said they found 12 bodies early Saturday and an additional 23 in the afternoon, all slaying victims in various neighborhoods.

DOJ_NMG_0072480

A Shiite cleric was shot to death in Diwaniya, his sister said. Two other clerics were recently killed in the city about 100 miles south of Baghdad.

Mohammed Waeli, the governor of Basra province in the south, escaped an assassination attempt. A British patrol in Basra came under fire and killed one of the attackers.

In the northern city of Mosul, the police commander survived a roadside bombing, and another bomb near a U.S. patrol critically injured five civilians, said Dr. Fadhil Abbas of Jumhouri Hospital. Authorities in Diyala province, a stronghold of the insurgency north of Baghdad, said they had arrested 39 suspected terrorists.

A suicide car bomb targeting an Iraqi army checkpoint killed two people and wounded 30 Saturday, police in the northern town of Tall Afar said.

U.S. Diplomat Defends Maliki's Strategy (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad speaks in support of the Iraqi premier's security plan.

BAGHDAD — U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Saturday that he supported the Iraqi prime minister's plan to disband sectarian militias through negotiations while using his military to go after the most extreme elements.

Khalilzad said he disagreed with recent complaints by U.S. military officials in Iraq and politicians in Washington that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki hasn't been doing enough to rein in Shiite militias implicated in thousands of death squad killings.

Khalilzad said complaints by senior U.S. military leaders that Maliki was too soft on Shiite militias affiliated with his political bloc were evidence of "tactical differences" he has with those military officials. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American military commander in Iraq, released a statement Friday disavowing the complaints.

Some commanders want to use troops to go after the militias, Khalilzad said, "but I think that as far as Gen. Casey and myself are concerned, we are in agreement that … if political engagement can produce the desired result, then so much the better."

Khalilzad said Maliki would release a "demobilize, decommission and re-integration" plan to begin the disbanding of militias by the end of the year. He also said the prime minister was working on a national reconciliation plan to bring Sunni Arab and Shiite militants into political dialogue.

But he acknowledged that there were still challenges.

"The situation remains difficult and the level of sectarian violence is high," Khalilzad said.

He said U.S. officials were working to support Iraqi efforts to reform the Interior Ministry, which is believed to have been infiltrated by militiamen involved in hundreds of alleged death squad killings.

He said the U.S. conducted an investigation of an Iraqi police detention facility in Baghdad known as Site 4, where abuses were committed against some of the more than 1,300 prisoners held there.

Several high-ranking police officials were indicted as a result of the investigation, but Khalilzad said that Interior Minister Jawad Bolani, who oversees Iraq's police force, has not acted on those indictments.

"He has heard either verbally or in writing that indictments have taken place," Khalilzad said.

Other issues that need resolution include distribution of oil wealth and the pressure for the creation of autonomous zones in Iraq, Khalilzad said. Sunni Arab legislators pushed successfully last week to delay the formation of regional authorities. The Sunni Arabs were worried that oil-rich autonomous regions in the Kurdish north and the Shiite south would cut Sunni Arabs in the west out of a share in the country's oil revenue.

Khalilzad said Iraqi politicians have agreed to distribute oil wealth according to population, which will be determined by a census planned for next year. But he said there was still disagreement about who is authorized to negotiate petroleum industry contracts.

The Kurdistan regional government already has launched negotiations on oil deals.

Khalilzad also said a joint committee this month would present a set of proposals to be used to determine the future role of U.S. troops. Khalilzad said the committee was creating a "road map" that would establish the conditions necessary for transfers of security responsibilities from U.S. to Iraqi troops.

U.S. officials have said that as Iraqi security forces become stronger, U.S. troops will be able to withdraw from Iraq.

The Rebuilder's Tale (NYT)

By Raad Ali Abdulaziz, As Told To Fred Heeren

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

I wanted to make a difference. After earning my Ph.D. in engineering in 2002 at Baghdad University, I became a guest lecturer there, and I also began working for an Italian humanitarian organization — helping to repair schools, water-treatment plants and hospitals. I didn't stop working in 2003 when the American bombs started falling, and I didn't stop when friends warned me that my work was bad because it made the foreigners look good. That was nothing new. Even before the war, most Iraqis believed that all visiting Westerners were working against Islam.

But then one afternoon in September 2004, when I was drawing up plans for local schools, one of my co-workers rushed into my Baghdad office looking worried — followed by a man in a military uniform carrying an AK-47. His comrades chose me along with two Italian colleagues, Simona Pari and Simona Torretta, and pushed us out into the road. They handcuffed us and forced us into a caravan of waiting cars. I hardly had time to feel afraid. I asked the driver what was happening. He told me to be quiet and yelled out the window at the gathering crowd: "We are police! Go home! Or I'll shoot anyone standing in the street!" He waved his pistol around. People scattered.

I tried to focus. This was not a police investigation; it was a kidnapping. Iraqis taken with foreigners are usually the first to die. The day before, I celebrated my 35th birthday. I wondered how my life would end — with a bullet or a knife.

Other uniformed men put me on the floor and draped a blanket over me, and we drove away. As we passed checkpoints and I sweated under the blanket in 110-degree heat, I somehow remembered a film I had seen about the history of nonviolent movements. I decided that no matter what they did to me, I would try to behave gently in return. When a gust blew the blanket off my head, I told them about it — and one of the men actually thanked me as he pulled the blanket back over me.

But when they interrogated me at a house later, things looked very bad. They asked me about my background. I knew they wouldn't like the truth, but I decided to be straight with them: my father was Kurdish, my mother Arabic. Every answer made them angrier. "Are you Sunni or Shiite?" They were Sunnis, but I said I was a Muslim who didn't believe in breaking up Islam that way. They accused me of being a spy for the Italians. I told them I was just helping to rebuild our country.

"Admit it," they said, "you are working against Islam!" I explained again. Finally, one pressed his gun against my head. "We know you are lying. In five seconds you must say that you are working for the Americans or the church!"

The room went silent. But I felt sure they knew I was telling the truth. Now they were playing with me, and I decided to let them know I understood. So. . .I began to smile. I was blindfolded, so I couldn't tell how they were reacting — what if I had misjudged them? — but after a moment, they burst out laughing. Tensions disappeared. One of them tapped me lightly on the head, saying, "You make jokes for us!"

I passed that test, but each day brought new threats to our lives. The first night, a rival militant group attacked us with grenades and machine guns. Another day the emir of our group said that if their ransom demands were not met in 48 hours, they planned to execute us — "probably by beheading." During those 48 hours, I just kept thinking about my 4-year-old son. But the deadline came and went — and the emir had a new idea: the Italian hostages and I would lead an attack against American troops. The assault would be broadcast on Arabic TV. I had to translate between the Italian pacifists and the radicals, who seemed ready to kill us if we declined. This surreal discussion went on for days. And then suddenly, after three weeks, we were released.

We were driven to the back of a Baghdad mosque and ordered out of the car in front of an Al-Jazeera cameraman, there to capture the moment. Later I heard I owed my life to a secret deal with the Italian Red Cross. The Italians flew back to Rome, where everyone celebrated and called them heroes.

My welcome home was different. I learned that many Iraqis and Arabs around the world hoped I would be beheaded — even some people I knew. After many threats against me and a near hit with a bullet, I could not put my family at further risk, and we fled Iraq in secret. We left everything behind. Now I am trying to start over in Europe. This is very painful.

But I keep remembering a strange feeling that came over me during those critical moments. Something told me that I would not die, that I had an unfinished task. Now I wonder if there is a way to make my voice louder than the voice of those who order us to fight all unbelievers. This cannot be God's way.

Suicide Bomber Kills 12 Near Kabul Ministry (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

DOJ_NMG_0072482

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 30 — Central Kabul was rocked by a deadly suicide bombing that killed 12 and wounded more than 40, just hours before President Hamid Karzai announced that his recent trip to Washington had elicited assurances from Pakistan that it would act against Taliban insurgents in its territory.

The suicide attack, the second in Kabul, the capital, this month, took place shortly after 8 a.m., when a man approached the side gate of the Interior Ministry headquarters on foot. There, by the pedestrian entrance to the compound, he detonated, the authorities said. Two policemen were killed, including the chief of staff of security, as were 10 civilians, said Zemarai Bashari, the spokesman for the Ministry of Interior. At least 42 people were wounded, doctors said.

Among the dead were two children — one a boy of 4 or 5 — and a 20-year-old woman, they said. The mother of the boy was critically wounded, according to doctors at Wazir Akbar Khan hospital, and had not been told of her son's death.

Witnesses said police officers had spotted the attacker and tried to stop him. Lailoma, 30, a clerk in the Interior Ministry, was arriving for work and was wounded in the blast.

"I saw a policeman pull out his pistol to shoot the bomber, but the bomber ran and blew himself up," she said from her hospital bed.

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the attack.

The main goal of Mr. Karzai's recent visit to Washington was to persuade the Bush administration to press Pakistan to cease its support, tacit or otherwise, for the Taliban insurgency, which has caused such widespread violence in Afghanistan this year that it has begun to threaten the state.

On Saturday, President Karzai condemned the bombing and said his 10-day trip to Canada and the United States had specifically concentrated on terrorism in the region. Yet he had little concrete to announce.

"I am glad we had an open talk, and I hope we are going to fulfill what we discussed," he said of the meeting with President Bush and General Pervez Musharraf.

The neighboring countries each agreed to hold tribal jirgas, or conventions, in the presence of the two presidents, to encourage the elders of the tribes that straddle their border to bring peace and stability to the region in time-honored tradition.

Mr. Karzai said General Musharraf had agreed to take action against the command structure of the Taliban, which has found sanctuary in Pakistan. "We did get a very categorical assurance that they will be moving against all extremist terrorist elements."

Mr. Karzai confirmed that cross-border violence had increased in the Waziristan region since the Pakistani government brokered a peace deal with the tribes there earlier this month in an effort to curb militancy.

"So far the effectiveness is not good," Mr. Karzai said, "but again President Musharraf assured me, and we have to wait and see."

German Planes Help NATO in South

BERLIN, Sept. 30 (Agence France-Presse) — A Defense Ministry spokesman confirmed Saturday a magazine report that German military aircraft are supporting NATO operations in volatile southern Afghanistan. The report, set to appear in Monday's Der Spiegel, came after Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung ruled out any possibility of transferring German troops from the relatively peaceful north to help fight the insurgency in the south.

Der Spiegel said German transport aircraft and helicopters had made some 60 flights this year into the south, ferrying allied soldiers and evacuating the wounded.

Bombing Kills 12 Near Afghan Interior Ministry (WP/AP)

By Rahim Faiez

The Washington Post/AP, October 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Sept. 30 -- A suicide bomber blew himself up in a busy pedestrian alley next to Afghanistan's Interior Ministry on Saturday, killing at least 12 people and wounding dozens, officials said.

It was the second major suicide attack in Kabul this month, underscoring the rising danger in the once-calm capital as insurgents step up attacks across the country.

Meanwhile, an American was released from an Afghan prison and flown out of the country after serving more than two years for operating a private prison as part of a freelance hunt for terrorists, Afghan officials said.

Brent Bennett, 29, had been arrested in July 2004 with two other Americans after Afghan security forces raided a house and discovered eight Afghan men who they said had been abused.

Court documents filed Friday in Washington show that U.S. officials planned to secure Bennett a passport and a ticket out of the country. An Associated Press reporter saw a man identified as Bennett board a plane for Dubai late Saturday. It was not clear whether Bennett was free or in the custody of U.S. officials. U.S. officials in Afghanistan would not comment on his case.

The suicide attack occurred just before 8 a.m. near a narrow dirt road where employees and civilians pass through a security gate. Shops, street photographers and men who fill out Interior Ministry paperwork for illiterate Afghans make the area a busy cross-section of commerce and government.

Rahman Shah was standing in line at a security checkpoint with his wife and three children when he heard someone shout, "Suicide attack!" He turned to see a police officer chasing a man, and moments later a blinding explosion threw him and his family to the ground.

"I fell to one side of the road with my son, and when I ran to the other side where my wife, daughter and my other son were, I found them all injured and bloody," Shah said from the side of a hospital bed where his wife and 4-year-old daughter were recovering.

President Hamid Karzai condemned the blast and said that "suicide attackers come from outside Afghanistan and target the most devoted and the poorest Muslim people of the world."

Insurgents have stepped up roadside and suicide bombings across Afghanistan over the past several months. Earlier this month, a suicide car bomber rammed a U.S. military convoy in Kabul, killing 16 people, including two American soldiers, and a suicide bomber killed 18 people outside the Helmand provincial governor's compound in the town of Lashkar Gah on Tuesday.

American Imprisoned For Private Jail Set Free (WT/AP)

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Times/AP, October 1, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- An American was released from an Afghan prison and flown out of the country yesterday after serving more than two years for running a private prison as part of a freelance hunt for terrorists, officials said.

Court documents filed Friday in Washington show that U.S. officials planned to secure Brent Bennett a passport and a ticket out of the country, and an Associated Press reporter saw a man identified as Bennett board a plane for Dubai late yesterday.

It was not clear if Bennett, 29, was free or in the custody of U.S. officials. He was held in a private room at the airport and journalists were prevented from talking to him.

Bennett, former U.S. soldier Jack Keith Idema and Edward Caraballo were arrested in July 2004 and convicted of running a private prison in Kabul after Afghan security forces raided a house and discovered eight Afghan men who said they had been abused.

Idema told The Washington Times by phone from his prison cell Thursday that Bennett had been kidnapped from prison by Afghan soldiers and would not survive the night.

Abdul Qayum, the commander of the Policharki prison where Bennett had been jailed, told the Associated Press the American was in good spirits when he left yesterday.

An Afghan airport official showed an AP reporter a copy of the passport of the man boarding the plane in the name of Brent L. Bennett. The official asked not to be named because of the sensitivity of the issue.

No U.S. officials in Afghanistan would comment on Bennett's case, and an American lawyer filing paperwork on his behalf said he didn't know if Bennett was free or in U.S. custody. When Bennett boarded the plane he was not wearing any restraints.

A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy declined to comment on the case yesterday.

Caraballo, who has said he is a video journalist, was released in April.

In a separate development, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a busy pedestrian alley next to Afghanistan's Interior Ministry yesterday, killing at least 12 persons and wounding dozens, officials said.

The blast was the second major suicide attack in Kabul in September, underscoring the rising danger in the once-calm capital as militants step up attacks across the country.

Afghanistan Mulls Herbicide In Drug War (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, October 1, 2006

With profits from this spring's record opium crop fueling a broad Taliban offensive, Afghan authorities say they are considering a once unthinkable way to deal with the scourge: spraying poppy fields with herbicide.

Afghans including President Hamid Karzai are deeply opposed to spraying the crop. After nearly three decades of war, Western science and assurances can do little to assuage their fears of chemicals being dropped from airplanes.

But U.S. officials in Kabul and Washington are pushing for it. And on Thursday the country's top drug enforcement official said he would contemplate spraying opium crops — even with airborne crop-dusters — if other efforts fail to cut the size of the coming year's crop.

"This year, we'll wait and see how it goes. Next year, the 2008 season, we will consider it," said Lt. Gen. Mohammed Daoud Daoud on the sidelines of an anti-poppy gathering in Jalalabad, the ancient and verdant capital of Nangahar province, once the heart of Afghanistan's poppy belt.

This year Nangahar was a success. Poppy cultivation stayed low amid a boom that saw Afghanistan produce 82 percent of the world's opium, providing for 90 percent of its heroin, according to U.S. and United Nations figures.

Opium eradication is one of the great failures of the five-year period since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001. In 2000, under the Islamist Taliban government, Afghanistan produced virtually no opium.

Planting has skyrocketed since then, jumping 59 percent this year, enough to produce 6,700 tons of opium that fetched around $750 million for Afghan farmers and eventually sold for $50 billion on the street, mainly in Europe, according to a U.N. report.

Opium poppies have become Afghanistan's chief crop and economic mainstay even as Washington and Britain have pumped hundreds of millions of dollars into eradication schemes and complex efforts to create markets for legal crops.

In the meantime, drug money nourishes the insurgency. In the opium-rich southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar, Taliban commanders protect growers in return for a 30 to 40 percent tax, which is spent to recruit fighters, experts in the region say.

Retired U.S. Gen. Barry McCaffrey, the Clinton administration drug czar, said crop dusters may be the only way to preserve Washington's project in Afghanistan, before drug profits undermine the country's elected government.

"We know exactly where these fields are. They're absolutely vulnerable to eradication. And it is immeasurably more effective to do it with an airplane," McCaffrey said by telephone from Virginia. "I've been telling the Pentagon, if you don't take on drug production you're going to get run out of Afghanistan."

But in Helmand, home to 42 percent of this year's crop, Daoud said it remains too dangerous to spray. A former mujahedeen commander, Daoud said the Taliban can down low-flying planes.

"They have rockets," the bearded general said, fingering a string of prayer beads. "We can't spray there."

U.S. and U.N. experts here say eradicating the drug from this Texas-sized country will take decades.

Inside Afghanistan, with just 150,000 opium users among its 30 million people, poppy eradication is seen as an outside issue. Two speakers at the counternarcotics conference here said it was more urgent to stop people drinking wine.

"We want all drugs banned. Not only poppy," said provincial council chief Fazal Hadi Muslim Yar.

If Karzai approves herbicide, he risks losing the support of 3 million people involved in poppy growing. But without eradication, he could see his government undermined by drug-funded insurgents.

Karzai has said in the past that herbicides pose too big a risk for families and livestock, contaminating water and killing grapes, melons and vegetables grown alongside poppies. But the president approved Afghan eradication teams that used tractors to eliminate thousands of acres of poppies this year.

"Anywhere we eradicate a field, we must immediately provide the farmer with an alternative livelihood," Karzai spokesman Khaleeq Ahmad said on Saturday.

Aerial spraying is especially feared. Rumors have coursed through farm communities blaming sicknesses on secret poppy spraying, said Mohammed Nabi Hussaini, the head of Afghanistan's Poppy Eradication Program.

"There were diseases in children who ate apricots and parents said they saw helicopters nearby," Hussaini said. "But how long can we wait? The longer you wait the more it will get out of control."

McCaffrey said crop-dusting with common herbicides like Roundup was key in drug eradication programs that found success in Thailand and Peru.

Crop spraying is not the preferred option of the United Nations, but would be considered as part of a broad rural development program, U.N. spokesman Dan Norton said on Saturday.

Tens of thousands of Afghan farmers are now making crop decisions, weighing options between poppies and Afghanistan's robust vegetables and melons.

For now, the government counternarcotics campaign is friendly. Afghan government officials held a tent rally at the former winter palace in Jalalabad. With 200 turbaned elders and clerics listening, Daoud urged them to snuff out the illicit trade before it turned Afghanistan into a narco-state.

"Addiction will destroy the young generation that is Afghanistan's future," Daoud told the crowd. "Once you're addicted you're a burden to your family."

Across Afghanistan, tougher action is coming. Counternarcotics officials warned local leaders that they will be fired if cultivation rises.

Finally, Kabul officials drove the message home using the twin pillars of God and honor. Assadullah Sajid, an imam in a starched white tunic and long beard, pointed forcefully at the elders and policemen, invoking the Quran and warning them not to disgrace Nangahar.

"Last year our governor was honored because we didn't cultivate," Sajid said sternly. "Let's keep that honor."

NATO To Lead U.S. Troops In Afghanistan (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, October 1, 2006

NATO will take command of up to 12,000 U.S. troops and the territory they control in Afghanistan in "few days," a spokesman for the alliance said Sunday.

The planned expansion of the alliance's operation to the rest of the country will consolidate most military responsibilities under the command of top NATO leader, British Lt. Gen. David Richards.

The overall American force level in the country will remain unchanged, said Mark Laity, an alliance spokesman in Kabul.

Some 8,000 U.S. troops tracking al-Qaida terrorists or involved in aerial operations will remain under direct U.S. command, Laity said, but the U.S.-led coalition commanded by U.S. Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry will be phased out.

"In a few days, on a date yet to be declared, you will see the completion of the steady expansion of ISAF," the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, Laity said.

The 12,000 U.S. troops in the regional command in eastern Afghanistan headed by U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley will fall under NATO command.

The move leaves Eikenberry's role in doubt. ISAF spokesman Maj. Luke Knittig said Eikenberry may remain in Afghanistan but under the auspices of the U.S. embassy.

"He won't be in our chain of command," Knittig said.

Eikenberry "may work with the U.S. ambassador. But no decision has been made," said Knittig, a U.S. Army officer with NATO.

The Afghanistan Triangle (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

SOMEWHERE along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, the Taliban leadership and their Qaeda allies must be pleased.

When the leaders of Pakistan and Afghanistan visited the United States last week, they got into an ugly public spat over who was to blame for a Taliban resurgence that has killed hundreds of Afghans this year and shaken confidence in Afghanistan's new government.

There was Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan, accusing Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan of failing to crack down on the Taliban. Mr. Musharraf struck back, saying Mr. Karzai was behaving like "an ostrich" and ignoring problems in his own land. Finally, President Bush played host at an unusual White House dinner for the two, trying to soothe tensions and promote a united front against the Taliban.

"We've got a lot of challenges facing us," President Bush said as the two leaders stood silently at his side. "All of us must protect our countries, but at the same time, we all must work to make the world a more hopeful place."

The two leaders' public feud increases already growing pressure on the Bush administration to deal with criticism of the American-led effort to stabilize Afghanistan, which until recent months was seen in bright contrast to the problems in Iraq. Members of Congress, former administration officials and experts argue that missteps by the United States and its allies squandered an early opportunity to bring order to Afghanistan so it could be more completely rebuilt. Stabilizing the country remains possible, they say, but it will now be far more difficult.

"I think the mission continues to be doable," said James Dobbins, a former Bush administration special envoy to Afghanistan. "But it's going to be a longer, harder, more expensive mission by virtue of the fact that we did not seize opportunities."

But what can be done?

The issue is not just a matter of American troop levels, Afghan officials and American experts say. Or of Afghan warlords, once so powerful. There are three critical problems today: the weakness of Afghan security forces, a rampant opium trade and allegations that Pakistani officials turn a blind eye to Taliban activity in their territory.

Those three problems are wrapped up with a fourth: a creeping skepticism among Afghans and Pakistanis about the seriousness of the American and NATO commitments to stay in Afghanistan. The more it looks as if the Americans will leave, the harder it is to gain villagers' cooperation against the Taliban. Farmers become less willing to give up their profitable opium crop.

And — perhaps most important — Pakistanis anticipate the day when their old allies, the Taliban, can again be their proxies to counter Indian influence in Afghanistan.

American officials discount such dire scenarios. They say the American effort in Afghanistan has been and continues to be a success. The current violence, they contend, is the result of a move by NATO troops and an increasingly strong Afghan central government to extend their authority into remote areas that Taliban fighters and drug traffickers have used as havens. Taliban attacks are largely centered in the country's south, they say, and will be defeated.

"In recent months, the Taliban and other extremists have tried to regain control, mostly in the south of Afghanistan," Mr. Bush said Tuesday in a joint White House press conference with Mr. Karzai. "We've adjusted tactics and we're on the offense to meet the threat and to defeat the threat."

But several members of Congress and American experts on Afghanistan said the United States needs to make a grand gesture soon, like doubling American reconstruction assistance. Over the last year, they point out, the United States cut aid to Afghanistan by 30 percent and handed over security in southern Afghanistan to NATO troops.

"Something dramatic" is needed, said Barnett Rubin, a New York University professor and Afghanistan expert. "To convince people that we really mean it. That we're really committed." The country's police present one such opportunity, cited by Mr. Karzai himself. In a meeting with reporters and editors at The New York Times on Sept. 21, he said the failure to create a professional Afghan police force was a central mistake in the early post-Taliban period. He said police training still must expand.

"We would like to get much more support for the training of the police from the United States and our allies," he said. "Where we failed was to focus in time on having a police force."

In 2001, Afghanistan's 80,000 police officers were a poorly equipped hodgepodge of Soviet-trained officers, veterans of the anti-Soviet jihad and gunmen loyal to local warlords. Seventy percent were illiterate.

In 2002, the United States promised to train a new Afghan army and Germany promised to retrain the country's police. But German officials dispatched only 40 police trainers and focused on developing a core of 3,500 skilled commanders at a reopened police academy. Some foreign military units conducted short training courses outside Kabul. But the tens of thousands of officers outside Kabul received no systematic training until 2004, when the United States opened seven regional training centers.

Opium cultivation, now exploding, is another sore subject. Last month, the United Nations announced a record 6,100 metric ton crop, 50 percent higher than the 2005 yield. Afghanistan now produces 92 percent of the world's opium poppies, or raw heroin. And in some parts of southern Afghanistan, American officials say, drug traffickers have formed an alliance with the Taliban.

One advocate of a steeply increased anti-opium effort is Senator Charles Schumer, Democrat of New York, who offered an amendment this summer calling for $700 million in additional Defense Department funding for narcotics eradication in Afghanistan. The Republican-controlled Senate passed the measure. But when the bill reached a conference committee, the amount was cut to $116 million for all of Central Asia, according to Mr. Schumer."You cannot win one of these wars by just paying attention to the military side," the senator said Friday. "They don't seem to understand that." He also has called for an increase in reconstruction aid to Afghanistan.

Beyond those more familiar problems, though, there are lingering questions about Pakistan and the Taliban, made more pointed by a sense that the United States may eventually abandon Afghanistan, as it did after the Soviets were driven out in the 1980's.

Seth Jones, an Afghanistan analyst with the RAND Corporation, said the United States must revamp its approach to Pakistan even as it works to counter an increasingly successful Taliban propaganda campaign that portrays the United States as trying to eradicate Islam from Afghanistan.

Mr. Jones and other analysts said Pakistan allows the Taliban to continue to operate on its territory because it sees the group as a useful tool to counter the growing influence of its archrival, India, in Afghanistan. Pakistan supported the Taliban in the 1990's in its civil war against an Indian- , Russian- and Iranian-backed Northern Alliance. After the Taliban was driven out, it was that same Northern Alliance that took power in Kabul. Now, with the American commitment to Afghanistan being questioned, a version of that same proxy war is beginning to take shape again.

Analysts argue that stabilizing Afghanistan is still possible, but it would require a long-term American commitment to rebuilding the country. It would also require intensified American diplomacy in the region, they say.

Christine Fair, an analyst at the United States Institute of Peace, a government-funded Washington-based research institute, suggests that an American diplomatic drive to ease tensions between India and Pakistan could be a key to stabilizing Afghanistan as well. "What we need," she said "is a grand bargain. You have to take a regional picture."

But time is short.

There are indications that public support for a long-term American and NATO role in Afghanistan may be dropping in both the United States and Europe. Recent requests by NATO commanders that Germany and other countries eliminate restrictions on sending their troops to the country's volatile south have fallen on deaf ears. Countries have also been slow to respond to appeals for additional NATO troops in Afghanistan.

A CNN poll released last week showed increased skepticism among the American public as well. When asked, "Do you favor or oppose the U.S. war in Afghanistan?" 50 percent were in favor, and 48 percent were opposed.

That indicated a slide from the heady days in 2001 and 2002, just after the Northern Alliance had toppled the Taliban with the aid of a few American troops. Back then, 80 or 90 percent of Americans were supportive.

The Taliban strategy appears to be working.

Musharraf: An Accuracy Test (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

PRESIDENT PERVEZ MUSHARRAF of Pakistan was in Washington, New York, and on TV screens across the United States last week to promote his country's efforts to counter Al Qaeda, but that was not all. He was also promoting his new autobiography "In the Line of Fire: A Memoir."

Speaking at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York Tuesday, the general repeatedly made statements that his critics, and some experts, questioned. Here are some of his remarks as transcribed by the Federal News Service, with responses from United Nations, Pakistani and United States officials.

ECONOMIC GROWTH

"Today, our G.D.P. growth over the last four years is 7 percent. Our per capita income has more than doubled. Our G.D.P. has doubled."

Kaiser Bengali, a Pakistani economist, says doubling Pakistan's per capita income and G.D.P. would require a higher growth rate than 7 percent or more time than four years.

PAKISTAN'S TRIBAL AREAS

"Now, there is no change in the ground military situation — not one soldier has moved out. We are in position."

Pakistani officials say that under a deal with tribal leaders, Pakistani forces have withdrawn to their barracks and tribal militias now patrol the border area, where American officials believe Taliban members cross into and out of Afghanistan.

WHO RULES AFGHANISTAN

"Fifty to 60 percent of Afghanistan is Pashtun. Tajik — total percentage of Tajiks — is 5 percent." A member of the audience states the percentage is higher. "So, O.K., this will be about 7 or 8 percent, 9 percent. O.K."

General Musharraf was making a case that ethnic Pashtuns, a group that has been the Taliban's base of support in the past, are under-represented in the Afghan government, and that ethnic Tajiks from the country's north — including Panjsheris from the Panjshir Valley — hold too many positions. Pakistan has generally supported Afghanistan's Pashtuns. India has generally supported its Tajiks and Panjsheris.

The State Department says Pashtuns make up from 38 to 44 percent of Afghanistan's population, and Tajiks make up 25 percent. Half of the government ministers, including President Hamid Karzai, are Pashtuns, say American experts.

AFGHAN SECURITY FORCES

"In the ministry of interior and intelligence — if 50 percent people are Panjsheri, how will the Pashtun, the 50 percent population of Afghanistan, be feeling about it?"

American officials have led the training of the army, intelligence service and police, and see ethnical balance. The army is 49 percent Pashtun, 21 percent Tajik, a 2005 Congressional report said.

Musharraf's Memoir (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf has been hawking his memoir, "In the Line of Fire," from the White House to "The Daily Show." Several of the book's claims have already attracted wide notice, including details about nuclear technology obtained by North Korea and the assertion that then-Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage threatened to bomb Pakistan "back to the Stone Age" if it did not cooperate after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But the book packs a few lesser bombshells as well. Here's a guide to some of Musharraf's more notable passages:

On the killing of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl:

DOJ_NMG_0072488

"Only after all the pieces had been put together did I realize that Omar Sheikh had panicked because the situation had spiraled out of his control. . . . The man who may have actually killed Pearl or at last participated in his butchery, we eventually discovered, was none other than Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, al Qaeda's number three." (p. 227-228)

Musharraf's remarks about the Pearl case have provided an unexpected boost to Sheik, a British militant who is awaiting execution in Pakistan. Sheik's lawyer now hopes to use the book to force a new hearing in the case.

On the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden:

"The fact that so many Saudis are in the Konar area [of Afghanistan] perhaps suggests that this is where Osama bin Laden has his hideout, but we cannot be sure. I have said, half-jokingly, that I hope he is not caught in Pakistan, by Pakistan's troops." (p. 221)

This claim amounts to a public slap at Afghan President Hamid Karzai -- who complains about Pakistani tolerance of militants along the border -- and U.S. intelligence officials, who have long thought that bin Laden is in Pakistan. The affront was made worse by timing: President Bush hosted Musharraf and Karzai last week at a joint dinner meant to improve relations between the two feuding leaders.

On reacting to pressure from the United States after 9/11:

"This was a shockingly barefaced threat, but it was obvious that the United States decided to hit back, and hit back hard. . . . I war-gamed the United States as an adversary. . . . [I]f we do not join them, can we confront them and withstand the onslaught? The answer was no, we could not. . . . " (p. 201)

Armitage has denied making the "Stone Age" threat, and Musharraf's characterization of himself as defender of Pakistani prerogatives could be aimed at domestic politics.

On Pakistan's role in capturing al-Qaeda militants:

"We have captured 689 and handed over 369 to the United States. We have earned bounties totaling millions of dollars. Those who habitually accuse us of 'not doing enough' in the war on terror should simply ask the CIA how much prize money it has paid to the government of Pakistan." (p. 237)

U.S. officials immediately expressed ignorance about this claim, in part because the Justice Department's rewards program for information on terrorism suspects is supposed to dole out money to individuals, not governments.

On the 1999 military clash with Indian forces in the Kargil district of Kashmir:

"The Indians actually ran short of coffins, owing to an unexpectedly high number of casualties. . . . Our army, outnumbered and outgunned, fought this conflict with great valor. The number of Indian casualties proves the fighting prowess and professionalism of the officers and men of the Pakistan army." (p. 98)

Musharraf's boastful characterization of Pakistan's battle with India has once again roiled relations between the two neighboring nuclear states. The Kargil conflict, widely viewed as a disaster, set the stage for the coup that resulted in Musharraf's rise to power.

Iraq And Our Military Crisis (DMN)

The Dallas Morning News, October 1, 2006

America has tough rebuilding process ahead

The U.S. military hasn't failed in Iraq. It accomplished exactly what it was asked to do, which was overthrow Saddam Hussein. What its leadership didn't bargain for – and what our military isn't built for – is the messy aftermath. Simply, Washington has asked its military to do too much with too little.

With massive technological superiority, the U.S. remains the world's most capable fighting force. But our inability to crush sectarian violence and terrorist insurgencies in Iraq illustrates the limits of military might. After all, a close-quarters conflict is an environment in which an improvised explosive device is more effective than a Tomahawk missile.

This unconventional fight has deeply strained our nation's military core and resources. Congress and President Bush must confront the manpower crisis and the threat it poses to preparedness and national security. The core of this country's readiness – the men and women in uniform – must be restored as smartly and quickly as possible.

Postponing this major overhaul only kicks the problem down the road. Politicians in Washington must address this before the next war – for surely there will be one.

It's time to listen to military leaders like Army Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, who recently held back a 2008 budget plan because he believes it didn't provide enough resources to perform its mission in Iraq and meet other worldwide commitments. That move probably did little for the general's career, but it is the dose of reality that Washington needs.

Unless things unexpectedly improve in Iraq, the Pentagon forecasts needed troop levels at about 144,000 through year's end. Any call for more troops ignores the obvious. We have gotten ourselves into such a bind that we can't send more without compromising vital military readiness elsewhere.

The Army has provided about 102,000 of the U.S. troops in Iraq and 16,000 of the 21,000 troops in Afghanistan. Many of these soldiers face second and third deployments. Two brigades recently had their scheduled departure dates from Iraq delayed.

The Army National Guard and Reserves face the same manpower and overdeployment issues. Additionally, equipment needed to train yet-to-be-deployed reserve units is being used – and destroyed – in Iraq, which exacerbates the training and readiness gap at home.

Some analysts contend that the Army needs to add as many as 100,000 troops to its 505,000 active-duty force to meet current commitments and future threats. For an all-volunteer force, that is a decade-long effort – not a fix for the immediate crisis in Iraq.

As this war drains resources at a troubling rate, we now have an even tougher rebuilding program ahead, one that will demand serious sacrifice by government and the people.

The elements of that sacrifice – whether a tax increase, a draft or some other drastic measure – are unpalatable topics headed into an election.

But we can't ignore them. Whatever problems the military faces today, we only compound them by dithering before the next big crisis. We must rebuild now.

The Humanitarian War Myth (WP)

By Eric A. Posner

More than 40,000 Iraqi civilians have been killed since the American-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, and the rate at which civilians die has been increasing in recent months. Many thousands of innocent Iraqis have been detained, and some have been abused by American troops. Many others have been tortured or killed by Iraqi police. Basic services have been lacking in large portions of the country for three years. Civil war looms, conjuring memories of the 16-year Lebanese civil war, during which more than 100,000 people were killed out of a population of fewer than 4 million.

Yet, if the United Nations were to have its way, the Iraqi debacle would be just the first in a series of such wars -- the effect of a well-meaning but ill-considered effort to make humanitarian intervention obligatory as a matter of international law. Today Iraq, tomorrow Darfur.

Civilians suffer in all wars, but the suffering of Iraqi civilians in this war is particularly unfortunate because one of the main justifications for the war was humanitarian: to rescue suffering Iraqis from a tyrant. There were other justifications, of course, including the related but distinct idea that bringing democracy to Iraq would enhance America's long-term security. But the humanitarian justification was embraced by many who rejected the other justifications, including liberal elites as well as some conservatives, and it helped mobilize public opinion behind the war. Events have served the humanitarian justification poorly.

The idea that war can have a humanitarian as well as a national security justification has a long pedigree and surface plausibility. Some of the worst atrocities of the 20th century occurred in weak states whose governments could not have resisted a foreign military invasion. The genocide in Rwanda, which killed more than 800,000 people in a few months, was eventually halted by a force of Tutsi rebels; surely a Western army could have stopped it sooner. If nations can intervene at little cost to themselves because the target nations are weak and by doing so they prevent massive human suffering, then surely they should do so. The logic seems compelling.

But logic is no substitute for experience, and experience shows that humanitarian war is an oxymoron. The first blow to the idea was the failed intervention in Somalia in 1993. U.S. forces sent to maintain the peace while aid was distributed to millions of starving civilians were withdrawn after just 18 U.S. soldiers died. Policymakers drew the lesson that the American public will not tolerate casualties in a humanitarian war that has no clear national security justification. This lesson guided President Bill Clinton's refusal to authorize military intervention during the Rwandan genocide and his decision to limit U.S. military intervention in Kosovo in 1999 to high-altitude bombing, which ensured that no American pilots were killed -- at the expense of civilians on whose heads errant bombs fell. The Kosovo intervention, although regarded as a success in some quarters, has cost billions of dollars, required a seven-year occupation and could turn out to be a slow-motion version of Iraq.

The Iraq war itself has dealt the second blow. The problem with humanitarian intervention is not only that the costs are usually too high, but it turns out that the benefits usually are low. There are just too many risks and imponderables when war is used to prevent atrocities rather than to defeat an enemy. Military weapons inevitably kill civilians, and smart tyrants foil smart bombs by using their own civilians as shields. Dictators understand that a war premised on humanitarianism fails if they can make the invader kill their citizens. Removing the dictator risks civil war, which is almost always worse than the original abuses. Replacing him with another dictator only puts off the atrocities until another day. Long-term occupation breeds hostility, then insurgency and violence. In comparison with this, the original ruler might not seem so bad after all.

Saddam Hussein was an especially bad tyrant, and Iraqi civilian casualties attributable to the U.S. intervention do not yet equal what he was able to accomplish, albeit over a longer period. The Kurds and many Shiites are better off. And many Iraqis continue to think that the war was worth it, according to polls.

But polls do not reveal the opinions of dead Iraqis. The humanitarian effect of the war has been at best ambiguous against the baseline of the containment period that preceded it, and if current trends continue, the overall effect will be that of a humanitarian disaster.

Many people blame the humanitarian costs of the war in Iraq on the Bush administration's execution of it. This view is a psychological crutch that allows defenders of humanitarian intervention to keep the ideal alive for the next, presumably competent, administration of a President Hillary Clinton or John McCain. But complaints about this war are not noticeably different from complaints about earlier wars, where small mistakes (identifiable as such with the benefit of hindsight) resulted in enormous harm.

The Iraq war, consistent with experience, suggests that humanitarian wars will rarely yield humanitarian results. Why, then, is there a so-called "responsibility to protect" movement to make humanitarian intervention obligatory as a matter of international law? And why was this idea endorsed by the United Nations during its millennium summit?

The best humanitarians of our day recognize that we face a painful dilemma: to tolerate atrocities in foreign states or to risk committing worse atrocities in the course of ending them. From Rwanda, many people drew the lesson that failure to intervene is the worse option. The Iraq war may be the first step in unlearning this lesson. If not, an intervention in Darfur surely will be.

ARROGANCE AND IGNORANCE (SFC)

By Todd Oppenheimer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Three authors make the case that time and again, the U.S. has made disastrous mistakes in Iraq

During an army briefing in late 2003, as the opposition movement, and bloody battles, were mounting in Iraq, a lieutenant colonel presented his boss, a tough colonel, with a question: "Sir, what is the battlespace?" The colonel, reports Thomas Ricks in Fiasco: The American Military Adventure in Iraq, said it is the enemy, wherever you are fighting it. "Sir, wrong answer," the lieutenant dared to reply. "In counterinsurgency, the battlespace isn't physical, it's psychological. The battle is for the people."

To Ricks, the senior Pentagon correspondent for the Washington Post and winner of a Pulitzer Prize, and to the dozens of military historians, counterinsurgency experts and veteran commanders he quotes, this lieutenant was explaining the ABCs of counterinsurgency strategy. "The objective," he writes, "is first to gain control of the population, and then win their support." Why a lowly lieutenant colonel would have to lecture his commander on such fundamentals is at the core of three different but interrelated new books on the United States' series of campaigns in Iraq.

Individually, each of these books -- "Fiasco" (The Penguin Press; 482 pages; $27.95), Imperial Life in the Emerald City: Inside Iraq's Green Zone (Knopf; 320 pages; $25.95) and The End of Iraq: How American Incompetence Created a War Without End (Simon & Schuster; 260 pages; $26) -- has its shortcomings. But those misses are dwarfed by the weight of persuasive material each author has found, and by the elegance of their presentations. Taken together, their evidence makes a staggering case against President Bush and his staff. Their argument, in sum, is that the administration staged a war with a grateful, homogeneous country in mind rather than the proud, deeply sectarian culture it confronted; that it failed to plan for any contingency or any stabilizing follow-up beyond achieving quick success in toppling Saddam Hussein; that its officials in Iraq lived and behaved in a thoughtless, corrupt, imperious manner; that this wasted billions of dollars and alienated the Iraqis, thereby encouraging the insurgency. And, as things further unraveled, that it misinterpreted, and thus mishandled, one crisis after another.

How could prominent federal officials stumble so badly? A primary reason, according to these writers, is disturbingly simple: For those in charge of the Iraq campaign, neither knowledge of the Middle East nor expertise at one's job was a priority. What mattered most was political commitment to Republican ideology, especially faith in the appeal of capitalism, preferably of the nouveau, top-down, supply-side variety. Critiques of this sort can sound ridiculous, like ill-informed whining from out-of-power liberals. That is not the case this time. Each of these books goes to extraordinary lengths to document the way key moments were poisoned, again and again, by amateur, often young ideologues who were playing Monopoly with one of the most volatile regions in the world.

Consider this from "Imperial Life in the Emerald City" by Rajiv Chandrasekaran, an editor at the Washington Post and formerly its Baghdad bureau chief. When new staffers were needed in Baghdad (and they were needed constantly), job applications were sent to James O'Beirne, the White House liaison at the Pentagon. O'Beirne considered one young man "an ideal candidate" primarily because he had worked for the Republican Party in the 2000 Florida recount. Two people said O'Beirne's staffers asked applicants if they supported Roe vs. Wade and had voted for Bush. A former staffer who worked near O'Beirne "saw senior civil servants from agencies like Treasury, Energy ... and Commerce denied positions in Baghdad that were instead handed to prominent Republican National Committee contributors." The job of reforming the Iraqi stock exchange -- a critical piece of the administration's privatization program -- was given to Jay Hallen, a 24-year-old political operative who had no business experience; he soon fired his sole assistant, a 39-year-old family man who had worked in insurance and financial services, been a private investigator and spent six years in the Navy.

The president's team especially liked swaggering tough guys, believing that people of this ilk get things done. Often they did, but at a cost. One example was Bernard Kerik, who achieved fame as New York City's Rambo-like police commissioner during the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Kerik was appointed chief training adviser for the Iraqi police force, which had been almost entirely scattered after the war by looters and insurgents, both of whom had more powerful weapons than police officers did. Rather than bother with formal training programs, or pesky meetings where he could be briefed by people who knew the lay of the land, Kerik, an accomplished publicity hound, started staging nighttime raids.

The raids produced a stream of glowing news stories, but they also endangered innocent Iraqis and American soldiers, who sometimes fired on the raiders thinking they were insurgents. It was all great fun for Kerik, who abruptly resigned three months into the job. ("I was in my own world," he told Chandrasekaran. "I did my own thing.") Incidents like this became so consistent that British occupation officials -- presumably informed by their own history of imperialism in Iraq -- posted a sign in their compound saying, "YEE-HAW IS NOT A FOREIGN POLICY."

It is if you think the battle space is nothing but sand, weeds and people desperate for U.S.-style capitalism. An indication that President Bush's views were roughly that simple occurs in early 2003, just two months before he launched the invasion. That January, Bush met with three prominent Iraqi Americans. "As the three described what they thought would be the political situation after Saddam's fall, they talked about Sunnis and Shiites," reports Peter W. Galbraith in "The End of Iraq." "It became apparent to them that the president was unfamiliar with these terms. The three spent part of the meeting explaining that there are two major sects in Islam."

Although the ultimate blame for a campaign that fails at a cost of $5 billion a month obviously falls on the president, the finger in each of these books points repeatedly at a more direct target: Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Judging from these and other reporters' accounts, Rumsfeld has little patience for scholarly deliberation, and he seems allergic to the concept of planning. In Rumsfeld's view, wartime events are so hard to predict that lengthy strategy discussions are a waste of time. The consequences of this outlook fill much of Ricks' book. In one chapter after another, we see veteran commanders by turns stunned, confused, enraged and finally saddened, as they watch both Americans and Iraqis getting killed in conflicts that are far more chaotic and violent than they needed to be.

Rumsfeld's survival, despite these disasters, proves how expertly he has mastered the art of dodging responsibility. He even tried to avoid responsibility for Paul Bremer, the man he hired to head the Coalition Provisional Authority, and who left after a year under a cloud of disappointment. After one White House meeting, Ricks reports, where "there was a lot of 'grousing' about Bremer," Condoleezza Rice (then the national security adviser) reminded Rumsfeld that Bremer reported to him. " 'No, he doesn't,' Rumsfeld responded -- incorrectly -- [an] official recalled. 'He's been talking to the NSC [the National Security Council], he works for the NSC.' "

After finishing these books, one is struck by how differently each one succeeds, and fails, both as a story and as an argument.

In the case of "Fiasco," we simultaneously have a tour de force and an incomplete work. Page for page, Ricks' reporting shows unparalleled diligence, fairness and knowledge of military affairs -- much of the reason, no doubt, that the book has gotten such well-deserved attention. One way Ricks' mastery of his subject comes through is in his approach to sourcing. Ricks uses two techniques that other nonfiction writers -- journalist and scholar alike -- would do well to copy.

First, his every assertion is backed up by a web of confirming material from experts or authoritative documents, often both. Second, when he quotes people, he tells you who they are. A random example: "I don't think you can understand [the 2003 invasion of Iraq] without understanding the end of the 1991 war, especially the distrust of Americans' that resulted, said Army Reserve Maj. Michael Eisenstadt, an intelligence officer who in civilian life is an expert on Middle Eastern security issues." For a skeptical reader, nothing is more satisfying.

For all of Ricks' knowledge, however, he remains strangely blind to the larger implications of his material. One of his main arguments is that the Iraq campaign failed because the military lacked a coordinated strategy, which should have been formed at the top (by Bush and/or Rumsfeld) and sent down through the chain of command to be transformed into supporting tactics for soldiers in the field. Ricks certainly supports this claim. But he also presents scenes of some of the military's smartest commanders putting great effort into developing supposedly sound counterinsurgency strategies, which are soon foiled by Iraqi militants.

The prime example is the famous battle of Fallujah, in March 2004. The soldiers there were Marines, who, Ricks indicates, were generally more sensitive to Iraqis than the Army was. Fallujah was a well-known hotbed of opposition. So the Marines' commander, Maj. Gen. James Mattis, rigorously prepared his troops to execute a judicious, surgical strategy. No one, it seems, could have carried this off better than Mattis. He is restrained, highly respected and unusually well read on the history of warfare, including counterinsurgencies; Ricks calls him "one of the most intense intellectuals in the U.S. military." Pages later, Ricks describes how thoroughly Fallujah blew up in the Marines' faces. And he leaves it at that.

If strategy is paramount, and an unusually enlightened strategy fails, something bigger must be going on. From all appearances, plenty of strategies were tried. The problem is the administration never found one that worked. Could that mean that a military campaign in Iraq was doomed to fail, regardless of the approach taken? Strangely, Ricks never ponders this contradiction.

It's possible that, like many diligent researchers, Ricks may have simply gotten lost in the sheer abundance of his material -- an excess, unfortunately, that is too often dumped on the reader. Midway through "Fiasco," one begins to notice a redundancy in his scenes, and a creeping sense that, for all the riveting details, he won't get much beyond his basic critique. I particularly longed for a thorough conversation with Rumsfeld. Not only is this yet another moment of accountability that Rumsfeld escapes, there is also no indication that Ricks, or any of these authors, even pursued an interview.

Still, Ricks' best arguments are solid, and groundbreaking. He shows how American officials unwittingly recruited, financed and armed Iraqi insurgents. Blame for these moves, well explained by all three authors, points directly at Bremer. In his effort to rid the government of Saddam loyalists, Bremer ordered a purge. Unfortunately, his directives, which were never cleared in Washington, went too far, suddenly putting more than three-quarters of a million Iraqis out of work. (Many of these people were innocent civilians who belonged to Saddam's party simply to avoid prosecution.) This not only broke the economy -- indeed, the entire society -- it also produced hordes of angry Iraqis, who now saw great opportunities in the insurgency.

In his final chapter, Ricks sheds valuable new light on how the Iraq war has hurt U.S. prestige and credibility, and empowered our opponents. He then lays out four scenarios, from best case to a chilling worst case, of our future in the Middle East. Even the best case "means staying in Iraq for years," Ricks writes. Its closest analogy is the American war in the Philippines, which ran from 1899 to 1946, and which started as a similarly naive conventional campaign, turned into a messy guerrilla war, and eventually transformed into a peaceful, even friendly, long-term effort at containment. Two worse possibilities are repeats of France's humiliation in Algeria in the 1950s and 1960s, or Israel's in Lebanon, where the invader wins the battle but sorely loses the global PR war. Those scenarios may allow for an early, face-saving pullout, in Ricks' view, but they're likely to leave a civil and perhaps regional war and unsecured oil fields at the center of these disputes. This could prompt yet another U.S. invasion of Iraq, and maybe of its neighbors, too.

The final, "nightmare" scenario involves a new Iraqi strongman, an outcome that a 2005 poll says three-fourths of Iraqis want. That strongman, Ricks writes, is likely to be an Islamic purist who could unify the Arab world against the West. Propelled by both popular support and oil revenues, this leader might well restart some weapons programs. In such a scenario, Ricks writes, "the West would have to consider a war of preemption -- but this time its soldiers might really face nuclear, biological, or chemical weapons."

For his part, Chandrasekaran hardly misses a trick. His main subject is the dysfunctional culture inside the Green Zone, the lavish palace compound that used to be Saddam's and that, ironically, became the walled-off command center for Iraq's new occupiers. This narrower target allows for more focused inquiries, which Chandrasekaran milks abundantly. Seemingly every time some odd screw-up or oversight occurs, Chandrasekaran follows it up, tracing it out into the field in Iraq, and back to its source in Washington. Each misstep is described fully, calmly, concisely, with plenty of drama when necessary. In fact, when incidents come up in all three books, Chandrasekaran is sometimes the one who explores them with the greatest nuance.

Unfortunately, his book's virtues also lead to its demerits. He has no grand, novel argument, and no significant vision for the future. But he doesn't pretend to. He delivers exactly what he promises.

Which leaves us with Peter W. Galbraith, who, despite having the shortest book ("The End of Iraq"), attempts the most ambitious argument of the three. Galbraith is the son of the economist John Kenneth Galbraith. He's also a former U.S. ambassador to Croatia and a former staffer on the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, for which he traveled in Iraq working in support of the Kurds. Such extensive experience laces Galbraith's story with compelling scenes. (In one incident he even goes undercover, dressing as a local.) His background also emboldens Galbraith to speak in stronger terms. An example is one of his chapter titles -- "Arrogance and Ignorance" -- three words that may be the most concise explanation yet for the whole American story in Iraq.

Galbraith's finale is his argument for how Iraq should be remade. He calls this "the three-state solution" -- that is, three quasi-independent regions for Iraq's three warring sects, the Sunnis, the Shiites and the Kurds. Galbraith's idea has already gotten some traction in Congress, primarily with Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del.. And, upon reading through his accounts of the gruesome, relentless persecution that the Kurds have endured ("After all that I heard and saw," he writes, "I was convinced the Kurds would never voluntarily agree to be part of Iraq again."), it is tempting to side with him. The problem is that Galbraith's vision dumps him into the strategic quagmire that now surrounds Iraq.

Even a casual reading of Middle East history demonstrates that Iraq's political landscape has long been complex, and its internal alliances and demographics ever-changing. Even on fundamentals of Iraq history -- and the new Iraq constitution that Galbraith helped draft -- other Mideast experts have very different takes. (See, for example, 2005's "Understanding Iraq," by veteran Harvard historian William Polk, and the writings of University of Oxford historian Reidar Visser, especially 2006's "Basra, the Failed Gulf State: Separatism and Nationalism in Southern Iraq.") Iraq's future, as Galbraith at times argues, is probably best left to the Iraqis.

Curiously, a missing ingredient in Galbraith's book, and in the two others as well, is any serious look at the region's glorious but eternally troubled history. We get close a few times, once in a delicious conversation, reported by Galbraith, between an Iraqi and an occupation official:

" 'You must have thoroughly studied the history of the British occupation of Iraq,' the Iraqi said to the self-confident American.

" 'Yes, I did,' the latter replied.

" 'I thought so,' said the Iraqi, 'because you seem determined to repeat every one of their mistakes.' "

Actually, the administration has been more thorough than that. A little further reading of history, in combination with these three books, shows that the Bush administration has repeated mistakes made in Vietnam as well.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE: Federal Prosecutor Admits Passion For Corruption Cases May Not Translate Into Shift In Political Culture (NIT)

By Joe Carlson

Northwest Indiana Times, October 1, 2006

After five years, Van Bokkelen says corruption indictments still major priority

With a mission to fight political corruption, Joe Van Bokkelen knew he had a major job on his hands in becoming the top federal prosecutor in a district that included Lake County.

Sure, Van Bokkelen and his prosecutors in the U.S. attorney's office have sent hundreds of drug dealers and gang thugs to prison -- particularly felons carrying firearms in defiance of strong federal anti-gun laws.

But when he came to office five years ago this month, Van Bokkelen carried a bias toward fighting public corruption.

In a wide-ranging interview last week, he said he's proud of the work accomplished under his watch. Those jailed include a former U.S. congresswoman (Katie Hall), a former state party chairman (Peter Manous), a former town judge (Deborah Riga), and more than 30 county, city and township employees.

"For the life of me, I don't understand why public officials think they're entitled to more money than the statute says," he said. "You shouldn't become a public servant to get rich. I have no tolerance for people who think they're entitled to more."

But some observers question the long-term impact of his work. Can one watchdog office change a political culture? Even Van Bokkelen acknowledged disappointment that his prosecutors' efforts don't seem to have changed the expectations voters have for their public servants.

U.S. Sen. Dick Lugar, who nominated Van Bokkelen to the office five years ago, had only praise for Van Bokkelen's "extraordinarily aggressive" efforts at fighting public corruption.

"His remarkable anticorruption and law enforcement efforts have been impressive and are appreciated locally as well as by the U.S. Justice Department and the White House," Lugar said in a written statement.

County Republican Party Chairman John Curley and Democratic Chairman Rudy Clay said Van Bokkelen had put the fear of God into certain political figures across the county.

"I think corruption in Lake County has diminished because of Joe Van Bokkelen," Clay said. "It's obvious that if your hand is caught in the cookie jar, you're going to suffer the penalties."

Scott King had a less sanguine view.

King has worked with Van Bokkelen in various roles since the 1970s, most recently as mayor of Gary, a city where federal prosecutors have spent considerable energies over the years.

King said public officials inclined to do wrong may not make their decisions based on what prosecutor happens to be in office at the time.

"I don't think good government gets made by outside investigative forces," King said. "It doesn't hurt, but that doesn't make it."

Van Bokkelen described a view that was closer to King's than Clay's.

He admitted disappointment that his focus on public corruption and the number of public officials his prosecutors have sent to jail have not created more desire to shake up the status quo in Lake County politics.

"People complain about government, but you tend to get the government you vote for," he said. "If at the end of the day you have to look to this office to get rid of those people, you've got problems. It has to start with the voters."

That doesn't mean Van Bokkelen, a Republican, wants to discourage voters from their long history of Democratic dominance. Voters can also voice their dissent in primary elections, but they haven't, he said.

"Lake County, as an electorate, seems satisfied with the status quo. They seem happy to let this office and (County Prosecutor) Bernie Carter's office take care of the people who get too far out of line," Van Bokkelen said.

Regardless of long-range impact, Van Bokkelen said he will not serve under another president, meaning he will retire by 2008 at the latest. He says he already knows when he will step down, but would not discuss it further.

In response to the requisite media inquiry about whether the near future holds more public corruption indictments, he put up a foot on his coffee table and replied in the affirmative.

"I think it's been a reasonably busy summer, and it's going to be a busy fall. I don't think I'll be wrong about that," he said. "We're going to be vigilant. ... And if anyone thinks we're not going to prosecute because we're stretched to the limit, they've got another thing coming."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Silicon Valley A 'Hotbed' For Spying (CCT)

By K. Oanh Ha

The Contra Costa Times, October 1, 2006

One day last June, FBI agents swooped into two affluent Silicon Valley homes and arrested two engineers. Lan Lee and Yuefei Ge stand accused of stealing proprietary chip designs and software from their employer, NetLogic Microsystems of Mountain View and Taiwan Semiconductor Manufacturing Co. in San Jose.

Now investigators are asking the Justice Department to charge Lee, an American citizen, and Ge, a Chinese national, with a more serious crime: economic espionage to benefit China.

The case highlights China's role as the main adversary in a complex game of 21st century espionage where many agents aren't trained spies in trench coats but businessmen, students and researchers. Silicon Valley, counterintelligence experts say, is ground zero.

"Silicon Valley is a hotbed" of economic espionage, said Don Przybyla, who heads a FBI counterintelligence unit in San Jose. The valley is home to many of the estimated 3,000 Chinese front companies nationwide set up to steal secrets and acquire technology, according to the FBI.

Lee and Ge allegedly set up a front company backed by a Beijing venture capital firm with links to China's military and planned to go into business with the Chinese government.

In a global economy where intellectual property has become a valuable currency, state-directed espionage increasingly targets technology and commercial trade secrets to advance a nation's military and economic strength.

The intertwining of the economies of America and China complicates the problem, experts say.

"America's being robbed blind. ... We simply don't want to believe it," said John Tkacik Jr., of the conservative think tank Heritage Foundation, who headed China intelligence analysis at the State Department in the early '90s.

DOJ_NMG_0072495

Other countries -- including U.S. allies such as France and Israel -- also steal American secrets, but China tops the list, experts say.

China is "the No. 1 counterintelligence threat that the U.S. faces," said David Szady, who until this spring was assistant director of the FBI's counterintelligence division.

"If you look at where the Chinese are going to get a lot of the research and development, cutting edge technology, from nanotechnology to quantum physics to the next generation of missiles and planes -- that all points to Silicon Valley," he added.

To counter the growing problem, the FBI added the San Jose economic espionage and counterintelligence unit in September, said officials. The FBI also operates an economic espionage unit in Palo Alto.

"We see the same people and institutions in China popping up again and again," said Julie Salcido, who oversees a Commerce Department unit in San Jose that focuses on export violations of technology with potential military uses.

The culprits may be government-backed research institutions, state-owned enterprises or individual provincial governments.

China's central government runs a program linked to its military, dubbed 863, that invests in companies with innovative technologies and that the FBI suspects is involved in many economic espionage cases.

China has a "market-driven espionage effort. What they collect is what they need," said Paul Moore, who served as the FBI's top analyst on Chinese counterintelligence for 20 years.

Jianhua Li, a Chinese embassy spokesman in Washington, D.C., scoffed at the claim that China is the chief threat to U.S. trade secrets.

"That assessment is not true," he said in a telephone interview. "You don't have evidence that the Chinese government is sending people to the United States to do this."

Experts say Chinese espionage often involves tapping the hundreds of thousands of Chinese students and visiting business executives in the United States.

A modest number of Chinese nationals living in the U.S. and Americans of Chinese descent also are recruited to help acquire information or technology, experts say.

U.S. spy catchers have been accused of unfairly targeting ethnic Chinese. That charge arose in the case of Los Alamos nuclear weapons scientist Wen Ho Lee, a Taiwanese-born American citizen suspected of giving nuclear secrets to China.

He was released in 2000 after pleading guilty to a felony count of mishandling classified information.

Even in the aftermath of Lee, some Asian-Americans still complain of racial profiling.

Szady counters that the government isn't singling out Chinese-Americans -- the Chinese government is.

The FBI's Palo Alto office is investigating about a dozen economic espionage cases with suspected ties to China, said Przybyla.

Nationwide, the number of cases involving China is not available, but it has spiked more than 50 percent in the past few years, said Szady.

The economic espionage unit only investigates cases in which it suspects involvement by a foreign government, though perpetrators often are charged with the lesser crime of trade secret theft.

That's because proving government involvement is difficult, partly because money isn't always a visible ingredient of the plot, experts said.

"Typically, China doesn't directly pay people dollars for documents," said Moore. But he added that money or a business deal might be in the background.

The Chinese word for intelligence agent is "pengyou," or friend, added Moore, who is compiling a dictionary of Chinese spying.

Appealing to the sympathetic to help China modernize is China's "holy grail of motivation," Moore said.

In many espionage cases in which suspects were simply charged with the theft of trade secrets, investigators suspected the Chinese government was the intended beneficiary, said Ross Nadel, the U.S. attorney who until this year handled all of the economic espionage cases in the Northern District of California court.

The FBI has set up an outreach program for defense contractors and Silicon Valley companies, but agents say they often encounter resistance from victimized firms.

Many corporations don't want the exposure, particularly public firms that fear news of a lost trade secret might hurt stock prices, say investigators.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pirro Receives Support At S.I. Rally (NSDY)

By Bryan Virasami, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 2, 2006

At a Staten Island rally, Jeanine Pirro got a warm welcome from her Republican colleagues who also slammed her opponent and vowed to stick with her through Election Day despite her recent bug planting scandal.

In a show of Republican unity, Pirro, the state GOP candidate for attorney general, was among friendly faces at the rally that included gubernatorial candidate John Faso and Rep. Vito Fossella of Staten Island.

After the rally, Pirro made another defiant call for Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate the leak about her alleged plot to bug her husband's boat over suspicions he was having an affair.

Pirro said she wants a "fast track" probe of the leak to help clear her name so that she can focus on the campaign.

"We've seen it too often. You hear about smears in a political campaign and then all of a sudden at the end of the campaign it all goes away," Pirro said. "Not this time, not with this candidate and not here in New York any more."

At the rally, inside an office of Fossella's, a few dozen supporters showed up, including veterans and union leaders.

A man in the crowded office, appearing as if to counter the views of some critics, shouted words of encouragement to Pirro: "You're an extremely serious candidate, extremely serious. Don't drop out."

Faso issued the strongest words of support to Pirro and knocked her opponent in the race, Andrew Cuomo.

"If you put the credentials of our candidate for attorney general versus their candidate, you will find their candidate ... has a last name but he has no credentials," Faso said.

Some Republicans said Pirro can remain a strong candidate.

"I think she's handling it well," said former Republican mayoral candidate Thomas Ognibene of Queens. "It was no harm, no foul but the fact this information was released ... in the middle of the campaign is something we need to be concerned about."

Pirro later marched in the annual Staten Island Columbus Day Parade. Among the officials there were Mayor Michael Bloomberg and his girlfriend, Diana Taylor and City Council Speaker Christine Quinn.

Some women along the route were jumping to Pirro's defense yesterday.

"I like what she stands for and I don't like what they're doing to her, the other side," said Joyce Nolan, a doctor's receptionist from Staten Island, referring to Democrats. "I think they're giving her a raw deal because she's really good."

Pirro Plan A Conspiracy? (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler And Jennifer Sinco Kelleher, Newsday Staff Writers

Long Island Newsday, October 1, 2006

To federal prosecutors, it may not matter that attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro and former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik did not fully act on discussions about planting a bug on her husband's boat to try to find out if he was having an extramarital affair. Regardless, the two still may have violated federal conspiracy laws, sources familiar with the investigation said Saturday.

One source noted that if someone plans and takes steps to carry out a bank robbery, one doesn't actually have to rob a bank to be charged with conspiracy.

But in an interview Saturday, Pirro's attorney, Paul Shechtman, scoffed at the entire investigation.

"As Gertrude Stein once said, 'There is no there there,'" Shechtman said. "Conspiring to put a recording device on marital property is not a federal crime."

Kerik's attorney, Joseph Tacopina, could not be immediately reached for comment.

It is not entirely clear under what circumstances one spouse can bug another or whether the site of the potential bugging -- in this case, the boat of Pirro's husband, Albert -- is a joint marital property, the sources said.

Pirro, a Republican who formerly served as Westchester district attorney, has admitted discussing the bugging plan, but has said she did so in anger over the possibility that her husband was cheating.

The sources also rejected Jeanine Pirro's suggestion that the investigation was politically motivated or a continuation of what she calls a vendetta against her and her husband by Elliott Jacobson, an assistant U.S. attorney.

Jacobson successfully prosecuted Albert Pirro for tax evasion, for which Pirro was sent to prison for 11 months, and is actively involved in the current investigations of Jeanine Pirro and Kerik. The sources acknowledged that the current investigations are centered in the U.S. attorney's branch office in White Plains, where Jacobson works.

But the sources noted that Michael Garcia, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District, was appointed by President George W. Bush and that he is not known for launching what might be considered controversial investigations.

Saturday afternoon, one of Jeanine Pirro's neighbors shouted at reporters in front of the candidate's sprawling Harrison home that the family should be left alone.

"I think they need privacy," barked Anthony Pergola from his red BMW, its engine idling. "What happens in her personal life shouldn't affect her winning the election."

Pirro herself voiced a similar message in a radio interview Saturday on WABC/770 AM, in which she said the FBI should focus on terrorism and other issues plaguing society -- not people's private lives.

"The private lives of everyone are really not relevant and shouldn't be a part of federal investigations," Pirro said. "Since when does the federal government have no work to do? We've got terrorism on the plate. We've got all kinds of major issues -- gangs, drugs. And they want to get involved in the married lives of couples? This isn't what law enforcement should be about. The FBI should have better things to do."

News reporters and photographers have been camped in front of the Pirros' home since Friday, when the photograph of Al Pirro's reputed mistress was plastered on the covers of newspapers and aired on television. Sources have confirmed that Jeanine Pirro suspected her husband was having an affair with Lisa Santangelo, who has long been a friend of the Pirros. She and her husband, attorney Michael Santangelo, live nearby. Michael Santangelo defended Al Pirro at his trial for tax evasion in 1999 and 2000, and negotiated deals for clients with Jeanine Pirro, then the Westchester district attorney.

In the radio interview Saturday, Pirro described the bugging plan as a kind of extension of her lawyerly instincts.

"I wanted to know if my suspicions were correct," she said. "I've always put evidence where my allegations are. I didn't want to be in a situation accusing someone without knowing."

Aside from the radio interview, Pirro kept a low profile Saturday. Through the morning and much of the afternoon, no one emerged from her home, where a large black poodle frolicked on the manicured lawn.

Today, Pirro is expected to attend a rally on Staten Island and later march in the Columbus Day parade there. After that, she is scheduled to make an appearance at a street festival in Brooklyn.

Jurors Acquit Vigil On 23 Of 24 Counts (LAT/AP)

By Tim Korte, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE — A former state treasurer was convicted Saturday of one count of attempted extortion and acquitted of 23 remaining counts of extortion and racketeering in his public corruption trial.

Robert Vigil's conviction for attempted extortion carries a possible prison sentence of up to 20 years, but the judge could sentence him to as little as 12 months.

Vigil sat motionless as the counts were read in court shortly after 1 p.m. His wife, Viola, and other relatives began to cry as U.S. District Judge James Browning read "not guilty" on the 23 counts.

When they first indicted Vigil last year, prosecutors alleged a web of public corruption in which Vigil gave business to investment advisers in exchange for kickbacks. Vigil resigned in October 2005, after the Legislature started impeachment proceedings.

The federal investigation -- code-named "Midas Touch" -- spanned two years and also led to the arrest of Michael Montoya, Vigil's predecessor. Montoya pleaded guilty to lesser charges and aided the prosecution in its case against Vigil.

The charges sent shock waves through state government and triggered a flurry of proposals to tighten oversight of the treasurer's office and its investment of nearly $5 billion in public money.

The jury began deliberations Friday, after a nearly four-week trial during which the defense called no witnesses.

Outside the courthouse, Vigil's lawyer Sam Bregman said of the single conviction: "That one count is where we feel we have our best legal basis to overturn it." Vigil did not take questions.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jonathan Gerson said he was pleased the jury had found Vigil guilty on the one count. The attempted extortion count involved a former treasurer's office employee who claimed Vigil pressured him to hire the wife of a former treasurer as a subcontractor.

Vigil, a Democrat and former state auditor, was elected to a four-year term as treasurer in November 2002 and took office in 2003.

Jury foreman Bill Strouse said the panelists didn't believe government witnesses, including Montoya. "The acquittal doesn't mean Mr. Vigil was universally admired," he said. "It just means he wasn't guilty of a crime."

Because he was not convicted of racketeering, Vigil will not have to face proceedings to forfeit about $255,000 that the government had claimed was linked to kickbacks.

Vigil was allowed to remain free pending a sentencing hearing. A date for that hearing was not immediately set.

His first prosecution last spring ended in a mistrial May 22 when one juror held out for an acquittal.

Vigil Guilty In Corruption Case (KRQE-TV)

KRQE-TV, October 1, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE -- Former State Treasurer Robert Vigil faces up to 20 years in prison after being found guilty Saturday of one of the 24 racketeering and extortion charges filed against him.

The federal court jury acquitted Vigil of the other 24 counts convicting him of attempted extortion.

The verdict ending the four-week trial was reached after 1 1/2 days of deliberations. At 11:35 a.m. jurors sent U.S. District Judge James Browning a note indicating they were ready to share the verdict read in open court early this afternoon.

Vigil walked out arm in arm with his family today ending his second trial.

Jurors found him not guilty of demanding and accepting kickbacks while state treasurer despite what appeared to be compelling evidence against him including secret recordings and testimony from former colleagues who cooperated with the FBI and federal prosecutors.

Undercover video showed Vigil accepting thousands of dollars in cash from a man doing business with the state. However juror Michael Cisneros told KRQE News 13 the evidence didn't convince him Vigil demanded any payments but did suggest he had been set up.

Jurors agreed on the one extortion count because some things Vigil did couldn't be overlooked, he added.

"They convicted Mr. Vigil of the 24th charge, and they've adjudged him a felon," Assistant U. S. Attorney Jonathon Gerson said. "The jury found the government proved beyond a reasonable doubt Mr. Vigil committed extortion while in office."

The charge of attempted extortion centered on the testimony of George Everage, a former employee in the treasurer's office who resigned to pursue contract work.

Everage testified Vigil would not hire him for the independent contract position unless Everage hired the wife of former State Treasurer Michael Montoya, Vigil's predecessor.

Vigil's attorney Sam Bregman promised an appeal.

"He was found guilty on one count, and that count actually is where we feel we have our best legal basis to overturn that count," Bregman said. Right now Vigil and his family would like some time alone, his attorneys said.

A sentencing date for Vigil has not been set. He faces one to 20 years in prison for attempted extortion.

Vigil trial began Sept. 5 with testimony ending Thursday when the defense rested without calling any witnesses and relying instead on vigorous cross-examination of prosecution witnesses.

The defense used the same strategy in the first trial which ended in May with jurors saying they were hopelessly deadlocked 11-1 for conviction on some of the charges.

Joan Vennochi Column: Carnage On The Streets Falling On Deaf Ears (BOS)

By Joan Vennochi, Globe Columnist

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

ACROSS THE COUNTRY, violent crime is on the rise. Does anyone in Washington care?

No, complains a growing chorus of police chiefs and mayors.

``They're not home," says Boston's mayor, Thomas M. Menino, when asked about the federal response to pleas for assistance in fighting urban crime. ``Mayors are frustrated. They're on the frontlines, and no one's helping."

The global war on terrorism -- the one fought in Iraq, Afghanistan, and at home -- is now the Bush administration's priority. The other war on terror -- the one against street gangs and miscellaneous thugs across America -- is left to resource-deprived locals.

``The federal government has stepped back significantly from dealing with the issue of local crime," charges Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton. ``This administration in Washington clearly feels that local crime is an issue for local towns and municipalities."

Bratton said he and other local law enforcement officials met last summer with US Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and ``expressed our frustration" with the lack of support from Washington. According to Bratton, Gonzales was not moved by their pleas: ``He told us the priorities of the federal government have to be focused on issues of terrorism, to prevent the cataclysmic casualties we saw clearly at the World Trade Center [during the Sept. 11, 2001 attack]. But the reality is, the 16,000 American citizens we are losing to gun violence and many thousands of others being shot, far surpasses anything launched by groups engaged in terrorism."

The FBI's latest statistics show that violent crime -- murder, robbery, and aggravated assault -- increased by 2.3 percent between 2004 and 2005. This is the largest one -year increase in 14 years, according to research done by the Police Executive Research Forum, a law enforcement policy center based in Washington.

A spike in homicides and robberies forced the police chief in Washington to declare a crime emergency over the summer. Overall, crime is down in New York City; but as The New York Times has reported, crime committed by young people, including murder, is rising.

Boston is confronting an increase in shootings -- 256 nonfatal shootings and 39 homicides with a firearm so far in 2006, versus 208 nonfatal shootings and 30 homicides with a firearm at the same time in 2005. This past week, shots were fired at a group of Charlestown High School students. Fortunately, no one was hurt in the brazen attack, which may be linked to a notorious street gang. Indeed, Boston police believe 65 percent of such shootings are gang-related.

``We are on the front end of a tipping point of a surge in violent crime," said Chuck Wexler, head of the Police Executive Research Forum.

In August, police chiefs and mayors gathered in Washington at a forum sponsored by Wexler's group to discuss the problem. The session led to follow-up conversations with top Justice Department officials, but as of yet, no funding commitments. During a recent press briefing, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty emphasized the decrease in property crime and downplayed more ominous trends.

As violence increases, the federal government is offering fewer resources specifically targeted to fight such crime . In the 1990s, local officials successfully lobbied the Clinton administration for help in fighting gang violence. In Bill Clinton's last budget cycle, $500 million in discretionary funding went straight to police departments across the country. The money put officers on the street and supported gang prevention programs. The Bush administration has since redirected funding from police departments to faith-based organizations; from community policing to homeland security; from discretionary funding to restricted.

In Boston, for example, the police department averaged about $6 million a year in discretionary funding from 1996 to 2002. From 2003 to 2005, the Boston Police Department averaged $3 million a year. So far in 2006, the BPD received a little over $2 million. Meanwhile, federal homeland security grants were specifically designated for port security and emergency training and equipment.

The willingness to ignore the latest crime statistics might also be explained by its flesh-and-blood victims. ``Males, blacks, and persons age 24 or younger continued to be victimized at higher rates than females, whites, and persons age 25 or older," concluded a National Crime Victimization Survey, released recently by the US Department of Justice.

The global war on terrorism is now a national priority, but it took the shock of 9/11 to make that happen.

What will it take to make the homegrown violence on America's streets of equal concern in the nation's capital?

Experiment Will Test The Effectiveness Of Post-Prison Employment Programs (NYT)

By Erik Eckholm

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

CHICAGO — As raw garbage streamed by on a conveyer belt, newly released convicts pulled out paper, plastics and other recyclables on a recent morning, throwing aside the occasional brick or mattress.

Noisy, dusty and smelly, paying $6.50 an hour, the jobs yield neither the swagger nor the swag that these men and women chased as drug dealers, thieves or worse. But many of them see the temporary work as a fresh start.

The jobs are arranged by a Chicago charity, the Safer Foundation, which works with current and former prisoners. Offering transitional jobs like these — immediate, closely supervised work and help finding permanent employment — is a growing tactic in the effort to usher felons back to society and curb recidivism. Now the effectiveness of this approach is about to be tested scientifically for the first time.

Starting in January, the employment and recidivism rates of 2,000 newly released male prisoners, all with similar histories of little work and poor schooling, will be studied in Detroit, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Chicago.

Half of the men will receive more limited aid: instruction in work behavior, résumé preparation and other employment skills and help looking for a job. The other half will get those services and also a few months of temporary work in places like the recycling plant here — a chance for them to get into the unfamiliar rhythms of a regular job.

The experiment, which will track the two groups over three years, is being sponsored by the Joyce Foundation in Chicago and directed by the Manpower Development Research Corporation in New York, which specializes in scientific studies of poverty programs.

Separately, the research group is conducting a controlled study of the transitional jobs program at the Center for Employment Opportunities in New York, which provides maintenance crews for public facilities and has been a national model.

"If you ask inmates what they want most, they want a job," said Mindy Tarlow, executive director of the center in New York. "But they don't know what that means."

She added, "What we're competing with is making some money at night on a street corner instead of having to show up somewhere at 8 a.m. every day."

Despite the apparent promise of transitional jobs, questions remain about their long-term effectiveness that the study hopes to address.

Are those who last through these programs such a select group — so motivated to change — that they would succeed anyway, or can well-timed help turn others around, too?

Can work-site counseling, sobriety meetings and a strong dose of mainstream work overcome the criminal pull of old haunts and friends?

And more fundamentally: will people with low skills, even if they adapt to steady work, ever make wages high enough to support a family and stifle the temptation to return to crime?

Roberto Reyes, a 36-year-old high school dropout in Chicago who has served seven years on burglary, gun and drug charges, works the conveyer belt at a recycling plant that is run for the city by Allied Waste Services.

Mr. Reyes has labored at the plant for four months, the longest he has held a job. "The money here is not that much, but it's better than nothing," he said. "Sometimes you wake up and don't want to come to work, but I'm not going to leave this until I find another job. I knew I couldn't just keep going on with that lifestyle and see life pass me by."

Mr. Reyes's determination is evident, but the numbers and records of people in his situation are daunting.

In Chicago, more than 20,000 prisoners come home from state facilities each year. Fifty-four percent are re-incarcerated within three years for new crimes or parole violations — a tale of wasted lives and victimized communities that is repeated nationwide among more than 600,000 prisoners that are released annually.

While common sense, and prisoners themselves, say that employment is vital to an honest new life, the obstacles are huge. A majority of those leaving prison did not finish high school and have little legitimate work experience. Many have serious drug or psychological problems that must be treated before they can hold a regular job. And while transitional programs may acclimatize them to the time-clock world of the workplace, many are likely to remain stuck in low-end jobs anyway.

Those who work with prisoners say that enticing onetime thugs to give work a try is not always as hard as it sounds. "They tell us that what comes with the street life is looking over your shoulder all the time," said Diane Williams, president of the Safer Foundation. One key, she said, seems to be getting released prisoners into work quickly, when the desire to normalize their lives is strongest.

Jimmy Parker, 24, was in and out of prison and hustling until six months ago when he decided, as he put it, "enough is enough."

"This job is rough, but I'm trying to change my life around," he said during a break at another recycling site run by Allied. "I've accomplished one thing — I got my own studio apartment — and someday I want to get custody of my daughter."

The Safer Foundation has eight employees who search for companies willing to hire former prisoners. Allied Waste's experience with such workers has been positive, said Robert Kalebich, general manager for the company in Chicago. Safer keeps a full-time "job coach" at each work site to advise workers and deal with disputes.

"If anything we see an advantage in this arrangement," Mr. Kalebich said. "If we hire off the street we have to wonder are they trained, are they here legally, are they properly drug tested."

Raphael Carter served drug time when he was 18, stayed out for nearly a decade, then found himself in prison again. "I woke up and said, I can't do this anymore, it's a dead end road," he recalled, adding that he now has two children, 13 and 6, who depend on him.

"You have to weigh the options, would you rather go back to jail or get a little increment of money and see your kids," said Mr. Carter, 30, who lives with his girlfriend and her four children. "Being older, I made the right choice."

He worked for six months at the recycling job, then found a chance in a nearby city driving a forklift for the attractive wage of $11.60 an hour. But his car broke down once too often during the hour and a half drive to work, he said, and he was let go.

Now he works for a company that erects large party tents, a seasonal job at $8.50 an hour, and he is consulting the Safer listings for a permanent job.

"By myself I wouldn't have had any of these opportunities," he said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Wisconsin A Gay Marriage Battleground (AP)

By David Crary

AP, October 1, 2006

When it comes to statewide votes on gay marriage, the score so far is 20-0 in favor of keeping it a one-man, one-woman institution.

If there's a chance to break the streak on Nov. 7, it might be in Wisconsin, where activists believe that support from unions, college students and church leaders — coupled with hoped-for conservative apathy — could enable them to finally overcome the string of losses.

Among the hopeful are Debbie Knepke and Candice Hackbarth, devoted partners for nine years, raising a 3-year-old daughter and 7-month-old son in pleasant Milwaukee neighborhood. They have joined some 8,000 other volunteers in a bid to defeat a proposed state constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage and civil unions.

"It makes us mad that the Christian conservatives are so against us," said Knepke, 41. "If they came into our house, they'd find we're no different from anybody else. We're every single thing they consider good parents to be."

Eight states will vote on ban-gay-marriage amendments in November, following 20 that previously approved such measures. Passage is considered certain in Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Tennessee, but gay-rights strategists believe their side is at least competitive in Arizona, Colorado, Virginia and Wisconsin.

Supporters of banning gay marriage remain confident of victory, but optimism also is high in the ranks of Fair Wisconsin, a coalition fighting the proposed amendment since it surfaced in the Legislature in 2004. Large labor unions, many religious leaders, and top Democratic officials — including Gov. Jim Doyle — have spoken out against the measure.

"This could be the state where we beat this thing," said Fair Wisconsin campaign chief Mike Tate. "I'm not saying it's easy, but we've got the right ingredients on the table."

Tate believes the gay marriage issue — which helped motivate conservative voters in 2004 — is no longer fueling the same urgency, possibly diminishing conservative turnout. One reason is recent court rulings in New York and Washington state against same-sex unions, leaving Massachusetts as the only state allowing gay marriage.

The head of the rival campaign, Julaine Appling of Vote Yes For Marriage, said her side may wind up being outspent and out-advertised, but she believes Fair Wisconsin's confidence is misplaced.

"It's a gross misunderstanding of the people of Wisconsin," she said. "They are good solid stock. They understand that marriage is a good public institution — it's appropriate to protect it as the union of a man and a woman exclusively."

There have been no major opinion polls since mid-August, when a survey showed Appling's "Yes" side with 48 percent support, compared to 40 percent against the amendment. Tate says the gap is narrowing as undecided voters tilt against the measure; Appling believes the final result will be in line with Michigan and Ohio, where similar measures prevailed with roughly 60 percent support in 2004.

One of Appling's allies, Marquette University political scientist Christopher Wolfe, believes the amendment will pass, but perhaps narrowly.

"It's certainly a lot closer than the people favoring the amendment would like," said Wolfe, who observed that even at his Roman Catholic school many students oppose the ban.

Tate, at 27 a veteran of numerous campaigns, believes campuses statewide will provide vital support for his side. "This is a motivating issue for young people, whether they're gay or not," he said.

While Milwaukee and the state capital, Madison, tend to veer leftward, the rest of the state is generally more conservative. But opinions are deeply divided.

Among those opposing the amendment is Sue Werblow, 60, a longtime school board member in Oshkosh whose three children include a gay son now practicing law in Seattle.

"I would hope and pray people will stand up for nondiscrimination in our constitution, but it's anybody's guess," she said. Her son, observing from afar, "thinks we're going to lose this battle."

Kathleen Mentink, a college instructor in Eau Claire who favors the amendment, said most people in her area share her position, "but it's a quiet support." Some voters, she suggested, have been wary of revealing pro-amendment views for fear of being depicted as narrow-minded.

Debbie Knepke finds it hard to be dispassionate. Because the children she helps raise, Sienna and Nolan, were borne by Hackbarth, Knepke has no legal standing as a parent and fears passage of the amendment would dim her chances of ever gaining such recognition.

"It's the living in fear of what might happen," she said, fighting back tears. "I can't imagine, if something happened to Candy, that I would not have my children."

The campaign has divided Milwaukee's black community. U.S. Rep. Gwen Moore is among several black leaders opposing the amendment, while the "Yes" campaign has recruited a cadre of black pastors who are urging their congregations to support it.

Among them is the Rev. Walter Harvey, pastor of the 2,500-member Parklawn Assembly of God.

"Those who oppose the amendment are more aggressive in their advertising for a reason," he said. "The burden of proof is upon them — they have a longer hill to climb, more people to convince. They will ultimately lose."

Moore, a single mother, vehemently objects to the second sentence of the amendment, which would ban civil unions and other legal arrangements "substantially similar" to marriage.

She worries that such terminology could spawn litigation challenging all sorts of informal family relationships, including benefits her own children have received from their father.

Appling insists that domestic partnership benefits will not be barred as long as they don't parallel marriage rights.

But Moore contends the amendment betrays Wisconsin's politically progressive tradition.

"A constitution is a sacred document — we use them to confer rights on people, not to write in discrimination," she said. "It's completely the wrong vehicle for this kind of negative activity."

Chaplain Prayer Provision Stricken From Military Bill (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee
The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Congress removed a controversial provision in a military bill on Friday that would have permitted chaplains to offer sectarian prayer at mandatory nondenominational events. At the same time, lawmakers moved to rescind guidelines issued last year by the Air Force and Navy meant to curtail the risk of religious coercion and proselytizing within the ranks.

“The provisions in today’s bill represent a full step forward and a half step back,” said Representative Steve Israel, Democrat of New York and a member of the House Armed Services Committee. “We removed dangerous language undermining religious freedom and military effectiveness, but I am distressed that instead of moving forward with unequivocal religious tolerance in the military, we are reopening old loopholes that permitted some acts of coercion and proselytizing.”

For several weeks, wrangling over the chaplain prayer provision had stalled the National Defense Authorization Act, a bill that sets military spending levels. The House version of the bill introduced language that would have allowed for sectarian prayer, but the Senate version had no such provision.

Chaplains can pray according to the traditions of their faith at worship services, where attendance is voluntary. But they are also called upon to offer prayers at mandatory functions, like changes of command, banquets and speeches.

The provision’s backers — among them Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee — contended that Christian chaplains had long invoked Christ in nondenominational settings. The provision was championed by some evangelical chaplains and Christian groups, like Focus on the Family.

But it was opposed by the Pentagon, the National Association of Evangelicals and a dozen or so ecumenical groups. They argued that at mandatory events the longstanding custom had been to offer a nonsectarian prayer, for example, mentioning God rather than Christ. Those groups maintained that offering sectarian prayer would create division within the military.

Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, suggested that the issue of chaplain prayer be taken up in hearings at the next session of Congress.

Congress did hand some evangelicals a victory by abrogating the Air Force and Navy guidelines on religious expression. Those guidelines were issued in the wake of a 2004 scandal in the Air Force Academy, when some staff members, alumni and cadets accused evangelical Christians in leadership posts of aggressive proselytizing and discrimination. The Air Force guidelines were softened earlier this year to allow officers to discuss their religion with subordinates.

"We're pleased with it, though we would have preferred the strong language that was proposed in the defense bill," said Billy Baugham, a retired Army chaplain and executive director of the International Conference of Evangelical Chaplain Endorsers, a consortium of nine denominations that sponsor members of the clergy in military chaplaincy. Of the guidelines, he said: "It puts us back to where we were. Now chaplains can go back to the business of being chaplains."

Other critics of the guidelines, which they saw as too lax on proselytizing, also welcomed their removal. The Military Religious Freedom Foundation, a watchdog group, said it would give organizations like theirs a chance to push for stricter guidelines. The group is led by Mikey Weinstein, an Air Force veteran and graduate of the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs who is Jewish. Mr. Weinstein said he had become concerned about religious proselytizing at the academy while his two sons were attending.

Spokesmen for the Air Force and the Navy said Friday that they had not had a chance to review Congress' decision and so had no comment on eliminating the guidelines. Maj. Stewart Upton, a spokesman for the Pentagon, said, "We intend to comply with the law."

Coeducation No Cure-all, Foes Say (WT)

By Ruth Lang

Some alumnae and teachers at Randolph-Macon Woman's College say accepting male students to resolve financial problems is a shortsighted effort that undermines the school's 115-year-old tradition.

"As we try to adapt ourselves to the educational needs of men, I fear we will descend into mediocrity," James Peterson, chairman of the English department said in a letter to the school's board of trustees. "We'll do all right. We'll survive. But we won't be able to continue to give that special quality of education to young women."

Board members voted 25-2 last month in favor of admitting men in the fall of 2007, the culmination of a three-year effort by the board to develop strategies to ensure the college's future. The vote also brings in a new strategic plan that emphasizes a "global honors curriculum," which focuses more on individual study, travel and honor-system values.

Interim school President Virginia H. Worden and Alumnae Director Heather Garnett said less income as a result of 15 years of dwindling enrollment in part led to the changes.

"It comes down to needing more students on the campus," Miss Garnett said. "We need more students who are paying a greater percentage of their tuition."

However, the changes have sparked a backlash -- from alumnae withdrawing their support to protests and boycotts by many of the about 680 female undergraduates on the pastoral Lynchburg, Va., campus

In a survey days before the Sept. 9 vote, 71 percent of the alumnae who responded said they were "very unhappy" with the new plan, and some have joined forces to seek a legal remedy to overturn the decision.

About 79 percent of the students also responded as "very unhappy," according to the survey. However, the majority of the respondents said they would rather the school accept male students than close.

"I hope that we can come up with a way alumnae can support Randolph-Macon moving forward, although I understand the feelings our alumnae are having right now," said Miss Garnett, a 1986 alumna.

Though an alumnae revolt could result in less scholarship money, Miss Worden, of the Class of 1969, said the board still sees coeducation as the future.

"I don't think [the board] will reverse that decision," she said.

Miss Garnett said "good things" will come from the changes. She said, for example, the college will be able to compete better in the higher-education market and offer more opportunities to students.

"We aren't changing what we do, to accommodate men," Miss Garnett said. "We are expanding our offerings and opening our doors in order to offer this unique experience to more students."

Miss Worden acknowledged the school will lose some of its identity and perhaps provide less individual attention, but she said it will still offer a quality education.

Despite the opposition, some students embrace the changes.

"I think, to be more of a global college, to better prepare women for the work force, they should have men around them," said Amanda Weller, a sophomore dance major from Pennsylvania.

Angela Grove, a junior philosophy major, said having male students will likely challenge female students' views on competition and school spirit, but the changes "can only enhance our campus."

Miss Worden does not expect a large number of male applicants during the first few years and pointed out that other women's colleges that switched to coed had a large number of female applicants after the change.

"I think it's going to be an interesting next year," Miss Weller said.

ANTITRUST:

Coalition Urges Smithfield Inquiry (SFAL)

By Kevin Dobbs

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, October 1, 2006

Meatpacker's proposal ignites antitrust fears

A coalition of agriculture and consumer groups threw its support behind Midwest lawmakers who want the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate Smithfield Foods' plan to buy rival Premium Standard Farms of Missouri, a deal that would merge the nation's two largest hog producers.

The coalition contends that the proposed acquisition, if approved, will hasten the consolidation of livestock markets and swing open the doors to inflated pork prices for consumers. That, critics say, could happen because the deal would lessen competition in the livestock industry.

That, they say, should raise antitrust concerns for federal investigators.

"Ensuring that livestock markets operate in a free, fair and transparent manner is critical to our nation's agriculture economy. Without such open and competitive markets, independent producers cannot survive, and consumers lose," the coalition, which includes 15 groups in all, said in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The coalition includes Dakota Rural Action, Dakota Resource Council, the National Consumers League and the National Farmers Union.

Virginia-based Smithfield, which owns the John Morrell & Co. meatpacking plant in Sioux Falls, announced in September it would buy its rival for about $650 million in cash and stock.

The deal is expected to close in the first quarter of 2007. If it does, Smithfield will own about 20 percent of the nation's hogs. That could limit independent hog producers' options and ability to get good prices for their meat, lawmakers said.

South Dakota Sens. John Thune and Tim Johnson backed Iowa's senators in calling for an antitrust investigation in September. Thune said the deal deserves "scrutiny" in large part because it could hurt South Dakota's small farmers.

The Department of Justice has yet to give final word on how or when it will investigate the deal. But it could block the merger on antitrust grounds, or it could require the companies to sell off some of their operations.

Dennis Treacy, Smithfield vice president of government affairs, acknowledged shortly after the deal was announced that it represents more consolidation in the pork industry. But he said the merged companies will continue to work closely with independent producers. He said the company is confident that the Justice Department will approve the merger.

Aside from antitrust concerns, analysts said last week that Smithfield has a history of making shrewd acquisitions.

Timothy Ramey, senior research analyst with D.A. Davidson & Co. in Oregon, which tracks the meatpacking industry, said Smithfield "has a very good track record" of acquiring companies and lifting profits.

The company's critics don't dispute that. But they worry corporate profits will come at too steep of a cost to producers and consumers.

"It obviously will have significant impacts on both independent hog producers and those who raise hogs under contract," Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa said.

National Farmers Union President Tom Buis said, "The livestock industry is already at an unacceptable level of concentration, and allowing the proposed acquisition to move forward is only going to make the situation worse."

The Battle for Guantánamo

It seems that the prisoners at Guantánamo are rewarded if they betray their political and religious beliefs and give information that may result in the death of their comrades (Tim Golden, Sept. 17). An American citizen who did that would be disgraced and, if he was a soldier, tried and imprisoned.

It is clear that their lives and the lives of their families will be in danger if they become “compliant” and word gets out. The prisoners know that word will eventually get out as to who cooperated and who did not.

Lastly, these men are not cowards. Their treatment does not meet reasonable standards. They, their friends, relatives and fellow believers will have very personal reasons to seek revenge, and they will. Treating them this way will surely come back to haunt us.

The Academic Blues

Michael Bérubé and I share the same politics; so do the vast majority of our colleagues (Sept. 17). Bérubé doesn't think that's a problem, however, because our students continue to challenge us in the classroom. But that's hardly a fair match, and Bérubé knows he can win it every time. Wouldn't our intellectual lives be richer if we faced sustained and sophisticated challenges from other professors, rather than from 18-year-old neophytes?

People like Bérubé and myself are fond of criticizing President Bush for surrounding himself with like-minded ideologues. Maybe it's time we looked in the mirror.

To suggest that liberal professors could sway their conservative students in the voting booth is somewhat akin to the old argument that gay teachers could sway straight students to a different lifestyle. To illustrate the dubiousness of this premise, I would point out that there was a generation of students on American campuses in the 60's and 70's who stood shoulder to shoulder with self-declared socialists and flagrantly liberal professors, all wanting to start the revolution. Many of these baby boomers voted for Republicans in the last two elections. So much for the influence of those professors.

Michael Bérubé is certainly right to say that if professors are doing their jobs right, students of all stripes should be made "to feel uncomfortable" about their beliefs. But I'm surprised that he does not see that that is just why the liberal bias in humanities departments is so damaging to education; students on the left seldom hear arguments from their teachers that might make them reconsider their positions.

My Satirical Self

Like Wyatt Mason's father, I am 79, a veteran of the U.S. Navy, and I, too, rage against what the Bush right-wing political machine has done to our country (Sept. 17). Both us old guys vent our anger at the madness around us by wrestling with the news in the columns and op-ed pages.

Wyatt is also perturbed, but he doesn't confront. He quells his frustrationby taking "shelter in the ridiculous," the satirical discourses of the Jon Stewarts and Rob Corddrys night after night on TV. I stopped watching them a long time ago. It's an exercise in futility. I, and apparently other members of my generation, are wary (and weary) of playing that game.

If the national news media have served to "contain" the outright lies served up by this administration, to package them in such a way as to make them seem within the parameters of acceptable political discourse, haven't satirists like Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert, however inspired, also served to contain our outrage at this process by packaging our potential for anger in exquisitely written and produced comedy?

Parallels with the Roman Empire are instructive: I wonder if something similar happened when Roman citizens, unable to act meaningfully against the original fascists, resorted to honing their wits rather than their weapons?

Bad Bidness

In the Sept. 3 column, the Ethicist told an art collector that accepting a proposal from a fellow collector to agree not to bid on the same prints in eBay auctions would be unethical. I agree. The Ethicist also reported a lawyer's advice that "collusive bidding is illegal in the auction world," adding that it "may not be illegal online — Internet auctions are largely unregulated." But the federal antitrust laws apply to competition on Internet auctions as much as to physical auctions. Agreements between bidders not to bid against one another or to bid at certain prices are criminal violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act, punishable by up to 10 years in prison.

The way the National Rifle Association is promoting a universal right to bear arms left me wondering about the N.R.A.'s position on the rights of nation-states to arm themselves (Joshua Kurlantzick, Sept. 17). If removing the right to own a weapon is the first step toward eliminating civil rights, then limiting a nation's ability to arm itself may be the first step toward making it vulnerable to invasion. As weapons of all kinds have become more powerful, the gun-ownership debate might open new paths for discussion on nuclear-arms control.

Citgo Pollution Charges In Corpus Highlight Problems With Law (SAEN)

By Anton Caputo, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, October 1, 2006

CORPUS CHRISTI — Two massive vats of oil, each capable of holding 12 million gallons, sat uncovered in this city's sprawling refinery row for at least a dozen years, releasing unknown quantities of toxic benzene into the air.

In August, the Justice Department leveled a 10-count criminal indictment against Citgo Petroleum Corp. and the environmental manager of its Corpus East plant, alleging the refinery released tons more of the cancer-causing chemical than allowed by law in 2001 and 2002 — while company officials knowingly underreported the emissions.

But state regulators have been trying unsuccessfully to force Citgo to install lids and pollution-control systems since 1999, according to a review of thousands of pages of regulatory documents obtained by the San Antonio Express-News under state open records laws.

The review revealed that the refinery's pollution issues go back much further than the indictment shows. State regulators, documents indicate, seemed to exert little influence over the the refinery's operation, and enforcement efforts often dragged on and on, letting the company operate with violations for years before paying fines.

Texas Commission on Environmental Quality records show that the refinery spewed tons more benzene than permitted not just in 2001 and 2002, as the federal indictment charges, but also in 1998, 1999 and 2000.

CITGO INDICTMENT

Document: The 16-page indictment

The federal government has criminally indicted Citgo Petroleum Corp. and Philip Vrazel, the environmental manager of Citgo's Corpus East Plant, for a series of pollution-related violations. If convicted, Citgo faces fines of up to $500,000 or twice the gross economic gain (whichever is greater) and five years of probation. Vrazel faces fines of up to $500,000 and up to five years in prison.

The charges are:

Two counts of violating of the National Emission Standard for benzene waste operations.

Two counts of operating open top tanks as oil-water separators without first installing the emission controls required by federal and state regulations.

Failing to identify in its 2000 report filed with the state all of the points in the refinery wastewater system where benzene was generated.

Five counts of violating the Migratory Bird Treaty Act, a result of birds landing in the open oil tanks.

After years of wrangling between regulators and oil company officials, lids now are being installed on the tanks. The work is scheduled for completion this year.

But the drawn-out process has fueled the ire of local residents and others around Texas who long have accused state environmental regulators of being soft on polluters — a charge underscored in a 2003 state auditor's report that found it was significantly less expensive for the industry to pay fines for polluting in Texas than to comply with the law.

"They're not afraid of the TCEQ," said Suzie Canales, an environmental advocate whose sister died of cancer after living in a Corpus neighborhood built on a landfill full of oil industry waste. "It's like my 4-year-old grandson. He won't do what I tell him because he knows I won't do anything."

Little action In fact, state regulators did cite Citgo for a dizzying array of violations, filing report after report and levying a fine every two or three years since 1999. But an analysis of the records shows how slow such a process can be.

The state first asked the company to equip the two massive tanks with roofs and pollution controls in 1999 as part of an inspection that netted about 50 violations at the plant. That case was combined with two others, bringing the total to 76 violations, said Mary Risner, the TCEQ's director of litigation.

Citgo fought all 76. And when the case was finally settled in 2002, regulators fined the company $750,000 but dropped the violation regarding the tanks. There simply wasn't enough evidence to force the point during the three years, the state argued, and the oil company fought the charge hard.

Citgo has long argued that the tanks were being erroneously treated as oil-water separators and didn't need the lids or pollution-control equipment. In its written response to the federal indictment, the oil company claims to have an Environmental Protection Agency memorandum and expert legal advice to back its claim.

Citgo officials did not respond to calls or e-mails for comment for this story, but vehemently denied any wrongdoing in a written statement that termed the federal charges "unprecedented."

Federal prosecutors, though, paint a starkly different picture in the indictment, citing company documents from the early 1990s that refer to the tanks as oil-water separators and, when discussing the environmental problems posed by the tanks, conclude that "installing floating roofs on tanks 116 and 117 is a sure fix for environmental compliance purposes, but it may not be the most cost effective option."

Despite what federal prosecutors claim Citgo knew, company officials were able to convince state regulators that they could not be forced to cover the tanks and add pollution-control equipment. After acquiescing and pulling the issue from its 1999 case, state regulators added it to another massive enforcement case in 2001.

That case involved 17 violations and was settled in 2004 with a $1.74 million penalty and the understanding that, among other things, Citgo would either take tanks 116 and 117 out of service or not use them as oil-water separators unless proper pollution control was installed.

The job, according to Citgo documents, should be complete this year.

Dragged on too long John Sadlier, the TCEQ's director of enforcement, admits that some of these cases probably dragged on too long. But he said much can be attributed to the sheer number of problems at the plant, and the state's habit at the time of combining enforcement actions as they came up, as opposed to filing and prosecuting separately.

Critics and others who have long followed the state's dealings with large industry are less kind.

"The agency dropped the ball on this," said Neil Carman, clean air director for the Lone State Chapter of the Sierra Club. "All of these benzene violations are serious violations."

Carman, who worked as an environmental regulator for the state of Texas before joining the Sierra Club, said the Citgo case illustrates a coziness between regulators and industry, particularly at TCEQ field offices such as Corpus Christi.

Victor Flatt, the A.L. O'Quinn Chair in Environmental Law at the University of Houston Law Center, believes that coziness is endemic to the state's environmental regulatory system. That's because Texas adopted a mindset of "cooperative enforcement" under the administration of Gov. George W. Bush that has prevailed ever since.

The idea is that a more punitive agency would just drive people to avoid environmental regulators altogether, while a softer approach encourages businesses to cooperate. This method hasn't exactly worked as advertised in Texas, where regulators have to deal with some of the largest and best-funded industries in the country, Flatt said.

'They got it going on' Jerome Bradford, 64, lived most of his life in the Oak Park Triangle, a neighborhood hemmed in by refineries on two sides and Interstate 37 on the third. Citgo bought out residents in the late 1990s after a series of refinery explosions and contamination problems caused an outcry. Bradford's father died of prostate cancer in 1993, about five years before the son took the buyout.

"The power of the refinery is something else," he said. "They got it going on, brother. They got it going on."

The biggest worry among nearby residents is benzene, a common pollutant naturally found in crude oil. Prolonged exposures at high levels can cause cancer, including leukemia, and other health problems.

One of the local air monitors — located in the now-abandoned Oak Park area — routinely shows the highest or among the highest levels of benzene of any monitors in the state. And this isn't the first time the federal government has stepped into this coastal Texas city with criminal charges against a local refinery because of benzene pollution.

Hiding and misreporting benzene pollution was the central theme of a massive criminal indictment the federal government brought against Koch Petroleum Group LP in 2000. A year later, Koch agreed to pay a $10 million fine and conduct $10 million worth of environmental projects to settle the case.

Despite the danger posed by benzene, there are no hard regulatory standards for the amount that can be in the air in Texas — only screening levels that act as a sort of guideline.

State toxicologist Michael Honeycutt said those guidelines are enforced by permits that limit the amount of benzene a facility can emit. He acknowledges that the method breaks down when refineries knowingly exceed those permit levels, as is charged in the Citgo and Koch cases.

"There are good companies. There are bad companies and there are ignorant companies," he said. "Some work hard to do the right thing and some hire good attorneys."

The state's screening level for benzene is a yearly average of one part per billion. The monitor in the Oak Park Triangle has been above that level since it was installed in 1997 — running more than double in 2002, 2003 and 2004 before dropping to 1.7 last year.

Another monitor in the nearby Hillcrest neighborhood has normally been below the screening level, but nudged just over it last year.

Although the benzene is over the state screening levels, Honeycutt said it really doesn't pose a major threat, particularly because the Oak Park neighborhood is now abandoned. Even if it weren't, levels at the Oak Park monitor are roughly equal to those found in a home of someone who routinely parks a car in the garage.

The state's heath-screening levels are based on the theoretical risk of one person in 100,000 getting cancer over a lifetime. Benzene levels of two double that risk. Benzene levels of three triple the risk, and so on.

"If those numbers were 10 or 15 I'd say, 'Oh, yeah, we need to be down there,'" Honeycutt said.

Retired preacher and Hillcrest resident Harold Branch, 84, has heard it before over the decades he's been fighting the area refineries. And he has a hard time balancing the talk of risk calculations and annual averages with what he's seen.

"They have polluted the area and so many people have died of cancer and other related diseases," he said. acaputo@express-news.net

To Control Avalanches, Railroad Seeks To Shell Park (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Environmentalists Protest Request to Protect Trains Using Artillery, Saying Wildlife Could Be Harmed

KALISPELL, Mont. -- The famed symbol of the Great Northern Railway was a mountain goat perched on a rock in Glacier National Park.

DOJ_NMG_0072509

That railroad's successor, the Burlington Northern Santa Fe Railway, now wants to lob artillery shells into mountain-goat habitat inside the park, which straddles the Continental Divide here in northwest Montana. The shelling would help control winter avalanches that sometimes threaten BNSF freight trains, about 40 of which pass daily through mountains just south of the park's border.

Besides seeking federal permission for the occasional wintertime bombardment of the park, the highly profitable railroad stands to benefit from little-known legislation -- passed in the Senate and pending in the House -- that would spend as much as $75 million in federal grants to pay for avalanche control.

The legislation, introduced by two senior Republican lawmakers from Alaska and written, in part, by an avalanche expert who is a paid consultant to BNSF, would approve the use of federal money to assist "avalanche artillery users."

Those who probably would benefit include state highway departments, ski areas and BNSF, if it receives permission from the National Park Service to bombard Glacier. The consultant and a railway spokesman said the railroad had nothing to do with the crafting of the bill and has not lobbied for its passage.

Using artillery for avalanche control is a well-established practice in Alaska and parts of the mountainous West. The 105mm shells used are military ordnance that spray shrapnel.

But advocates for the national parks and some of the nation's leading avalanche experts have strongly criticized BNSF's request to bombard Glacier. They have said the subsidized shelling of the park is aesthetically inappropriate and potentially harmful to wintering mountain goats, elk, deer, wolverines and endangered grizzly bears.

"There is a great hush over this park in the winter," said Steve Thompson, Glacier program manager for the National Parks Conservation Association, an advocacy group that works to protect the parks. "It would be a travesty to fire howitzers into the heart of one of our wildest natural lands."

It is unknown whether shelling would wake the bears, which hibernate during what could become the artillery season.

The Bush administration has strongly objected to the cost of the proposed avalanche legislation.

For most of the 100 years that trains have crossed the Rockies along the southern border of Glacier National Park, railroads have spent their own money to build and maintain snow sheds that cover the tracks. The sheds have worked well to protect passing trains, according to the Park Service.

Over the years, though, some snow sheds have been destroyed by fire. In addition, the snow pack in the park has been shifting, requiring avalanche protection on new stretches of track.

BNSF, a freight giant that is an amalgam of 390 railroads merged or purchased over the past 150 years, has chosen not to rebuild some burned avalanche sheds or to build new ones to protect track now threatened by avalanches.

The railroad has opted for artillery bombardment as the "efficient, proven practice used in potential avalanche areas in North America," said Gus Melonas, a spokesman for BNSF. He said the railroad prefers artillery because snow sheds are "are time-consuming to construct and extremely expensive."

The railroad has estimated the cost of building new snow sheds and replacing old ones at $110 million; they would cover a total of about a mile of unprotected track.

While shelling is much less expensive, avalanche experts say snow sheds are a safer, more reliable way to protect long freight trains in mountain areas, as well as to ensure that busy east-west rail lines remain open throughout the year.

"Using explosives to release avalanches is not a sure-fire method to maintain a safe rail corridor," said Don Bachman, president of the board of directors of the Center for Snow and Avalanche Studies in Silverton, Colo. "It's cheaper in the short run, but it could be terribly costly in the long run, not just in monetary cost, but lives and property."

The BNSF rail line near Glacier is a critical link in the economy of the Pacific Northwest, carrying about 33,000 container cars a day on trains that are often more than a mile long. When snow blocks the line for 36 hours or more, rail traffic sometimes stalls all the way from the West Coast to Chicago, causing backups of container ships in Seattle.

Bachman said BNSF should make the long-term investment in snow sheds, noting that it has the income to do so.

According to its annual report, the railroad is enjoying record growth and soaring profitability, with revenue of $13 billion last year and a 73 percent increase in operating income. To handle record freight volumes, the company said it plans to spend $2.4 billion this year on tracks, locomotives and technology.

"Our message to the railroad is this: You guys are making a lot of money, you can afford to do it right," said Thompson, of the National Parks Conservation Association.

The National Park Service has been studying the railroad's request to use artillery in Glacier and plans to release its assessment of the environmental consequences in late October. Officials in the park say the prospect of wintertime shelling is worrisome.

"We are concerned about the impacts on threatened and endangered species," said Mary Riddle, who monitors environmental protection in Glacier. "We are also concerned about explosives going off in areas where grizzly bears den. There is not a lot of research about this."

The consultant who helped write the avalanche bill, David Hamre, an Alaska-based avalanche expert, said he worked with the offices of Sen. Ted Stevens and Rep. Don Young, both Alaska Republicans, to write legislation to aid avalanche-prone areas across the United States, not just places where BNSF is threatened.

A spokesman for Young said Hamre "provided analysis for the bill and did help draft it." A spokesman for Stevens said the bill grew out of the concerns of many groups in Alaska and the senator's own interest in avalanches.

Local Governments Get Serious About The Environment (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

In the absence of serious national action, state and local governments and the private sector are taking the initiative in confronting the interlocked problems of global warming and energy conservation.

The most dramatic example is the legislation California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed last week mandating reductions in the state's emissions of the gases associated with global warming. But city governments and the private sector are also formulating some of the most innovative responses to a problem the federal government still refuses to confront head-on.

Exhibit A is a recently announced partnership between the American Institute of Architects and the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

The two groups have committed to an exhilarating goal: cutting in half by 2010 the amount of fossil fuels used to construct and operate commercial and residential buildings — and then achieving steady further reductions. By 2030, they want to produce "carbon neutral" buildings that will rely on conservation and renewable energy sources to completely eliminate their use of fossil fuels.

With this effort, the architects and the mayors are spotlighting an often overlooked element of the global warming challenge.

Discussions about controlling global warming usually focus on reducing the greenhouse gases produced by vehicles and factories. But the best evidence is that the energy used to heat, cool and light buildings (as well as the energy used in their construction) generates more greenhouse emissions than either transportation or industry. Depending on the estimates, buildings contribute anywhere from more than a third to nearly half of all greenhouse gas emissions in the United States.

Those figures define the challenge. Another number frames the opportunity. "Between now and 2035, three-fourths of the built environment will be new or renovated," says RK Stewart, a principal with the architectural firm Gensler, and the incoming president of the architects institute. "So the opportunity to change the energy profile of the built environment in this country is right there. We have the opportunity to drastically reduce our energy consumption."

In communities across the country, developers, architects and local governments are already pursuing that goal. One of the most aggressive cities has been Chicago. Under the spur of Mayor Richard M. Daley, the city is pursuing a remarkably comprehensive program to encourage green development.

The city has retrofitted hundreds of city facilities to reduce energy use and committed itself to constructing new municipal buildings to the highest standards of energy efficiency established by the U.S. Green Building Council, a private group that has set the most widely respected benchmarks in the field.

Chicago is also using more renewable energy in its buildings. And it is constructing dozens of "green roofs" — extensive rooftop gardens that dramatically lower roof temperatures (from 160 degrees on a summer day for a conventional roof to about half that) and thus reduce buildings' need for air conditioning.

Just as important, the city is encouraging private developers to move in the same direction. It offers attractive incentives for builders who commit to green development — not only grants and loans but something even more precious in a place like Chicago: a fast track through the city bureaucracy.

"You get a building permit faster if you are building a green building," says Sadhu Johnston, the city's environment commissioner. Among those who found the offer too good to refuse was Wal-Mart, which constructed a 70,000-square-foot green roof on the new store it opened last week.

In San Francisco, another milestone project is nearing completion. Sometime this winter, the first tenants will move into an 18-story federal office building there that offers a brilliant "back to the future" response to the challenge of reducing energy consumption.

Through an innovative design conceived by the Santa Monica architectural firm Morphosis, tenants in most of the building will rely on natural ventilation, rather than air conditioning, to control the temperature.

On the building's upper floors, the architects devised a sophisticated system of windows and vents that will open at night to capture the city's cool evening air and allow wind to push out the warm air that accumulates during the day. (For security reasons, the building's five lowest floors will operate with conventional air conditioning.)

The final step was to design a heavy concrete structure for the building that will hold the cool air during the day. "It was a very old idea in the architecture," says Morphosis principal Tim Christ, the building's project manager. "It's why buildings in the Southwest have very heavy walls: The structure stores the cooling energy."

Washington isn't entirely a bystander in this effort. The federal government commissioned the Morphosis design (under the Clinton administration). Last year's energy bill included a tax credit for developers who significantly reduce energy consumption in new buildings. And the Department of Energy is funding useful research into energy-efficient building materials, lighting and heating systems.

What's missing is a clear signal from Washington that reducing greenhouse emissions and increasing energy efficiency are national priorities. That's what it will probably take to make green development a truly mass phenomenon.

"The top performers are doing some very exciting things," says Judith Greenwald of the nonpartisan Pew Center on Global Climate Change. "But we need to bring the bottom and the average up more."

The real message of the green development movement is that American ingenuity can meet the test if the federal government challenges us to combat global warming by using energy more efficiently. Now all we need is a government with the confidence and foresight to issue the challenge.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Shooter's Letter Recounted Childhood Abuse (DENP)

By Kirk Mitchell, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 1, 2006

A fishing trip with his older brother was the only happy memory Duane Roger Morrison recounted in a farewell letter in which he describes a difficult, abusive childhood.

His childhood was so crippling, he told five siblings in the rambling 14-page letter, that he was never able to function normally, and it was time to end his pain, a law enforcement official said Morrison wrote.

The letter said that as long as he lived, he would never forget the abuse at home and how petrified he was whenever his father approached him.

The Denver Post obtained previously unpublished details Saturday about the contents of the letter.

The letter, mailed from Shawnee, just outside of Bailey, was received by one of Morrison's brothers Thursday, the day after Morrison entered Platte Canyon High School, took six girls hostage, sexually assaulted them and ultimately killed Emily Keyes, 16, and himself.

Morrison gave no hint in the letter of what he planned to do at the high school, Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener said.

The letter stated that Morrison was in emotional pain because of treatment by his father, said Joe Gordon, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives' assistant agent in charge of a five-state region that includes Colorado.

"He said his father was always screaming and yelling," he said. "That in no way justifies the horrific crime he committed."

Contacted by phone Saturday, Duane Morrison's father, Bobby Morrison, who lives in Tulsa, Okla., did not comment. A woman got on the phone and said: "This is private."

"It was a very sad letter," Gordon said. "At the end he makes it clear this is his final farewell.

"He wants (his family) to know his final moment will be painless and he will be at peace. He said, 'Don't you feel guilty for this. You're absolved from any responsibility.'"

The letter said he loved all his brothers and sisters and apologized for what he was about to do, Gordon said. He thanked them for trying to help him over the years.

The letter only indicated that he would take his own life, he said.

Morrison mailed the letter Wednesday to one of his older brothers. Gordon did not know which brother.

Two ATF agents spoke with the brother for two hours

Wednesday night, and the brother gave the letter to them unopened after he received it in the mail Thursday.

"He couldn't emotionally bear to read it," Gordon said.

The ATF turned the original letter over to Park County officials.

A team of ATF and FBI profilers at the National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime in Quantico, Va., will study the letter for years to come, Gordon said.

The ATF has traced the two guns Morrison used in the school attack from the store where he bought them to the manufacturers, he said. They were purchased legally, he said.

While Morrison did not threaten the school in his letter, he clearly considered a grudge with a Littleton motorcycle shop to be unsettled.

"That jumped off the page at you," Gordon

IMMIGRATION:

Congress Leaves Immigration Bill For Another Day (HC)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Both houses are unable to agree on what is reform

WASHINGTON — For all the fierce debate that raged this year in congressional corridors and spilled onto the streets of Houston and other cities in massive demonstrations, Congress has left town essentially stalemated over illegal immigration.

Though congressional Republicans can claim some success in adding billions of dollars for enhanced border security and securing approval for 700 miles of fencing along portions of the U.S.-Mexico boundary, the philosophical clash between the enforcement-minded House and the legalization-friendly Senate has been postponed — most likely until next year.

"It's essentially a tie, a stalemate in which neither vision of reform has won out," said Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum. "The debate will continue to boil, and it will be left to Congress in the future to deal with."

Several factorsIn the end, vastly different diagnoses about how to prevent illegal immigration, internal Republican divisions, President Bush's loss of clout on Capitol Hill and a highly competitive clash for control of Congress in the November elections all contributed to lawmakers' failure to deliver on an issue they vaulted to public attention.

House Republican security hawks raced out first last December, passing an enforcement-only bill that would criminalize illegal immigrants, crack down on their employers and set up a mandatory employment-verification system requiring new identification procedures for all workers, American and foreign. Champions of the security-first approach insist that the borders must be secured before any broader changes to immigration policy can be contemplated.

Outraged by the criminalization provisions, millions took to the streets in Houston, Los Angeles, Chicago, Milwaukee and other cities last spring and denounced the House bill as anti-immigrant and inhumane.

Siding much more closely with Bush's vision, the Senate responded in May with a vastly different plan pairing increased enforcement with an opportunity for citizenship for most of the country's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants and a guest-worker program for future immigrants. Backers of what has become known in Washington shorthand as comprehensive immigration reform argue that illegal immigration can't be fully resolved unless all aspects are addressed together.

House Republicans swiftly deemed the bipartisan Senate plan an amnesty program that would repeat the mistakes of 1986, when Congress pledged to halt illegal immigration for all time by legalizing nearly 3 million people in exchange for making it more difficult for foreign workers to be hired. The legalization went through, but employer sanctions were never properly put into place or enforced. Illegal immigration continued apace until exploding in the late 1990s and this decade.

Dismissive of the Senate plan and courting conservative voters vexed by illegal immigration, House Republicans refused this summer to negotiate over differences in the bills. Instead, they launched a flurry of hearings around the nation, designed to fan opposition to the Senate bill. And, into the waning hours of their legislative session that ended Friday night, House GOP leaders sought unsuccessfully to convince the Senate to embrace House-passed measures speeding deportation, cracking down on criminal gangs and reducing court power over federal immigration enforcement.

What did get doneHouse Republicans point out they did succeed in adding billions of dollars to expand the Border Patrol, add thousands of detention beds and begin funding a multibillion-dollar "virtual" fence comprising motion detectors, lighting, unmanned aerial vehicles and other high-tech surveillance equipment. And, Congress prodded the Department of Homeland Security to end the much-criticized practice of "catch-and-release" policy in which the Border Patrol, because of a lack of detention space, released non-Mexican illegal immigrants pending their deportation hearings. The vast majority never showed up for the hearings.

Some Republicans say the new measures are working.

"If you talk to people on the border now, they are starting to see a tightening up," said Rep. Michael McCaul, an Austin Republican who chairs a House Homeland Security subcommittee and represents parts of west Harris County. Illegal immigration "didn't happen overnight. It's not going to get solved overnight. But I think what you're going to see is the American public realizing that a lot of the things we've done up here are having an impact on the border."

Such a realization by the public could pave the way, lawmakers suggest, for greater acceptance of solutions for dealing with the illegal population. One plan calls for a guest worker program to bring in the foreign workers that U.S. business interests, agriculture and others insist are absolutely essential in a low-unemployment economy.

"I think there's a recognition now that this is an urgent — perhaps the most single urgent — domestic issue confronting the country," said Sen. John Cornyn, a Texas Republican who chairs the Senate immigration subcommittee. "And I don't believe it will be delayed forever."

Dead or still kicking?Cornyn retains some hope that Congress could resume the immigration debate in comprehensive fashion when lawmakers return for a brief session after the November elections. Others predict Congress won't take up the topic until after the new session is gaveled in next January with new members who were elected in November.

Others say it may be well after that before the legislation comes up again.

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., for one, indicated little desire to address a broader immigration fix until the borders are battened down.

"The position of the House is that we're not going to be looking toward amnesty or toward a path to citizenship until we first show that we control the border," he said. "And then, we can get back to that."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff estimated earlier this year it would take until the end of 2008 for his department to gain operational control of the southwest border.

What works, what doesn'tSome lawmakers tout fencing and other border-control measures; others argue illegal immigration won't be solved by a build-up. Nearly half of all illegal immigrants came here legally but overstayed visas.

House Republicans are seeking to achieve "an impossible dream," said Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., a key champion of the Senate plan. "You're not going to secure the border unless you also provide a legal means for people to travel to do the jobs that America needs done."

For some, Congress' inability to undertake a widespread fix this year is a deep disappointment. "It's really a lost opportunity," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a Democrat from California, where the state's $30 billion agriculture industry is struggling to find workers amid heightened border enforcement. "We've got food on the ground that's not being harvested; we've got people plowing under fields; we've got people who are not going to plant. It's a very difficult time."

Sen. Jeff Sessions, an Alabama Republican who staunchly opposed the Senate bill, offered a far different assessment: "In one sense it has been productive. We didn't make a big mistake by passing a terribly flawed bill."

In Texas, Little Support For Putting Up Fences (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Along the Rio Grande, residents say the barrier approved by Congress would sever cultural and economic ties, and cut off access to the river.

Few Americans are more fed up with the unending human caravan of illegal immigration — or more familiar with its macabre toll — than rancher Mike Vickers.

Multitudes of bedraggled migrants cut through his South Texas homestead every day to skirt U.S. Border Patrol checkpoints on their journey north, and many do not make it out alive. Vickers has found frightened children sitting in fields alone, abandoned. His dogs once brought home a human head.

He very badly wants to stop the trail of death and despair that passes by his doorstep. But when he considers the wisdom of building twin steel walls along the Rio Grande to seal off the Mexican border — the plan Congress approved early Saturday before heading home for the November election — his verdict is swift and harsh: stupid idea.

"That's just a big waste of money," said Vickers, a Texas Republican activist who heads a group opposed to illegal immigration that until recently was the state branch of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps.

"The Rio Grande is the lifeblood of South Texas," he said. "A wall is just going to stand between farmers and ranchers and others who need legitimate access to water. It's not going to stop the illegals."

DOJ_NMG_0072514

From Laredo to Brownsville, a meandering 200-mile stretch of the Rio Grande that would be walled off if President Bush signs, as expected, the bill to fence 700 miles of the border, reaction was overwhelmingly negative.

Many of these Texas border towns blossomed on the riverbanks not even a football field away from Mexico, a bilingual, binational culture where everyone knows someone on the other side. Here, the fence was widely seen as a federal government misadventure that would trample private property rights without accomplishing anything.

"Whether it's over rivers or deserts — or now, this wall — people will keep coming, as long as they can find a job here that's so much better," said Angelica Garcia, 26, a worker at a shop on McAllen's bustling Main Street that caters to Mexicans visiting Texas. "This wall isn't going to do a thing."

Many expressed shock that a proposal they considered a pipe dream by pandering Washington politicians had been approved, and that a fence they likened to the Berlin Wall could soon separate them from their neighbors.

"For so many years, we talked about tearing down that wall. Now we want to build a wall between us and Mexico? It makes us look like hypocrites," said Denise Carreon, 21, who like many border residents still had family members to the south.

Many others expressed outrage that the Rio Grande, a near-mystical river in the Texas imagination and one of the most prized bird-watching spots in North America, could soon be blocked from view.

"Zero — that's how many people I know who support this. People are opposed from Brownsville to El Paso," said Eagle Pass Mayor Chad Foster, head of a group of frontier leaders called the Texas Border Coalition.

"The Rio Grande is a very historic and scenic place, one of the natural treasures of Texas. We're going to wall it off?"

As Congress approved building the fence, it was hard to find a South Texas politician, merchant, economic analyst or academic who believed a wall would work — and who did not consider it an insult to the people of Mexico, with whom the region shares a strong social and economic bond, especially since passage of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

"I am reminded of when Jesus Christ was nailed to the cross and he said, 'Father, forgive them because they know not what they do,' " said Richard Cortez, the mayor of McAllen, which became one of the fastest-growing areas in America after NAFTA.

"I don't know who is advising the Senate," Cortez said. "A fence is not going to keep people from crossing the border, but it's certainly going to hurt us."

Like many of those who live along the Rio Grande, Cortez travels frequently between its banks; his two sons married Mexican-born women, and although they are U.S. citizens, many of their relatives are not, so reunions often take place south of the border.

Cortez and other border leaders worry that long-standing friendships, and family ties that go back generations, will be frayed.

"If you're building walls, what message are you sending to your neighbors? Do you think they are really going to want to visit? It's a slap in the face to them," said Laredo Mayor Raul G. Salinas, a former FBI agent. "People who have never been to the border, who do not understand the border, are shoving this down our throats."

Although the fence plan allows Mexicans to legally visit Texas with temporary visas permitting travel within 25 miles of the border, local politicians and business leaders worry that they will no longer feel welcome.

Mexican shoppers are a major source of money for Texas border towns, and gleaming malls and vast big-box outlets have been built to cater to them.

Between 1978 and 2001, Mexican shoppers made 26% of all retail sales in Brownsville, 35% in McAllen and 51% in Laredo, according to economists at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas. Local officials said more recent estimates are higher.

"The Wal-Mart with the largest number of retail transactions in the United States is in Laredo, and if you go to that parking lot, more than half the cars have Mexican plates," said Eddie Aldrete, senior vice president for the Laredo-based International Bank of Commerce. "The fence is a knee-jerk reaction by Congress. No one really studied the economic impacts, the environmental impacts."

Ray M. Keck III, the president of Texas A&M International University in Laredo, said the idea of building a wall to deter immigrants ignored the lessons of history, which clearly showed that such barriers do not work unless they are patrolled by soldiers willing to kill. More important, he said, he feared that the expensive proposal demonstrated a lack of priorities.

"Are we really so terrified of what might come from Mexico," he asked, "that we must spend billions to construct this wall, then billions to maintain it, at a time when healthcare and education so desperately need better funding?"

To Mike Allen, a former Catholic priest who helped the poor in the colonias of Texas' Hidalgo County, then switched careers and became a leading economic booster for the border region, the fence is a manifestation of politics at its ugliest.

"It is just so sad that the relationships we have worked years to build are being torn down by politicians in Washington, who quite frankly don't have any idea what they are doing," Allen said.

DOJ_NMG_0072515

"I'll say it: It's the browning of America, and people are afraid of that. That's what this is all about. I have lived on the border most of my life. I'm not scared."

Farms Facing Worker Shortage For Harvest (AP)

By Elizabeth White

AP, October 1, 2006

J. Allen Carnes needed 200 workers for the onion harvest this year on 500 acres of South Texas fields. The onion business is big in the area, and with only two months to harvest, there's little room for delay.

But Carnes ended up with less than 100 workers and fell two weeks behind, with bits and pieces of the fields unpicked. His income fell about $150,000, a significant loss.

"It's become increasingly tight over the last three or four years," said Carnes, president of Winter Garden Produce in Uvalde, 80 miles west of San Antonio. "Companies are jockeying back and forth (for workers). Last year it was just short all around."

Growers say tightened border security and longer lines for day crossers have cut the numbers of farm workers who cross the border legally or illegally. Illegal immigrant workers who used to travel the country picking different crops as the seasons changed are hesitant to migrate for fear of being caught. And the lure of higher paid jobs with better working conditions, such as construction, are keeping some farm workers away.

And the labor shortage will only get worse until Congress tackles immigration reform, growers and worker advocate groups say. The House and Senate are at an impasse over proposed legislation and whether it should include an eventual path to citizenship and guest-worker program in addition to border enforcement.

Like others who employ migrant workers, Carnes checks employees' paperwork, but said some illegal immigrants probably end up working in his fields.

According to the Department of Labor's National Agricultural Workers Survey, 53 percent of the hired crop labor force lacked authorization to work in the U.S. in 2001-02. Worker advocates and grower associations agree the actual figure is probably closer to 80 percent.

Three-quarters of the hired farm work force in the U.S. was born in Mexico. And more than 40 percent of crop workers were migrants, meaning they had traveled at least 75 miles in the previous year to get a farm job, the survey showed.

Carnes said he couldn't lure workers away from other fields with incentives like higher pay for the late-spring onion harvest because there just weren't enough workers to go around.

"We're seeing the wolf at the door," said John McClung, president of the Texas Produce Association, referring to what he said is worsening shortages reported by many of the 300 growers, shippers and importers his organization represents.

But a spokesman for the United Farm Workers said farmers need to raise salaries to get workers.

Even if they start out in the fields, "the pay is so low, the benefits mostly nonexistent and the conditions so harsh that many workers don't stay," spokesman Marc Grossman said. "It's essentially minimum-wage work."

And that can be backbreaking, hot work, especially picking berries in the early summer sun.

Carnes said increased border security is keeping even legal day laborers from crossing the border because lines have lengthened.

"There becomes a point where the paperwork and time doesn't equal the money," Carnes said. "I think we just scared them off with all the talk about immigration and closing the borders."

The U.S. Border Patrol has caught well over 1 million people along the U.S.-Mexico border in the last three fiscal years, including the one set to end Sept. 30, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection. In 2003 alone, it caught just over 900,000 in the four border states.

Howard Rosenberg, an agricultural labor economist at the University of California, Berkeley, said while he's heard complaints about shortages for years, the concerns have worsened recently.

"It varies in how intensely it's felt and where it's felt and how much it's reported," Rosenberg said. "It is very difficult to tease out the realities from the perception."

Rosenberg said a border crackdown may not have as much to do with reductions as with the immigrant community spreading out geographically and to different industries.

"If people think that a crackdown on the border is keeping people away, how do they really know that?" Rosenberg asked. "There's still an awful lot of activity."

Growers and farm worker advocates say the beginning of a solution is the Agricultural Job Opportunities, Benefits and Security Act of 2005, dubbed "AgJobs."

DOJ_NMG_0072516

The bill would provide temporary legal status for farmworkers who can prove they worked at least 100 days during a certain period. The workers could apply for a green card if they work an additional 360 days in agriculture over the subsequent six years. A slightly modified version of AgJobs passed in May in the Senate's immigration reform bill, which the House has not yet voted on.

Without comprehensive immigration reform, growers will continue to move their operations south of the border, said Tim Chelling, a vice president of the Western Growers Association, which represents growers in California and Arizona.

"It's more than anecdotal; we know that they're down there to the tune of thousands and thousands of acres," he said.

Growers are "half out the door already," said Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the conservative New York-based Manhattan Institute think tank.

"A Mexican worker is going to pick these crops one way or the other, and the only question is whether they pick them here or across the border in Mexico," Jacoby said.

Mexicans See Good And Bad Side To Wall (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

There's much talk about the void migrants leave behind, but the planned border fence still chafes.

MEXICO CITY — At the beginning of every school year, bad news comes from Mexican heartland states such as Zacatecas and Queretaro: Local authorities are closing hundreds of schools because so many families have moved north to the United States.

Mexicans feel helpless before the migrant exodus, and talk about it the same way they talk about the weather. Everyone complains about it, but there's not much you can do about it.

On Friday night, the U.S. Senate approved a 700-mile-long border wall in a bid to stop the immigrant flow. The decision has left many Mexicans wondering whether the open door to the north may slowly be closing.

Some Mexicans saw the vote as a collective slap in the face that highlighted the failure of their country's leaders to give Mexicans a reason to stay home.

"Our politicians have not lived up to their responsibilities toward the people who migrate," said Homero Aridjis, a poet, activist and onetime Mexican diplomat. "Our government has failed before the economic and social plight of the poor.

"I'm from Michoacan," said Aridjis, naming a state west of Mexico City known for exporting its sons and daughters to the U.S. "When I go there, I see fertile farmland and orchards that have been abandoned."

Few observers here expect the new barriers to stop people from Mexico and Central America from seeking a better life in the United States. New smuggling routes are expected to open through ever-more-remote stretches of desert, or over the waters of the Rio Grande.

But the bill approved by Congress, and soon to be signed by President Bush, signals a new shift in an era that has seen dramatic cultural and demographic changes in both countries.

The wave of Latin American migration that began in the 1980s helped make Latinos the largest minority in the U.S. and the largest ethnic group in Los Angeles and many other American cities. The beginning of the 21st century saw Latino immigration spread to almost every corner of the United States, with Spanish-speaking communities booming in states such as Tennessee and Ohio.

Latin Americans see the congressional initiative as a rejection of the cultural changes brought forth by Latinos in the United States. In angry editorials and speeches, Mexican writers and politicians have compared the border fence project with the Berlin Wall and the Great Wall of China.

"The exploitation of fear among the citizens of the United States has been at the center of the debate," the newspaper El Universal said in an editorial Saturday. "This wall, like all those built with xenophobic aims, will be far from effective."

President Vicente Fox and President-elect Felipe Calderon have denounced the new fence, as have a host of Mexican political leaders.

For decades, social scientists here have seen migration to the north as a "safety valve" that keeps Mexico from exploding into social conflict. Now, a small number of voices are saying the brain and muscle drain to the U.S. cannot continue indefinitely.

When the head of Mexico's central bank told a Texas newspaper last week that a new wall between the United States and his country might not be such a bad thing, his remarks were front-page news here. Surprisingly, there were few public expressions of disagreement.

"It would be best to keep its people in Mexico, and it would give incentives for Mexico to create jobs that are needed," Guillermo Ortiz, the bank official, said in an interview with the editorial board of the Dallas Morning News.

The border fence will be an expansion of the measures first undertaken in the mid-1990s by U.S. authorities as part of Operation Gatekeeper in San Ysidro, Calif., and Operation Hold the Line in El Paso. The U.S. Border Patrol built a new fence of corrugated steel, installed motion detectors and hired thousands of new agents.

The measures pushed illegal immigrants into the Sonoran Desert in Arizona and other remote areas, where several hundred die each year from dehydration and exposure.

Many analysts believe the border enforcement measures of the last decade have done little more than change the traditional back-and-forth patterns that saw thousands of Mexicans take seasonal work in the U.S. and then return home to their families.

In testimony to the House Judiciary Committee in August, Wayne Cornelius of the Center for Comparative Immigration Studies at UC San Diego said that the get-tough approach at the border had only succeeded at "bottling up" millions of immigrants in the U.S.

"Given the high costs and physical risks of illegal entry today, they have a strong incentive to extend their stays in the U.S.," Cornelius said.

Rather than return to Mexico, many immigrants are sending for their families, accelerating the declining enrollment in rural Mexican schools, analysts say. In Zacatecas, state education officials said last month they were closing 269 schools because of declining enrollments.

Before 1929, Mexicans were not required to obtain a visa to enter the United States. Ever since, "the history of the border has been a history of closing the border," said Tony Payan, a professor at the University of Texas in El Paso and author of "The Three U.S.-Mexico Border Wars: Drugs, Immigration, and Homeland Security."

The new measures approved Friday will seal off most of the Arizona-Mexico border. Immigrant smugglers are likely to move farther east, to remote crossing points on the Rio Grande upriver from the Texas cities of Eagle Pass and Del Rio, Payan said.

Cornelius told the Judiciary Committee that even if the entire land border was sealed off, immigrant smuggling would probably move to the waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

Lorenzo Meyer, one of Mexico's leading historians, argued that the Senate vote had revealed an essential hypocrisy in U.S.-Mexico relations.

"In 1993 we signed the North American Free Trade agreement," Meyer said. "It was supposed to be the beginning of a period of cooperation and friendship." Now the U.S. government has "unilaterally" announced the construction of a wall, he said.

"We see now that the idea of a united North America is fiction," Meyer said. "The reality is the wall."

Illegal -- But Essential (LAT)

By David Streitfeld

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Experts say undocumented immigrants are a driving force in the economy, despite a toll on public services and unskilled workers

Shortly after dawn, the day laborers began gathering beneath a San Diego Freeway overpass in West Los Angeles.

A house painter pulled up in a pickup, looking for an assistant. He offered $12 an hour. A worker jumped in.

Next to arrive was a white-haired woman driving a Honda. Her garden needed a makeover. She'd pay $11 an hour. She departed with a second worker.

On the freeway above, commuters were heading to offices in Century City and El Segundo. Down here, at the West L.A. Community Job Center, arrangements were being made to remodel their living rooms, landscape their yards, rebuild their decks.

The work is undertaken by men from Mexico and Central America. Most are in this country illegally. The jobs, which last only a day or two and pay cash, are all but invisible to the state and federal governments. No one has to fill out paperwork, follow safety regulations or pay taxes.

Yet what happens here is far from marginal. The jobs that flow out of this day-laborer hiring spot — and from thousands of others around the state, some as informal as a street corner — are a pillar of California's economic strength.

To see why, check out Adrian Lopez, 20, who is kicking around a soccer ball as he waits. Lopez, who came here from the Mexican state of Oaxaca, is carrying in his Everest backpack a Sony Walkman from the Best Buy across the street.

It's got a CD by the Argentine group Los Enanitos Verdes inside, bought at a Ritmo Latino store. He has a bottle of Kirkland Premium Drinking Water, purchased at Costco, and a spare Old Navy shirt. He likes the grilled steak at Baja Bud's. He wasn't impressed by "Monster House."

"Immigrants buy everything here," Lopez said in Spanish.

The presence in the United States of Lopez and 12 million other illegal immigrants is one of the most contentious issues of the era. Hundreds of thousands of immigrants have repeatedly demonstrated this year for legal recognition, sparking a backlash from many native-born Americans. Congress has been stalemated between legalization advocates and those pushing punitive measures.

Economists are less divided. In the main, they say the American engines of industry and commerce have always been fueled by a steady supply of new arrivals. Immigrants, they contend, contribute to consumer spending and, instead of replacing native workers, create jobs.

"Overall, immigration has been a net gain for American citizens, though a modest one in proportion to the size of our $13-trillion economy," 500 economists wrote in an open letter to Congress on June 19.

Measuring the contributions of illegal workers is a difficult task, however. Many numbers are vague or open to dispute. A few experts contend that the gains are not clear-cut and that any benefits are far from being universally shared.

Special interests that benefit from immigrant labor — including agribusiness, restaurant operators and unions courting new members — tout their gains as gains for all, said Michael Teitelbaum, who was vice chairman of the bipartisan U.S. Commission on Immigration Reform in the 1990s.

"It all comes down to where you sit," said Teitelbaum, a demographer at the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation. "The upper tiers benefit from immigration, and the lower tiers lose."

The 500 economists concede that a "small percentage" of native-born Americans may be hurt by competition from illegal immigrants who are willing to work cheaply. But any harm, they say, is outweighed by the benefits to the overall economy.

Lopez is a case in point. Start with his willingness to work for little. Add his eagerness to spend. Multiply that by the more than 2 million illegal workers in the state.

One result: Restaurant prices are pushed down by illegal labor in the kitchen, fruit and vegetable prices by illegal field hands, new-home prices by illegal drywallers.

Immigrants aren't just a weapon against inflation. The tens of thousands of illegal nannies in the Los Angeles area, for example, lower the cost of child care, freeing mothers to return to work. This in turn increases families' incomes, which encourages spending and fuels the economy.

Many immigrants send a portion of their earnings home to their families, but their influence here remains potent. The Economic Roundtable, a Los Angeles think tank, estimates that the 400,000 illegal workers in L.A. County spend $5.7 billion annually on food, rent, transportation and other necessities.

The sales taxes they pay on all those consumer purchases boost the state treasury. The growing number of immigrants who use false papers to get payroll jobs are contributing to Social Security without the right to receive payments from the fund.

That props up the beleaguered system by at least $5 billion a year, analysts say.

Other benefits may be less obvious, such as the gains in property values enjoyed by homeowners.

Prices surged for a number of reasons over the last few years, including very low interest rates, but experts say immigrants made a big difference in California. Their apartments and houses may be shabby, but their sheer numbers exert a profound effect. In a state that never has enough housing, the hundreds of thousands of units rented to immigrant families put upward pressure on all prices.

Then there are the bad things that aren't happening despite the immigrants' presence. For instance, they don't seem to be creating an unemployment problem. Joblessness in California, with 24% of the country's illegal immigrants, has tracked the low national rate.

All this evidence, many economists say, makes a powerful argument that immigrants' role can be characterized as somewhere between important and irreplaceable.

"The only people to benefit from the deportation of millions of low-skill workers would be other low-skill workers, who would get an immediate increase in pay rates," said Timothy Kane, an economist with the conservative Heritage Foundation. "However, they would also be the first to lose their jobs during a recession — which would be inevitable if the economy were shocked in this fashion."

Many Californians forcefully disagree with this assessment, saying immigrants have dragged down the quality of life in the state. They point to neighborhoods overflowing with poor immigrants. In some occupations, such as landscaping and construction, workers who don't speak Spanish say they can't get hired.

Other costs carry a more defined price tag. The California Hospital Assn. says emergency-room care for uninsured immigrants, including delivery of babies, costs taxpayers and private insurers about $650 million a year.

Whether born here or brought here, children of illegal immigrants have access to a free education. The Palo Alto-based Center for the Continuing Study of the California Economy estimates that this schooling costs as much as $6 billion annually.

Teitelbaum says the cost is even higher if you take into account how the influx has strained classrooms.

DOJ_NMG_0072519

"California used to have one of the best systems of public education," he said. "Now it has one of the worst."

Feeling Squeezed Out

Sean Jourdan stood on the sidewalk at an Inglewood shopping center, hawking DirecTV satellite subscriptions. A natural salesman, he charmed passers-by into taking his bright yellow leaflets.

"Let me give you a flier," he said to a woman and her grandson coming out of the Giant Dollar Store. "What do you have at home? Comcast? I'll give you double what they're giving you for half of what you're paying."

Jourdan took classes at two community colleges but dropped out before getting a degree. When he was in his early 20s, he attended the Maxine Waters Employment Preparation Center in Watts, a school started after the 1965 riots. Trained as a telecommunications technician, he was soon making $50,000 a year installing TV systems.

"It was a living wage," said Jourdan, 32, who is African American. "There are a lot of jobs out there, but only a few pay a living wage."

At first, many of his co-workers were black. Over time, however, his firm reduced payments for installation. Meanwhile, it hired more Latinos. Many couldn't speak English, Jourdan said, so he assumed they were new arrivals from Mexico and Central America.

By the time Jourdan left his last installation job in June, the pay rate for each house call had shrunk so much that he was making only about $25,000 a year. The last company he worked for had two black technicians out of about 25, he said.

Jourdan was briefly in the media spotlight a few months ago after attending a rally for the Minuteman Project, which vehemently opposes illegal immigration. "They're the same type of people who hunted us down when we escaped from the plantation," he said. "But on this issue, I unite with them."

Jourdan grew up near this mall, but it's no longer the place he knew. There's a machine that makes fresh tortillas in the Superior supermarket, signs in Spanish in the Rite Aid and a Latino construction crew redoing a vacant storefront.

"Give me a call. I'll save you money," he promised a young Latina. She smiled and took the flier. Jourdan may be upset by illegal immigrants, but many make good customers because they "haven't had 25 years to run up their credit." Every sale that survives DirecTV's credit check nets Jourdan a $150 commission.

"Although I can make money, it's a hustle," he said. "I'm going to have to learn Spanish."

Workers on the margins can be hurt by illegal immigration, economists note. A 2005 study by Harvard economist George Borjas and Lawrence F. Katz of the National Bureau of Economic Research concluded that native-born high school dropouts lost as much as 8% in wages from 1980 to 2000 because of illegal immigration.

UC Berkeley economist David Card has challenged those findings, saying cities such as Los Angeles are absorbing large numbers of laborers without wages being affected.

The plentiful supply of workers, Card speculates, has led companies to keep people at jobs that might otherwise have been automated.

Other economists wonder whether the reason for the limited effect on wages is even more basic: Instead of competing with immigrants, many native workers simply surrender, perhaps relocating to cities with better prospects.

In a new book titled "L.A. Story: Immigrant Workers and the Future of the U.S. Labor Movement," UCLA sociologist Ruth Milkman uses census data to show how some jobs have changed over the decades.

From 1970 to 2000, Milkman calculates, the percentage of janitors in Greater Los Angeles who were black fell from 24% to 5.2%. Meanwhile, the foreign-born Latino share rose from 10.3% to 63.4%.

Similar transitions occurred among construction drywallers, truckers and garment workers.

As in satellite TV installation, wages for these jobs are a far cry from what they once were. But Milkman says that's not because the companies replaced the natives with illegal workers.

Instead, the employers first squeezed benefits and salaries under the mantle of "competitiveness." The lengthy decline of trade unions undermined workers' ability to fight back.

Natives who could get out did so. The gaps were typically filled by immigrants, but in Milkman's analysis their hiring was a consequence, rather than a cause, of the jobs' lost allure.

The surprising development is that the immigrants, far from being pliant, have reinvigorated the union movement and in some cases won higher wages. "The people who have been demonized, the illegal immigrants, are in some ways showing the way forward for everyone," Milkman said.

For Jourdan, precisely what happened to his installation wages is of little consequence. What matters is the constant worry about slipping behind.

"As a technician, you knew that if you went in every morning and did the work, there'd be a check at the end of the week," he said. "Now I don't have that security."

DOJ_NMG_0072520

He's thinking of moving — maybe north to Palmdale or east to Moreno Valley. That's what some of his Inglewood friends have done.

"There are so many homes being built out there, so many potential customers for satellite systems," he said. "Maybe I should go too."

A Region Revitalized

When Panorama City in the San Fernando Valley boomed after World War II, the developers allowed only white people to buy houses. For four decades, General Motors made Chevrolets there, offering at peak production a solid income to more than 5,000 workers.

In 1992, the plant, the Southland's last car factory, was closed. With unemployment in the county running at 10%, few of the assembly-line workers were able to find new jobs paying them the $17 and $18 an hour they had been earning.

Similar closures happened throughout the country. But when the plants shut down in Ohio or Pennsylvania, they tended to become permanent ruins. The surrounding streets festered with abandoned houses and empty storefronts. Pittsburgh, Detroit and Cleveland have had to grapple with massive, long-term population declines.

In Panorama City, vitality quickly reemerged in a new language and a new culture. What it had — which the cities back East lacked — was the proximity of Mexico.

In the 1990s, L.A. County gained 1 million immigrants, most of them from Latin America, many of them illegal. In Panorama City, the Latino population grew from a significant minority to an outright majority.

The community around the former GM plant is thriving, if not exactly upscale. The plant itself is a shopping center called, straightforwardly enough, the Plant. It is anchored by a Home Depot where illegal immigrants wait for work that will pay about half what the autoworkers got, with no benefits and no promises about tomorrow.

On the surrounding streets are clinics, cheap restaurants and music and furniture stores catering to Latinos. It's one of many centers of the informal economy in L.A., where most transactions are in cash.

To many Californians, this is not a change for the better.

"I really don't consider the low-income parts of California to even be California anymore," said Kevin Waterson, an administrative employee of UC Davis, near Sacramento. "The quality of life is much more like that in Mexico."

A year ago, the Public Policy Institute of California polled state residents on whether immigrants were "a burden to California because they use public services" or "a benefit to California because of their hard work and job skills."

"Benefit" was picked by 56% and "burden" by 36%. Many of those in the latter camp, including Waterson, see illegal immigrants as competition. The struggle is less about jobs than scarce community resources, including affordable homes, gridlock-free roads and good schools.

Waterson grew up in Fontana in San Bernardino County, the son of a computer programmer and a billing clerk who were able to buy a three-bedroom house, own two cars and build a nest egg. That status, achieved by millions of Californians after World War II, now feels out of reach.

"There are a lot of places in Los Angeles I want to live that I can't afford," said Waterson, 27. "The places I can afford, I don't want to live."

It's not just his perception. The Brookings Institution recently found that Los Angeles was the nation's most polarized city by wealth. Fewer than a third of L.A. neighborhoods are middle class, according to its study. The rest are either rich or poor.

Waterson keeps looking for all those benefits the economists say immigration has brought to him. But if the informal economy benefits both the immigrants and the well off, it doesn't seem to be helping him and his wife, Julia, very much.

They don't use immigrants to mow the lawn or wash the car or take care of the kids. They can't afford to eat out, so they don't gain from the toil of illegal restaurant workers. They're renters, so any immigrant-driven boost to real estate just puts a home of their own further out of reach.

The informal economy that much of California has embraced so enthusiastically can be criticized on other grounds.

Small cash-and-carry shops and vendors who cater to immigrants may not pay sales taxes to the state or business license fees to local government. People who hire day laborers cheat the state by not using companies that pay payroll taxes. The laborers cheat the state by not paying income taxes. All of these groups put legal workers and legal businesses at an unfair competitive disadvantage.

The most sweeping criticism: By creating a market for illegal labor, the informal economy increases the supply. If illegal laborers weren't in such demand, they wouldn't risk so much to come here. For better or worse, immigration would not be an issue.

But for Los Angeles County, the informal economy has been better than nothing — and nothing, urban affairs expert and Economic Roundtable President Daniel Flaming says, is what the county would have had otherwise.

"When manufacturing collapsed, there was no effort to salvage the infrastructure for other purposes," he said. "The formal economy here has been stagnant since the beginning of the 1990s. The only growth has been in under-the-table employment, predominantly fueled by desperate workers and in particular undocumented workers."

Without immigrants, Flaming said, Los Angeles would be smaller and weaker and poorer — Detroit or Pittsburgh or Cleveland with better weather.

In that L.A., Waterson would be able to find an affordable house. But because the population might be falling, his house could very well decline in value.

"We should be thankful to immigrants," Flaming said. "Without them, things would be much worse."

First the newcomers stabilized Panorama City. Now they are pushing it forward. The median value of a single-family home has doubled since 2000. And on the edge of the Plant mall, there's a sign that the informal economy might be yielding to a more traditional, bigger-budget state of affairs. Starbucks, that dispenser of $4 venti tangerine frappuccinos to the middle class, has just opened a store.

History of Ambivalence

Five days a week, Lissette Rodriguez starts work at 6 a.m., preparing banquet food for a mid-priced hotel southeast of downtown. After eight hours of chopping and slicing, she goes home and takes a shower. Four days a week, she heads to Beverly Hills, where she works from 5 p.m. to 1 a.m. washing dishes at a luxury hotel.

"Not many people could make it through 16 hours like that," she said proudly.

Rodriguez, 32, arrived from El Salvador in 2004, not to save or damage L.A.'s economy but to help herself.

"In Salvador, there's no money, no jobs," she said in Spanish. "It's more expensive here, but I can make a lot more."

That would be $9 an hour, a fortune to her and a pittance to the hotels. The fact that both sides consider it a good deal binds them together in a "don't ask, don't tell" policy. Rodriguez's employers no more want to catch her than she wants to be exposed.

The history of California is full of ambivalence to immigrants.

"From 1907 to 1940, 'the Mexican problem' was a hardy perennial in Southern California," historian Carey McWilliams wrote in 1946. "Every winter, the business interests of the region worked themselves into a lather of excitement over the cost of Mexican relief, hospitalization and medical care. With the return of the crop cycle in the spring, however, 'the Mexican problem' always somehow vanished or was succeeded by the problem of 'an acute labor shortage.' "

For most employers, any ambivalence appears to be gone. Instead, the business community speaks in dire terms about the consequences of a widespread crackdown on the hiring of illegal workers.

"It would be a horrible negative," said Jeff King, co-founder of King's Seafood Co., which owns Ocean Avenue Seafood in Santa Monica and the Water Grill downtown. "You cannot get Americans to come in at entry-level wages. You'd have to pay a premium."

That might be good for the workers, but King contends it would bring on economic disaster. Prices would go up. Diners would balk. Sales taxes would fall, employment tumble. (King stressed that the 2,000 King's Seafood employees are all legal, as far as the company can tell.)

By working for less than a native citizen would, Lissette Rodriguez is helping her employers' bottom lines.

To an extent, she's also helping taxpayers, although unintentionally. The hotels deduct the usual taxes from her payroll checks. But she won't see a refund or, later in life, a Social Security check.

"That money is just gone," she said. "Most illegals are scared to do tax returns."

Rodriguez is the admirable and problematic face of immigration in 2006. She crossed the border without permission and obtained a bogus Social Security number. She knows she is breaking the law.

Yet she wants only to do what legal immigrants have done throughout U.S. history: work hard and sacrifice mightily to get ahead. In less than two years, she has become deeply embedded in the local economy and the community.

All of these contradictions in one person. All of them in 12 million people. And more tomorrow.

"I miss my children," Rodriguez said. She wants to bring them — a 6-year-old girl, a 15-year-old boy — to Los Angeles. This is her home.

HPD Revising Its Immigration Policy (HC)

By Matt Stiles

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Changes taking effect this week will help feds nab criminals here illegally

DOJ_NMG_0072522

Under fire in recent months over its policy toward illegal immigrants, the Houston Police Department is unveiling new procedures today to allow more cooperation with federal agents trying to catch criminals living in the country illegally.

Officers still will not inquire about the immigration status of people they haven't arrested, so the changes are unlikely to quiet critics who have labeled Houston a "sanctuary city" for illegal immigrants.

But the department is making several key revisions.

An announcement is expected today, less than two weeks after the shooting death of police officer Rodney Johnson caused simmering opposition to the department policy to flare anew. An illegal immigrant who previously had been deported is charged in the slaying.

Among the changes to take effect this week:

·The department will hold people detained or arrested for traffic violations or other minor crimes — Class C misdemeanors — if warrant checks show they are wanted by federal agents for defying an order to leave the country or for returning after being deported in connection with a criminal case. Under existing policy, police generally did not hold such people for federal authorities, even if officers were aware of the federal warrants.

·The department will allow immigration agents unfettered access to the city's two jails, as they have had in the Harris County jail, and officers will start asking all arrestees whether they are citizens.

·Fingerprints of anyone booked into the jails without proper identification will be checked against a national fingerprint database.

That could help officers identify wanted criminals, including people wanted for serious immigration violations, police say.

"There's a pretty solid process now between HPD and the federal authorities to identify and act on people who've been deported from this country because of their criminal behavior," said Executive Assistant Chief Timothy Oettmeier, among a group of police commanders who briefed the Houston Chronicle on the changes.

"We're now in a position to detect and get them back out of here."

Oettmeier and the others acknowledged they can't project how many immigration violators who previously might have been released will be snared under the new policy. Immigration officials say roughly 200,000 such cases are in their database, but only a few such people encounter authorities each year.

Police commanders, who dispute the "sanctuary" title, have been working on the revisions for months with federal prosecutors and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials.

Under the revised procedures, officers still won't attempt to determine the immigration status of people encountered routinely, and won't arrest anyone solely for being in the country illegally — as advocated by supporters of tougher immigration enforcement.

Local versus federal

But police and immigration officials say the immigration status of suspects charged with serious misdemeanors or felonies is routinely determined upon transfer to the county jail.

Mayor Bill White and Police Chief Harold Hurtt have said the department doesn't have legal authority in most immigration cases.

They also say the department shouldn't expend its limited manpower on a federal responsibility and that doing so would alienate officers from immigrant communities.

That could make it harder to get immigrants to report crimes or cooperate as witnesses.

"The administration supports giving law enforcement all tools to reduce the risk of crime within their resources," White said.

"Running more checks on the wanted status of people, and more use of the fingerprint database, will tighten up the procedures."

Critic not satisfied

One key department critic, Mary Williams of Protect Our Citizens, a local group trying to change the policy through a voter referendum, charged that the revisions don't go far enough.

She vowed to continue her fight to put a provision in the City Charter permitting police to enforce immigration laws.

"We want officers to have the discretion to ask them the first time," she said, referring to inquiries about citizenship status during routine encounters such as traffic stops.

Williams dismissed the new policies as political posturing.

"When you let the politicians decide, you get baby steps like this thing," she said.

Though the changes likely won't end criticism of the policy, police commanders said the new procedures will make it harder for criminal immigrants to elude detection but also allow the department to maintain its position that officers should have a limited role in immigration matters.

2003 incident resurfaces

The change involving criminal deportees — people forced out of the country because they violated laws here — would prevent incidents like one in October 2003, when officers were forced to release Moises Hernandez Galvan, a 37-year-old illegal immigrant detained after a traffic stop, even though they knew he had returned to the country after deportation.

The incident was not publicized at the time but sparked internal criticism about the department's policy, according to police memos obtained by the Houston Chronicle under the Texas Public Information Act.

"If this suspect had been a deported felon with terrorist ties, then the actions taken in this incident could seriously jeopardize homeland security," Lt. Tom Roman, who is now retired, wrote then-acting Police Chief Joe Breshears.

A reply memo stated that the department would continue its policy of not detaining people arrested on Class C misdemeanors simply because they had immigration warrants.

Under the new policy, police would hold for federal authorities a suspect such as Galvan if it's discovered the suspect is wanted on an immigration warrant.

Bob Rutt, special agent in charge of the Houston office of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, said his agents will take those suspects from police custody within 12 hours.

"This is very big," he said. "It shows the commitment by HPD to public safety and homeland security."

Police Enforcement Of Immigration Laws Raises Worry (WP)

Foreigners Without Documents Say They May Leave Out of Fear

At the Bestway Supermarket on Elden Street, where shoppers browse to merengue music and signs touting the specials are in Spanish and English, Latino customers say they don't know much about Herndon's new mayor or Town Council.

But they do say the town's Hispanic community was buzzing last week with the news that those in charge, whoever they are, want police to become la migra, federal immigration agents.

"Everyone is afraid," said Byron Flores, 26, who has lived in Herndon since immigrating illegally from Honduras three years ago. The number of illegal immigrants reporting crime is likely to plummet, he said, for fear that the police will ask for their papers.

Many people are thinking about moving away, he said, including him.

"Maybe to Seven Corners."

Herndon's council voted last week to apply to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement for enrollment in the agency's "Section 287(g)" program, which trains local police officers to determine whether criminal suspects in custody are illegal immigrants. Officers certified by the program can detain them and even begin deportation proceedings before turning cases over to the federal agency. Seven state and local law enforcement agencies nationwide have joined the program. A dozen more are seeking to enroll officers.

The prospect of Herndon's entry into the program has again placed the town near the epicenter of the national debate on immigration policy. About a quarter of its 23,000 residents are Latino immigrants, according to census data.

It has also rekindled tensions that emerged with the council's decision last year to open a publicly funded day-labor center to help immigrant workers find jobs. Supporters, including former mayor Michael L. O'Reilly, said the federal government's failure to control the borders gave them no choice. Opponents of the center, which does not try to determine the immigration status of workers, said the town was abetting illegal activity. In May, voters unseated O'Reilly and two council members in what was viewed as frustration over the issue.

During O'Reilly's tenure, Herndon Police Chief Toussaint E. Summers Jr. rejected the idea of entering the 287(g) program for precisely the reasons expressed by the Latino patrons at Bestway.

"Herndon Police Department involvement with enforcing immigration laws could create barriers for segments of our community," he wrote to Town Manager Stephen F. Owen in a Jan. 22, 2004, memo. "Such action would tend to be counterproductive to our community policing philosophy, which promotes partnerships and building trust."

But shortly after taking office, Mayor Steve J. DeBenedittis, joined by four new council members (and two holdovers) discussed Summers's status in a closed-door meeting.

"I was not invited," Summers said.

But the message was clear: The new council wanted a tougher stance on crime in general and crime committed by illegal immigrants in particular.

Bestway customer Marvin Alexander, 30, a Salvadoran in the country illegally, said he is concerned about the changes the new council will bring. He said Herndon police recently stopped an acquaintance of his, also an illegal immigrant, who did not have a license. Officers did not cite her.

"Imagine if that happened now," Alexander said.

Until the town works out an agreement with Immigration and Customs Enforcement on the scope of the training and authority that officers who complete the course will have, it is difficult to predict whether 287(g) will actually help Herndon remove criminal illegal immigrants from its streets.

A number of factors could seriously limit the program's effectiveness, such as a lack of jail space and manpower.

Most other law enforcement agencies participating in the program are sheriff's departments that operate large jails. Herndon relies on Fairfax County's Adult Detention Center to house most of its prisoners. But Fairfax Sheriff Stan G. Barry (D) said last week that he didn't foresee his department entering 287(g). It means that Herndon probably would have to transport undocumented suspects elsewhere, possibly more than an hour away to Rappahannock County, tying up officers' time.

There is also the question of just how much of a threat illegal immigrants pose to public safety in Herndon.

Town officials say they want to use 287(g) to target the "worst of the worst" criminal illegal immigrants. But police say serious "Class A" crime -- murder, rape, robbery -- was down 26 percent in Herndon from 2002 to 2005.

"Herndon is not a crime-ridden community," said council member J. Harlon Reece, who is uncertain whether he will vote to approve a final agreement with Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Critics of DeBenedittis and the council say they are misleading voters into believing that the town can roll back illegal immigration. On Tuesday, the council will take up two other proposals targeting undocumented residents. One would require the town manager to ensure that anyone granted a business license has legal immigration status. The other would require the town manager to ensure that companies contracting with the town government provide evidence that all their employees are in the country legally.

"This is a concerted effort to dupe the citizens into thinking that they are actually going to solve the immigration problems in this town," said former council member Carol A. Bruce, a supporter of the day-labor center who was defeated for reelection in May.

"This isn't about immigrants," DeBenedittis said. "It's about crime and criminal behavior. It's about reducing crime and making all of us safe."

Other supporters of 287(g) say the message is as important -- perhaps more important -- as the substance.

"The perception here is that we're in favor of illegal immigration," said Vice Mayor Dennis D. Husch. "We're trying to change that perception, and this council has the gumption to do that."

The view at Bestway suggests that this is already happening. Flores said the thought of leaving town is distressing. He is close to his Herndon neighbors, many of whom are U.S. citizens.

But if Herndon police begin working to deport people, he said, he may have no choice.

"If they sign something, if they make it law, I go," he said. "I do not want to be the first person, you understand?"

De-greening Immigration (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

DENVER

Illegal immigration is an environmental issue for Shela A. McFarlin, who has seen firsthand the tons of trash dumped in the fragile Arizona desert by border-crossers.

Illegal aliens have turned parts of the Southwest desert into environmental disaster areas -- dumping an estimated 25 million pounds of trash in the Arizona desert, carving out hundreds of miles of roads through the wilderness and destroying thousands of acres of habitat with cooking fires that have gone awry.

"The desert environment is fairly sensitive, so we're concerned about the damage to habitat, plants and animals," said Miss McFarlin, who authored the Bureau of Land Management's 2006 report on environmental damage from illegal immigration. "It's not at all inviting to see toilet paper, fecal matter and backpacks by the thousands. Not at all."

Once the immigrants, both legal and illegal, arrive, the scenario isn't much rosier. Immigration is now the primary factor in U.S. population growth, which drives such environmental woes as housing sprawl, pollution and traffic.

But don't expect your local Green Party activist to grab a lawn chair and join the Minutemen border patrols any time soon: The mainstream environmental movement is firmly and uniformly agnostic on the issue.

"We've never taken a position pro or con on immigration," Sierra Club spokesman Eric Antebi said.

"We don't have the expertise to deal with that [illegal immigration]," Wilderness Society spokesman Ben Beach said.

DOJ_NMG_0072525

These responses exasperate environmentalists such as Dick Lamm, the former Democratic governor of Colorado and a 30-year member of the Sierra Club. Mr. Lamm broke ranks with the movement years ago by insisting that a responsible environmental policy has to include population and immigration controls.

He is among the most prominent of a small-but-hardy band of environmentalists who have tried for years to push the movement toward an anti-immigration stance. So far, they haven't had much luck.

"The environmental movement refuses to acknowledge that immigration and population are environmental issues," Mr. Lamm said.

Why? Politics, he said.

"The environmental movement has gone politically correct," Mr. Lamm said. "They're committing political malpractice by ignoring population."

But Jenny Neeley, Southwest representative for Defenders of Life, said her group hasn't taken a stance on immigration reform in Congress because "I don't think we're knowledgeable enough to say, 'This will stop the illegal crossings.'"

Faced with a difficult choice, critics said, the environmental movement has abandoned its primary mission -- protecting the planet -- rather than deviate from the liberal establishment.

"They're still pretty much ignoring it [illegal immigration] because it's politically sensitive or because they perceive it to be politically sensitive," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for Immigration Reform. "Nobody denies that environmental degradation is due in part to population growth, and nobody denies that the biggest reason for population growth is immigration.

"But somehow, when they put together A and B, it doesn't lead to C," he said.

Alienating illegals

Some environmentalists counter that population control is an issue that doesn't respect borders. Whether the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens in the United States chose to live in New Mexico or Mexico City, they are still part of a global overpopulation problem.

"Do people who migrate to the United States increase environmental stress? It depends on where they would end up otherwise. Los Angeles, for example, could handle 10,000 Ecuadoreans more easily than the Galapagos Islands could," Sierra Club Executive Director Carl Pope wrote in a 2004 article in the group's magazine.

Alan Kuper, a longtime Sierra Club member and a critic of its immigration stance, said this is an unfair comparison because Americans are greater consumers of resources than people living in other countries.

"That's the cop-out argument that you get," Mr. Kuper said. "An individual in the U.S. is responsible for consumption or use of resources of about 30 times the resources a child in India will use in his lifetime."

Critics also cite the group's longstanding policy that calls first for U.S. population control, then global stabilization.

"Our immigration policy can't make a dent in world poverty, and we take in two times more immigrants as any other country already," Mr. Lamm said. "The question is how can the U.S. best help the environment? By building a sustainable society."

Other environmentalists acknowledge that they tread lightly when it comes to illegal immigration in order to protect their work on other environmental issues.

"Because it's such a charged issue in this country, it's hard to get involved without getting caught in the crossfire," Mr. Antebi said. "We have a history of working with a large number of constituencies, and we want to continue to work with them.

"If we'd gotten involved with the immigration issue, we would have burned a lot of bridges," he said.

The group would have burned those bridges not just with its allies, but with many of its grass-roots members.

"We tend to work with communities that have a lot of immigrants," Mr. Antebi said. "In California, the places with the worst air pollution tend to be the places with the largest number of immigrants.

"If we took sides on immigration pro or con, it would affect our relationships with these communities," he said.

No environmental group has debated the immigration issue more publicly than the Sierra Club. In 2004 and 2005, anti-immigration candidates attempted to reverse the club's direction by running for seats on its 15-member board of directors. All of them lost, including Mr. Lamm, in 2004.

The club came under fire in 2004 after a wealthy donor, Wall Street investor David Gelbaum, told the Los Angeles Times that he had warned Mr. Pope in 1994 or 1995 that he would never give another dollar if the club ever took an anti-immigration stance.

In 1996, the club voted to adopt a neutrality stance on immigration, reversing its longstanding position in favor of limiting immigration. In 2000 and 2001, Mr. Gelbaum donated a total of $100 million to the organization.

Critics accused the Sierra Club of selling out, but Mr. Antebi denied any linkage between the events.

"This organization is too big and too democratic in its grass-roots leadership," he said, pointing out that the club's policies are set by its elected board. "No one person can wield that much influence."

DOJ_NMG_0072526

Besides, he said, Sierra Club members hardly need to be bribed to recognize the merits of avoiding the immigration debate.

"It's not that crazy to figure out why an organization like the Sierra Club would not want to wade into an issue like immigration," Mr. Antebi said. "Protecting ANWR [Arctic National Wildlife Refuge]? That's our bread-and-butter. Reducing air-pollution levels? That's our bread-and-butter. Immigration? That's really not our bread-and-butter."

Remembering ZPG

At one time, however, stabilizing the U.S. population was indeed a central tenet of the environmental movement. In the 1960s and 1970s, when it was just taking root, the call for "zero population growth" was as loud and insistent as the cry for cleaner air and water.

In 1970, the Sierra Club adopted a policy calling for the nation to "bring about the stabilization of the population first of the United States and then of the world." Three years later, Mr. Pope told the New York Times that "we can't hope to absorb all who want to come in. ... Immigration is a sentimental symbol whose day is long past."

By 1998, however, the environmental movement was in full retreat from both the population and immigration issue. Roy Beck and Leon Kolankiewicz of NumbersUSA attribute the phenomenon to a number of factors, including the drop in U.S. fertility rates.

However, the researchers from the immigration-reform group conclude that the primary cause was demographics: The immigrants were Hispanic, and there were millions of them. Environmental leaders soon decided they couldn't afford a political skirmish with a large and increasingly influential minority group.

"One of the main reasons the Sierra Club leadership gave in 1998 for avoiding the immigration issue was that they dared not risk appearing to be racially insensitive," the authors wrote in their paper, "The Environmental Movement's Retreat from Advocating U.S. Population Stabilization (1970-1998)."

The authors quote Mr. Pope in a 1997 online message to members: "While it is theoretically possible to have a non-racial debate about immigration, it is not practically possible for an open organization like the Sierra Club to do so. ... [Recent history] has caused me to change my view of whether it is possible for the Sierra Club to deal with the immigration issue in a way which would not implicate us in ethnic or racial polarization."

While that calculation might be correct, critics say, there's just one problem: It puts environmental protection second. The result has been the birth of a hybrid political movement made up of environmentalists-cum-immigration hawks.

Among the leaders of the movement is Mr. Kuper, a one-time Sierra Club leader and retired physics professor. After the 1996 neutrality vote, Mr. Kuper founded Sierrans for U.S. Population Stabilization, a splinter group of disgruntled members devoted to returning the club to its "traditional population policy."

The group developed a scorecard that grades members of Congress on their votes on the environment, immigration and family-planning issues. Mr. Kuper also regularly lobbies the League of Conservation Voters to include immigration on its list of issues.

Relations between the rebels and the mother ship aren't always cordial. During the 2004 and 2005 board elections, the anti-immigration candidates accused Sierra Club staffers of playing the race card to undermine their campaigns.

After the 2004 election, Mr. Pope wrote an essay titled "The Virus of Hate," which warned members against a possible infiltration of the club by racists. He said that some candidates "on the losing side" had entered into an "ugly alliance with individuals and groups whose motivations are clearly racist."

Mr. Kuper now includes a disclaimer on his Web site denouncing racism under the heading "No to racism, yes to environmentalism."

Battle at the border

One issue that could pull the environmental community back into the immigration debate is the degradation at the border. The Bureau of Land Management estimates that only 1 percent of the 25 million tons of garbage left in the Southern Arizona desert has been hauled off since 2002.

The hardest-hit areas include the Cabeza Prieta National Wildlife Refuge, which now includes about 200 miles of illegal roads carved into the landscape by trucks and off-road vehicles, prompting the Wilderness Society to issue an alert.

"The trash problem is staggering, to say the least," said Defenders of Life's Miss Neeley, whose group has been active in cleanup efforts. "If you've seen it, it's almost surreal."

The groups' solution, however, isn't likely to warm the hearts of immigration hawks. Instead of calling for a clampdown on illegal immigration, both groups have stern words for the U.S. Border Patrol, calling on the agency to make a stronger commitment to environmental protection.

Miss Neeley said in a 2006 article in an environmental group's publication that the problem lies with the agency's decision to push illegal aliens from urban points of entry such as Nogales, Ariz., to the desert. The idea was to make crossing the border more difficult, but the result has been the degradation of protected lands, she said in the Sky Island Alliance's newsletter.

The Border Patrol also needs to drive on established roads and avoid carving new ones through the wilderness, environmentalists say. The groups also are uniformly opposed to a border wall or fence, which they say would cut off wildlife migration routes.

What about the actual border-crossers, who rarely stick to the main highway?

"Of course, that's being done by crossers, too, but we can't tell crossers, 'Hey, you're breaking these laws,'" Miss Neeley said.

The blame-the-Border Patrol response exasperates agency spokesman Gus Soto, who suggests that the illegal aliens, drug smugglers and human smugglers bear greater responsibility for the damage than its officers.

"Unfortunately, they do choose to point the finger at us, but you have to remember, we're not the ones out there crossing. We're not the ones out there creating roads. We're trying to stop the smuggling industry," Mr. Soto said.

The agency has implemented a training program for its officers in environmental awareness. Officers often patrol sensitive areas via aircraft or on horseback, and they feed their horses only with seeds that are indigenous to the region.

"We don't go off-road," Mr. Soto said. "Before we do anything, we have to do an environmental-impact study to make sure it won't have a negative impact. We don't want to leave an environmental footprint in these sensitive areas."

The smugglers, on the other hand, "will cross anywhere without concern for the environment," he said. "It's the smugglers that are doing this, not the Border Patrol. We're going after the people who are causing the environmental harm."

They have their differences, but one thing both the Border Patrol and Defenders of Wildlife do agree on is that something must be done to reduce the total number of border-crossers. And that's a start.

"If we don't start reducing the total number of crossers, the problem is only going to get worse," Miss Neeley said. "And so far the environmental community really hasn't had an adequate response."

Immigration Activist Defying Ruling (AP)

By Sophia Tareen

AP, October 1, 2006

An immigration activist who took refuge in a church after the government ordered her deported to Mexico said Saturday she will remain holed up there, even though a federal judge dismissed a lawsuit filed on her behalf.

The lawsuit against the government had contended that deporting Arellano would effectively deport her son Saul, who is a U.S. citizen, and would violate his rights. U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve ruled Friday that although the 7-year-old would face hardships, they weren't of constitutional magnitude.

Arellano, 31, and her son have been living at the Adalberto United Methodist Church since mid-August.

"I want to stay here with my son," Arellano said in Spanish to reporters at the church. "I'm not just fighting for my situation. ... You can't separate families."

The Rev. Walter L. Coleman, the Adalberto pastor who sued in August on the woman's behalf, said he and Arellano are in contact with other families in similar situations and are considering filing a class-action lawsuit, he said.

Coleman said he is not concerned that federal officials will enter the church to remove Arellano.

"We fear God more than we fear Homeland Security," he said.

Arellano was to surrender to federal authorities for deportation Aug. 15 but instead sought refuge in the small church, in a heavily Puerto Rican neighborhood.

She first was arrested in 1997 soon after crossing into the United States and was sent back to Mexico.

She returned and was arrested again in 2002 and convicted of working as a cleaning woman at O'Hare International Airport under a false Social Security number.

Vegetation Obscures Markers On U.S.-Canada Border (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

HOULTON, Maine (AP) -- The United States wants to better secure its border with Canada, but it may have trouble finding it in some areas, an official with the agency that maintains the border said.

The United States and Canada have fallen so far behind on basic maintenance of their shared border that law-enforcement officials may have to search through overgrown vegetation for markers in some places, the official said.

"If you can't find it, then you can't secure it," said Dennis Schornack, the U.S. commissioner of the International Boundary Commission (IBC), the intergovernmental agency responsible for maintaining the U.S.-Canada border.

The Boeing Co. has been awarded a three-year contract to implement the first part of what could be a multibillion-dollar plan to reduce illegal entry along the 6,000 miles of border with Canada and Mexico using better technology, including cameras, sensors and even unmanned airplanes.

But commission officials say their budget of just more than $3 million is insufficient and insist that if they are not given more money to buy basic machinery to beat back the weeds, bushes and trees that threaten to overtake parts of the border, all those high-tech gadgets could prove useless.

"I've talked and talked, and we don't seem to be getting anywhere," Mr. Schornack said. "Yes, it's not glamorous. It's not high-tech. ... But if you don't get that basic job done, all I know is cameras won't work."

The 5,525-mile U.S.-Canada border cuts a 20-foot-wide swath through many wooded areas. Down the middle are monuments and markers denoting the actual border.

The agency, consisting of two commissioners (one from each country), seven field engineers and a small support staff, is responsible for surveying and maintaining more than 8,000 monuments and reference points.

The IBC has warned that it has fallen far behind in clearing fast-growing brush and trees, especially in the United States' Northeast and Northwest -- between Washington state and British Columbia, and among New England, Quebec and New Brunswick.

Mr. Schornack will meet in Washington tomorrow and Tuesday with his Canadian counterparts, high-ranking homeland security officials and members of Congress to lobby for more funding.

Canadian officials say the United States needs to contribute more money.

The United States contributed $1.43 million this fiscal year, compared with $2.2 million Canada contributed, the commission said. The U.S. contribution pales in comparison with the $33 million it is giving the International Boundary and Water Commission, which oversees maintenance of the border with Mexico. And a bill to erect a fence along the Mexican border went to President Bush on Friday.

"Some of the catch-up projects that the Americans are supposed to undertake are not being done. We're doing as much as we can with our funding, but the catch-up rate is not what it should be," said Al Arseneault, the deputy commissioner of the commission's Canadian branch.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Foley-Page E-Mails Not News To GOP (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republicans knew for months that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was exchanging what were described as "over-friendly" e-mails with a 16-year-old former House page, they acknowledged Saturday.

Foley resigned Friday after news reports revealed that he had sent another male teenage former House page messages that were explicitly sexual. House leaders said they had not been aware of those messages.

With midterm elections weeks away — and Democrats trying to capture the House from Republican control — GOP leaders went out of their way to condemn Foley's behavior.

"The improper communications between Rep. Mark Foley and former House congressional pages is unacceptable and abhorrent," House Republican leaders said in a statement issued late Saturday. "It is an obscene breach of trust. His immediate resignation must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system."

Top House officials conceded that they had been alerted as early as last fall to concerns about Foley and his contacts with a 16-year-old former House page, but said they had discussed it with the congressman and were told that his relationship with the page was that of a mentor. They told him to cease his contacts with the page.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) reported that he was unaware that Foley had been sending sexually explicit messages until some messages to pages were leaked to the media last week. "No one was ever made aware of any sexually explicit e-mail or text messages at any time," Hastert's office said Saturday in releasing what it described as a preliminary report on his contacts in the matter.

ABC News reported Friday that it had obtained copies of instant messages to current and former male pages in which Foley made numerous explicit sexual references.

In one exchange Foley asked: "You in your boxers, too? …. Well strip down and get relaxed."

DOJ_NMG_0072529

Foley resigned his seat within hours of being asked about the messages. The six-term representative, chairman of a congressional caucus on crimes against children, was the author of legislation to strengthen penalties against pedophiles and child pornographers. He was considered a lock for reelection. Now Republicans are scrambling to find a replacement candidate.

Democrats were quick to criticize the GOP leadership, with Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) demanding an Ethics Committee investigation, which the leadership agreed to.

House GOP leaders said in their statement Saturday that they were asking for a full review of the incident by the House Page Board and were creating a toll-free tip line for confidential reports of concern. They also said they had asked the Ethics Committee not only to investigate the Foley case but to promulgate rules on contacts between members of Congress and the pages.

In its preliminary report, Hastert's office said it had been told twice of concerns about Foley's e-mail contact with a former page.

The first time was last fall, when aides to Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) told Hastert's staff that Foley had been in e-mail contact with a former page whom Alexander had sponsored.

Hastert's office said it had not been told the text of the e-mails and referred Alexander to the House clerk, whose office runs the page program. Alexander's office declined to show the e-mails to the clerk, saying they wanted to protect the family's privacy, according to the Hastert statement. Alexander's staff told the clerk that the e-mails were not sexual but characterized them as "over-friendly," Hastert's office said. In the e-mails, the 52-year-old Foley asked the page how he fared in Hurricane Katrina and asked for a photograph, among other topics.

Jeff Trandahl, the clerk at the time, and Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the House Page Board, met with Foley and told him that the parents wanted Foley to "immediately cease any communication with the young man," the report said. Foley told them he was just mentoring the page.

The clerk later told Hastert's office that they had spoken with Foley and taken corrective action, according to the report.

According to Hastert's press secretary, Ron Bonjean, office staffers did not inform Hastert. But another congressman said Saturday that he had personally told Hastert months later about what had been described as "over-friendly" e-mails. (Hastert does not recall the conversation, his office's report said.)

"Rodney Alexander brought to my attention the existence of e-mails between Mark Foley and a former page of Mr. Alexander's," said Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), chairman of the Republican Congressional Campaign Committee. "Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the [House] speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds said.

Hastert's report said: "While the speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation, he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds' recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution."

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said Saturday that he had heard of the e-mails five months ago but was told the matter had been taken care of.

Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said Alexander had approached the majority leader five months ago and told him that Foley had had an e-mail exchange with a page. The conversation "did not raise an alarm," said Madden, "because Alexander had assured him that he had talked to the parents and they did not wish to pursue it and they did not believe there was need to pursue it further."

G.O.P. Aides Knew In Late '05 Of E-Mail (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Top House Republicans knew for months about e-mail traffic between Representative Mark Foley and a former teenage page, but kept the matter secret and allowed Mr. Foley to remain head of a Congressional caucus on children's issues, Republican lawmakers said Saturday.

The exchanges began with what Republicans now describe as an "overfriendly" e-mail message from Mr. Foley to the unidentified teenager.

But news reports about the exchanges led to the disclosure of e-mail correspondence with other former pages in which the discussions became more and more sexually explicit. Shortly after he was confronted by ABC News on Friday about the subject, Mr. Foley, who represented a south Florida district, resigned from the House.

The revelations set off a political upheaval, with Democrats and some Republicans calling for a full investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct and whether House leaders did enough to look into it. Members of the Republican leadership sought Saturday to detail how they had handled the case in an effort to defuse the situation, even as it was emerging as an issue in Congressional races.

Among those who became aware earlier this year of the fall 2005 communications between Mr. Foley and the 16-year-old page, who worked for Representative Rodney Alexander, Republican of Louisiana, were Representative John A. Boehner, the majority leader, and Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee. Mr. Reynolds said in a statement Saturday that he had also personally raised the issue with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert.

"Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Mr. Reynolds said.

In a chronology of the episode released later on Saturday, the speaker's office said Mr. Hastert did not recall any such discussion and had no previous knowledge of the matter. "While the speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation, he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds' recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution," the statement said.

The statement, issued after senior aides, the House clerk and legal advisers huddled for much of Saturday in the Capitol, said senior staff members in the speaker's office first learned of the e-mail messages from Mr. Alexander's office in the fall of 2005 and took steps to investigate.

Aides to the speaker and other Congressional Republican leaders said the messages, which an Alexander aide described to them as "overfriendly," were much less explicit than the others that came to light after ABC News first disclosed the e-mail correspondence with Mr. Alexander's page. The aides said Mr. Alexander's office, at the request of the page's family, did not show them copies of the messages. In those messages, sent after Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Foley asked about the well-being of the boy, a Monroe, La., resident. He wrote: "How are you weathering the hurricane. . .are you safe. . .send me a pic of you as well." The page sent the note to a former colleague, describing it as "sick."

In another message, Mr. Foley wrote, "What do you want for your birthday coming up. . .what stuff do you like to do."

The e-mail exchanges that came to light after the first news reports were far more graphic. When he was confronted about them on Friday, Mr. Foley resigned. Republican leaders said they had not known about the other e-mail correspondence.

"No one in the speaker's office was made aware of the sexually explicit text messages which press reports suggest had been directed to another individual until they were revealed in the press and on the Internet this week," the statement from Mr. Hastert's office said.

Both Republican and Democratic lawmakers said Saturday that Congress and the public deserved a full report on Mr. Foley's dealings with the pages, who are high school students who serve as runners and perform other duties. The lawmakers said there should also be an inquiry into the leadership's knowledge of his activities and its response.

"Anyone who was involved in the chain of information should come forward and tell when they were told, what they were told and what they did with the information when they got it," said Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York. Mr. King called it a "dark day" for Congress and said, "We need a full investigation."

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said any leader who had been aware of Mr. Foley's behavior and failed to take action should step down. "If they knew or should have known the extent of this problem, they should not serve in leadership," Mr. Shays said.

On Saturday night, the House Republican leadership issued a statement that characterized the communications between Mr. Foley and the former House pages as "unacceptable and abhorrent."

"It is an obscene breach of trust," the statement said. "His immediate resignation must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system."

The statement, from Mr. Hastert, Mr. Boehner and the majority whip, Roy Blunt, asked the board that oversees pages "to undertake a full review of the incident and propose additional safeguard measures."

The leaders also said they had asked for specific rules governing the communications and contacts between pages and lawmakers and called for creation of a toll-free number for pages and their parents to report concerns.

Besides the leaders, other lawmakers and Congressional officers who served on the board that oversaw the page program were aware of the e-mail messages, though the Democratic lawmaker who serves on the board, Representative Dale E. Kildee of Michigan, said Saturday that he had never been informed.

According to lawmakers and the speaker's office, the page who received the e-mail forwarded the one in which Mr. Foley, 52, asked for his picture, to a colleague in Mr. Alexander's office, repeatedly calling it "sick" and saying it "freaked me out."

Mr. Alexander called the boy's parents, who, Republican leaders said Saturday, told him they did not want to pursue the matter but wanted Mr. Foley to stop.

DOJ_NMG_0072531

Mr. Alexander's office also contacted staff members in Mr. Hastert's office for guidance on what to do and, according to the speaker's account, his aides put Mr. Alexander's staff in contact with the clerk of the House, who oversees the page program. The clerk, who at the time was Jeff Trandahl, referred the matter to Representative John Shimkus, the Illinois Republican who is the chairman of the House Page Board, in late 2005, a spokesman for Mr. Shimkus said.

Mr. Trandahl and Mr. Shimkus confronted Mr. Foley, who insisted he was simply acting as a mentor to the former page, officials said. He assured them nothing inappropriate had occurred.

"They asked Foley about the e-mail," the speaker's statement said. "Congressman Shimkus and the clerk made it clear that to avoid even the appearance of impropriety and at the request of the parents, Congressman Foley was to immediately cease any communication with the young man."

The leadership had other possible avenues for investigating the e-mail messages beyond questioning Mr. Foley, including an inquiry by the ethics committee or even the Capitol police. But aides said that while the contents of the messages are disturbing in hindsight, they did not set off alarms initially.

On Saturday, Mr. Shimkus' spokesman, Steve Tomaszewski, said, "Obviously Foley lied about the other e-mails."

Mr. Tomaszewski said Mr. Shimkus would not comment on any other conversations he had with House leaders about the matter because it was referred to the ethics committee by a vote of the House on Friday. A spokesman for Mr. Alexander did not respond to telephone and e-mail messages.

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mr. Boehner, said Saturday that Mr. Boehner had had a "brief, nonspecific" conversation about the subject with Mr. Alexander in the spring but that he could not recall with certainty whether he had discussed it with other leaders.

Democrats moved quickly to criticize Mr. Reynolds, who while overseeing House campaigns nationally is facing the potential of a serious challenge from Jack Davis, a wealthy businessman who has vowed to spend at least $2 million of his own money in the contest. "Tom Reynolds had a moral obligation to protect our children," said Curtis Ellis, a spokesman for Mr. Davis.

Carl Forti, a spokesman for Mr. Reynolds, said the congressman became aware of contact between Mr. Foley and the young page this past spring, when Mr. Alexander brought it to his attention. Mr. Forti said that Mr. Alexander had told Mr. Reynolds of an e-mail exchange between Mr. Foley and the page, but that he did not show Mr. Reynolds the e-mail messages and their contents.

Strategists for both parties said it was too early to tell what impact the episode might have on Congressional elections now five weeks away but said at a minimum it could lower the already dismal public view of incumbents and discourage conservative voters.

It directly affected the race for the seat of Mr. Foley — the third Republican to resign this year under a cloud. Tim Mahoney, the Democrat who had been running an uphill and barely watched race against Mr. Foley, used the new attention to his campaign on Saturday to accuse the Republican leadership of covering up for him.

"It's now clear from all the reports coming in from across the country that the Republican leadership team has been well aware of this problem with the pages for well over a year," Mr. Mahoney said at a campaign stop at Palm Beach International Airport. "It looks to me that it was more important to hold onto a seat and to hold onto power than to take care of our children."

At the Justice Department, an official said that no investigation was under way but that the agency had "real interest" in examining the circumstances to see if any crimes were committed.

Several of Mr. Foley's former colleagues demanded a criminal inquiry.

Representative Robert E. Cramer, an Alabama Democrat who was co-chairman with Mr. Foley of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, condemned Mr. Foley's actions as "shocking and disturbing."

"Anyone, including Foley, involved in this type of behavior should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law," Mr. Cramer said.

GOP Leader Rebuts Hastert On Foley (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Reynolds: Speaker Knew of E-Mails in Spring

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was notified early this year of inappropriate e-mails from former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to a 16-year-old page, a top GOP House member said yesterday -- contradicting the speaker's assertions that he learned of concerns about Foley only last week.

Hastert did not dispute the claims of Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), and his office confirmed that some of Hastert's top aides knew last year that Foley had been ordered to cease contact with the boy and to treat all pages respectfully.

Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, became the second senior House Republican to say that Hastert has known of Foley's contacts for months, prompting Democratic attacks about the GOP leadership's inaction. Foley abruptly resigned his seat Friday.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) told The Washington Post on Friday that he had learned in late spring of inappropriate e-mails Foley sent to the page, a boy from Louisiana, and that he promptly told Hastert, who appeared to know already of the concerns. Hours later, Boehner contacted The Post to say he could not be sure he had spoken with Hastert.

Yesterday's developments revealed a rift at the highest echelons of House Republican ranks a month before the Nov. 7 elections, and they threatened to expand the scandal to a full-blown party dilemma.

Only after Reynolds's definitive statement did Hastert concede yesterday that he may have been notified of some of the questionable activities of Foley, 52, who had co-chaired the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. Hastert said, however, that he knew nothing of the sexually explicit instant messages that became public Friday when ABC News and other news outlets reported them. The messages apparently were exchanged with youths other than the 16-year-old.

Hastert's aides learned in the fall of 2005 only of e-mail exchanges that House officials eventually deemed "over-friendly" with the Louisiana teenager, the speaker's office said yesterday in a lengthy statement. "While the Speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation" with Reynolds, the statement said, "he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds's recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution."

Boehner and Reynolds said their offices learned of the Foley e-mails months ago from Rep. Rodney Alexander (R), who sponsored the page from his northeastern-Louisiana district.

"Rodney Alexander brought to my attention the existence of the e-mails between Mark Foley and a former page of Mr. Alexander's," Reynolds said yesterday. "Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me."

GOP leaders have said they referred the matter promptly to Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who heads a three-lawmaker panel that oversees the House page program.

Shimkus questioned Foley, but at that time, he had seen only suspiciously friendly e-mails, not the explicit instant messages revealed recently. In one e-mail to the former page, for example, Foley asked for a picture of him. The boy reportedly told an associate that he considered the request to be "sick," but Foley convinced Shimkus that the exchanges were innocent, Shimkus and Republican leaders said.

Republicans appeared to have kept the matter under wraps. Rep. Dale E. Kildee (Mich.), the only Democrat on the House Page Board, said yesterday: "I was never informed of the allegations about Mr. Foley's inappropriate communications with a House page, and I was never involved in any inquiry into this matter."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, questioned yesterday why Alexander had gone to the House Republicans' chief political operative, rather than to other party leaders. "That's to protect a member, not to protect a child," Emanuel said.

With his statement, Reynolds, who is locked in a difficult reelection campaign, signaled he was unwilling to take the fall alone amid partisan attacks that were becoming increasingly vituperative. The Democratic National Committee yesterday issued a statement asking "Why Did Tom Reynolds Cover Up Congressman's Sex Crimes?" It continued: "While the shocking [online] exchanges produced an immediate uproar that cost Congressman Foley his job, at least one member of the House Republican leadership had known about the situation for months and did nothing about it: . . . Reynolds."

Republican insiders said Reynolds spoke out because he was angry that Hastert appeared willing to let him take the blame for the party leadership's silence.

A House GOP leadership aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of losing his job, said that Reynolds realizes he has taken a shot at his leader but that it is understandable.

"This is what happens when one member tries to throw another member under a bus," the aide said.

Last night, Hastert, Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) said in a statement that Foley's communications with former pages are "unacceptable and abhorrent," and that his resignation "must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system." The statement did not suggest how that might happen, but added that the three have "asked for the creation of a toll-free telephone number for House pages, parents, grandparents and staff to confidentially report incidents of concern."

The House clerk's office "has taken possession of Congressman Foley's office, and Capitol police officers have been posted in front of his office around-the-clock" to preserve Foley's records and correspondence, said Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean.

Foley's actions have jeopardized a House seat that Republicans had considered safe this fall. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) headlined a fundraiser yesterday for the district's Democratic nominee, Tim Mahoney, whose race has rocketed to national prominence with Foley's resignation. Charlie Cook, editor of a nonpartisan newsletter that tracks congressional races, said that if Foley's name stays on the ballot, "it's going to be hard for Republicans to hold on to the seat." But a GOP loss might last only two years, he said, since the district typically votes Republican in presidential races.

The chronology released by Hastert's office begins in late 2005, after Alexander had alerted colleagues of Foley's e-mail exchanges with the former page, who had returned to Louisiana. Hastert aide Tim Kennedy "immediately discussed the matter with his supervisor, Mike Stokke, Speaker Hastert's Deputy Chief of Staff," the statement says. Also brought into the talks were Hastert's staff attorney, Ted Van Der Meid, and the House clerk.

The clerk and Shimkus "immediately met with Foley to discuss the matter," the chronology says, and they told Foley "to immediately cease any communication with the young man. . . . Mindful of the sensitivity to the parents' wishes to protect their child's privacy and believing that they had promptly reported what they knew to the proper authorities," it says, "Kennedy, Van Der Meid and Stokke did not discuss the matter with others in the Speaker's Office."

Republicans fear the scandal, coming in the wake of indictments of three GOP congressmen this year, might add to the public's unrest at the party's image and conduct, and some House members yesterday joined in the chorus of dismay and scorn.

"I don't think it will be just conservative voters that will shake their heads when they hear about this," said Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.).

"As the author of laws designed to protect children on the Internet, I was appalled at the recent revelations that a member of Congress engaged in reprehensible behavior toward young people connected to the congressional page program," said Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.). "Congress should thoroughly investigate this matter and, in cooperation with law enforcement authorities, support all proper legal action."

Rich Galen, a Republican political strategist, worried that voters might lump Foley's name with former representatives Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), all of whom were forced to resign or were indicted amid various scandals this year.

"This sense of entitlement that members of Congress can do anything to anyone or for anyone has got to end," Galen said.

Staff writer R. Jeffrey Smith and staff researcher Magda Jean-Louis contributed to this report.

GOP Leaders Knew Of Foley E-mail In '05 (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, October 1, 2006

Rep. Thomas Reynolds, head of the House Republican election effort, said Saturday he told Speaker Dennis Hastert months ago about concerns that a fellow GOP lawmaker had sent inappropriate messages to a teenage boy. Hastert's office said aides referred the matter to the proper authorities last fall but they were only told the messages were "over-friendly."

Reynolds, R-N.Y., was told about e-mails sent by Rep. Mark Foley and is now defending himself from Democratic accusations that he did too little. Foley, R-Fla., resigned Friday after ABC News questioned him about the e-mails to a former congressional page and about sexually suggestive instant messages to other pages.

"The improper communications between Congressman Mark Foley and former House Congressional pages is unacceptable and abhorrent. It is an obscene breach of trust," Hastert, R-Ill., Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said in a written statement Saturday evening. "His immediate resignation must now be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system."

The House leaders said it is their duty to ensure House pages are safe. They said they are creating a toll-free hot line for pages and their families to call to confidentially report any incidents, and will consider adopting new rules on communications between lawmakers and pages.

The boy who received the e-mails was 16 in the summer of 2005 when he worked in Congress as a page. After the boy returned to his Louisiana home, the congressman e-mailed him. The teenager thought the messages were inappropriate, particularly one in which Foley asked the teen to send a picture of himself.

The teen's family contacted their congressman, Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., who then discussed the problem with Reynolds sometime this spring.

"Rodney Alexander brought to my attention the existence of e-mails between Mark Foley and a former page of Mr. Alexander's," Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said in a written statement Saturday.

"Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds said.

Hastert said he does not remember talking to Reynolds about the Foley e-mails, but did not dispute Reynolds' account.

"While the speaker does not explicitly recall this conversation, he has no reason to dispute Congressman Reynolds' recollection that he reported to him on the problem and its resolution," Hastert's aides said in a preliminary report on the matter issued Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0072534

On Friday night, Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said the top House Republican had not known about the allegations.

Saturday's report includes a lengthy timeline detailing when they first learned of the worrisome e-mail in the fall of 2005, after a staffer for Alexander told Hastert's office the family wanted Foley to stop contacting their son. Alexander's staffer did not share the contents of the e-mail, saying it was not sexual but "over-friendly," the report says.

Hastert's aides referred the matter to the Clerk of the House, and "mindful of the sensitivity of the parent's wishes to protect their child's privacy and believing that they had promptly reported what they knew to the proper authorities," they did not discuss it with others in Hastert's office — including, apparently, their boss.

After the issue was referred to the clerk, it was passed along to the congressman who oversees the page program, Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill.

Shimkus has said he learned about the e-mail exchange in late 2005 and took immediate action to investigate.

He said Foley told him it was an innocent exchange. Shimkus said he warned Foley not to have any more contact with the teenager and to respect other pages.

Democrats charged Reynolds did far too little and said more digging should be done.

"Congressman Reynolds' inaction in the face of such a serious situation is very troubling, and raises important questions about whether there was an attempt to cover up criminal activity involving a minor to keep it from coming to light before Election Day," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Karen Finney.

New York Democrats hoping to unseat Reynolds blasted the congressman, saying they call into question the Republican's values.

"Mr. Reynolds knew about these allegedly inappropriate e-mails from a fellow congressman to a minor for months and didn't lift a finger," said Blake Zeff, a spokesman for the state Democrats.

Shimkus Approached Foley About Early E-mails (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON Last year, the House clerk grabbed Rep. John Shimkus off the floor during a vote and said they needed to talk.

It wasn't unusual for the clerk at that time, Jeff Trandahl, to catch Shimkus, in the hallway or on the House floor, since together they oversaw the House page program and often had items to discuss.

This time, though, Trandahl had in his hand an email exchange between one of the House pages, a 16-year-old boy, and Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla.

Shimkus, who serves as board chairman for the House page program, read the emails, in which Foley asked about the boy's well-being in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, what he wanted for his birthday, and for a photograph. (The boy was from Louisiana and had returned to his home state.)

Although there was nothing sexually suggestive in the emails, Shimkus and Trandal agreed: "That was enough for us to approach Mark," Shimkus recalled an interview Saturday.

Soon after, they met with Foley and his chief of staff in the Florida congressman's office. "We basically said, 'We got these emails. And we don't think this is appropriate. ... You have to stop (contacting this boy)'," Shimkus said.

Shimkus said Foley told them, "'When I was a young person, an adult became my mentor inspired me to be a congressman and that's all I'm doing'." Foley said if he was guilty of anything, Shimkus recalled, it was of being "overly friendly."

As Shimkus and the rest of his House colleagues now know, "He lied to me. He lied to the former clerk."

Foley announced his resignation Friday after ABC News reported that he had indeed sent sexually explicit emails to other male pages.

Shimkus said he believes he handled the situation as best he could, given the information he had at the time. He said he didn't tell any other lawmakers about the incident, even other page board members, because he thought it had been addressed sufficiently.

He said he never learned, until Friday, about the other more explicit messages Foley sent, Shimkus said.

"My evaluation was there's no smoking gun here," he said. "At the time, that email had no significance ... other than 'Mark stay away from this kid, this doesn't look good'."

DOJ_NMG_0072535

Shimkus added: "I think based on the information I had, what I did was fine. If I regret something maybe I should have had Dale (Kildee, a Democratic board member and congressmen from Michigan) with me because now it's going to be a political football.

In the midst of the continuing swirl of the scandal last night, Shimkus and another board member visited the pages and apologized to them. Just a few days earlier, Shimkus had "read them the riot act" about behaving properly while in the program. On Friday, he told them, "I'm embarrassed I'm ashamed. This lecture I gave you I should give to my colleagues."

He urged them to contact him or another adult supervisor if they ever felt uncomfortable or were concerned about the behavior of House members, staff, or others. Shimkkus said he's not sure what steps, if any, the board could take to prevent this kind of incident again.

"Our responsibility is to make sure the kids are as safe in D.C. as they are at home. And you know what? They are," he said. "These kids are incredibly watched after and monitored, as well as any kids can be monitored."

As for his former colleague Foley, he said: "I imagine Mark really is a sick man who has really harmed himself and harmed the institution. Because of that I'm sure I'll be dealing with this for a while."

Democrats See Chance In Foley's District (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

Democratic candidate Tim Mahoney seized the opportunity created by scandal and criticized GOP leaders Saturday for not fully investigating Rep. Mark Foley when his raunchy communications with a teenage boy came to light about a year ago.

Foley resigned Friday after revelations that he exchanged explicit electronic messages with the 16-year-old boy, a former congressional page, sending the Florida GOP scrambling for a replacement candidate less than six weeks before the election.

Mahoney, who until two days ago was the underdog in the race for Foley's seat, said Republican leaders should have fully investigated at the time. Pages are high school students who attend classes under congressional supervision and work as messengers.

"It looks to me that it was more important to hold onto a seat and to hold onto power than to take care of our children," Mahoney said. "I think that's wrong. I think that's what's wrong with Washington."

The House Page Board investigated the allegations late last year, but Foley was not honest when he denied improper conduct with the teenager, the committee's leader, Rep. John Shimkus of Illinois, has said.

Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, head of the House Republican election effort, said Saturday that he told Speaker Dennis Hastert months ago about the e-mail concerns. Hastert's office said aides referred the matter to proper authorities last fall but were told the messages were only "over-friendly."

House leaders, including Hastert, said their duty is to ensure that pages are safe. They said they are creating a toll-free hot line for pages and their families to call to confidentially report any incidents and will consider adopting new rules on communications between lawmakers and pages.

Mahoney, a millionaire financial services executive who switched parties last year before entering the race, campaigned Saturday with Sen. John Kerry.

The Massachusetts senator was in the state to raise money for Democratic congressional candidates and party gubernatorial nominee Jim Davis. About Foley, he said, "It speaks for itself. Every parent in America is disgusted and disturbed by it."

Foley, R-Fla., who is single, apologized Friday for letting down his family and constituents. Hours after his resignation, Foley's former colleagues engineered a vote to let the House ethics committee decide whether an investigation is needed.

In Florida, Democrats found themselves suddenly competitive in a district where Foley, 52, had been considered a shoo-in.

His resignation further complicates the political landscape for Republicans, who are fighting to retain control of Congress. Democrats need to win a net of 15 Republican seats to regain the power they lost in 1994.

Florida Republican officials on Saturday were still discussing the procedure to replace Foley as a candidate in the South Florida district, which President Bush won with 55 percent of the vote in 2004 and is now in play for November.

Though Florida ballots have already been printed with Foley's name and cannot be changed, any votes for Foley will count toward the party's choice.

State Rep. Joe Negron has been mentioned as a possible candidate. He would enter the race with several hundred thousand dollars left over from an attorney general campaign that he ended to avoid a primary with former U.S. Rep. Bill McCollum.

DOJ_NMG_0072536

"Tim Mahoney is spending his afternoon hanging out with John Kerry in Palm Beach County, and I think most voters in District 16 don't want a John Kerry Democrat representing them in Congress," Negron said. He said he has received the backing of many state Republican executive board members.

Foley, who represented an area around Palm Beach County and was chairman of the Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, had introduced legislation in July to protect children from exploitation by adults over the Internet. He also sponsored other legislation designed to protect minors from abuse and neglect.

Foley e-mailed the page in August 2005. The boy was 16 at the time. Foley asked him how he was doing after Hurricane Katrina and what he wanted for his birthday. The congressman also asked the boy to send a photo of himself, according to excerpts of the e-mails that were originally released by ABC News.

ABC News reported Friday that Foley also engaged in a series of sexually explicit instant messages with current and former pages, all male.

House Republican Leaders Admit They Knew About Foley E-mails For Months (FLSUNSEN)

By William E. Gibson And Josh Hafenbrack

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 1, 2006

U.S. Rep. Mark Foley's sudden resignation from Congress sparked a political firestorm on Saturday when Democrats accused House Republicans of failing to respond to initial reports of his sexually suggestive e-mails to a congressional page.

The House voted late Friday to turn the matter over to the Ethics Committee before Congress adjourned for the fall election campaign season, hours after House leaders acknowledged they had known about the e-mails for months.

In Washington and Palm Beach County, Democrats tried to broaden the sex scandal by condemning an alleged cover-up by the House majority.

"It's made more outrageous by the fact that Republican leaders knew about it a year ago and kept it a secret to protect their political lives instead of protecting the lives of pages," U.S. Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, D-Weston, said during a news conference at Palm Beach International Airport.

Wasserman Schultz and former presidential candidate John Kerry seized on Foley's resignation and apology while campaigning for Tim Mahoney, the Democrat running for Foley's former seat. "I think every parent in America was disgusted and disturbed by it," said Sen. Kerry, D-Mass., who had planned the fundraising trip before Foley's resignation on Friday.

Foley's apology and resignation six weeks before the Nov. 7 elections has turned the campaign for his seat into one of the most contentious and closely watched congressional races in the nation.

Before the resignation, election forecasters had considered Florida's 16th District relatively safe for Republicans despite Mahoney's spirited campaign. Foley, a popular and well-funded incumbent, seemed almost invincible.

Suddenly Democrats have the advantage in that race, putting the 16th District in the middle of a titanic nationwide struggle for majority control of the House.

South Florida Republicans scrambled to contain the damage but acknowledged that the once-safe seat is vulnerable.

"It's going to be very much of an uphill battle," said Palm Beach County Commissioner Mary McCarty. "I think a big question is going to be, who in Washington knew this was going on, and what did they do about it? I'm certainly hoping anybody that knew about this turned this over to the proper authorities at the right time. If it was common knowledge, why was it allowed to go on?"

House Republican leaders have acknowledged hearing complaints last November about suspicious e-mails from Foley to a 16-year-old former page but took no action at the request of the boy's parents.

When news about the e-mails was reported last week, Foley abruptly resigned. Around midnight Friday, just before taking a break for the election campaigns, House leaders pushed through a vote to turn the matter over to the House ethics committee.

Republican leaders in District 16, which includes parts of eight counties, plan to meet this week to pick a new candidate. State Rep. Joe Negron, R-Stuart, appears to be the leading candidate.

Negron says he has $1 million of cash on hand from his abandoned run for attorney general. That money can't be transferred into a federal account, but Negron said he would lean on many of the same supporters and had already received numerous calls from would-be donors.

Palm Beach County Republican Party Chairman Sid Dinerstein said Foley's name on the ballot makes for an awkward campaign, and he's not sure if the new Republican candidate can overcome it.

"If there's a piece of luck in this thing on our side, it's Joe Negron," Dinerstein said. "He has the ability to raise money. He has name recognition. He's a wonderful person; the guy has no negatives. If the voters are just not able to punch the Foley name, we would understand."

Florida Republican Party spokesman Jeff Sadosky wouldn't say when the party will pick a new candidate, or if the GOP will mount a challenge to get Foleys' name off the ballot yet. "Right now, we're talking with our legal team to figure out the best course of action," he said.

Political analysts who track elections across the country say Democrats this year are poised to gain just enough seats to seize majority control, making each close race potentially pivotal.

"It's a likely Democratic pickup now," said Alan Abramowitz, a political scientist at Emory University. "That's a seat very likely to flip. Every seat is crucial now, so that's a big one."

Democrats need to gain 15 House seats to hold the majority, which would allow them to control the agenda, lead every committee and bring legislation to the floor for votes.

The opposition party would then be in position to promote its own causes, stymie President Bush's policies and investigate administration practices. The balance of power in Washington would shift closer to the middle of the political spectrum after two decades of conservative Republican dominance.

Foley's former seat becomes one of about three dozen in contention, including a close race in Florida's 22nd District, where Republican Rep. Clay Shaw of Fort Lauderdale is struggling to fend off Democrat Ron Klein, a state senator from Boca Raton.

Democrats now appear likely to gain between 13 and 20 House seats, said Richard Semiatin, a political scientist at American University in Washington who tracks House races.

In the post World War II era, Democrats controlled the House for four decades before losing it in the momentous 1994 election, which brought Foley into office along with 53 other Republican freshmen.

Once an embodiment of the "Republican Revolution," Foley in this year's elections has added to his party's woes.

Foley Built Career As Protector Of Children (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

He Gained Attention by Fighting Sex Crimes

The Republican congressman who resigned Friday following the discovery of sexually explicit Internet messages he sent to teenage boys was a gregarious and charismatic lawmaker who built his political career in large measure on legislative proposals meant to halt the sexual predation of children and others.

Beginning with his 1993 sponsorship of a measure in the Florida state legislature to seize the cars of men who solicited prostitutes, former restaurant owner and real estate agent Mark Foley repeatedly attracted a flattering political spotlight by inveighing against those involved in sexual crimes and presenting himself as a protector of exploited children.

A well-liked member of the class of conservatives elected to Congress in 1994, Foley was until two days ago a deputy whip for the House Republicans and a co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. A Web site for the bipartisan group states that it was formed to "create a voice within Congress" on that issue and to operate a hotline for tips about "online child sexual exploitation" that could be passed to law enforcement agencies.

At a White House Rose Garden ceremony on July 27, President Bush hailed Foley and some other House and Senate lawmakers as members of a "SWAT team for kids." Bush spoke while signing into law a broad child protection measure that included a Foley-sponsored provision requiring sex offenders to register in every state where they live, work or attend school.

Foley's abrupt exit from Capitol Hill on Friday, shortly after ABC News journalists confronted him with excerpts of his Internet messages to male youths, stunned his congressional staff. They had dismissed an ABC report earlier last week about e-mails Foley, 52, sent to an underage, male House page as an exaggerated report stemming from an innocent attempt to be friendly.

Foley was not the target of any official investigation before his resignation, and he said in a three-sentence letter on Friday that "I am deeply sorry and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida."

"No one saw the extent of this," said a former aide who said he has been in contact with Foley's congressional staff members since the resignation and who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter. "You do that kind of stuff in the shadows."

Born in Boston into a devout Catholic family, Foley moved to south-central Florida and dropped out of a community college at age 20 to open with his mother a restaurant called Lettuce Patch, according to the Almanac of American Politics and CQ's

Politics in America. He entered politics three years later as a commissioner for Lake Worth, a coastal town south of wealthy Palm Beach, starting as Democrat but switching parties in the 1980s.

The political cause of exploited children has long been a Republican favorite, and several of his staff members had strong feelings about its importance, according to several sources familiar with Foley's work. They said he saw the topic as a platform for attracting national attention and winning frequent appearances on cable talk shows, where he described sex offenders as "animals" who will persist "unless stopped."

"He loved the attention," a former aide said.

Foley recalled earlier this month that "I was in my mid-twenties" when Adam Walsh, 10, was kidnapped from his home in a nearby Florida community, assaulted, and killed in 1981, a crime that attracted national attention. "I remember that the case startled me. . . . It described the end of innocence for South Florida."

In 1998, he sponsored legislation allowing the Boy Scouts and other volunteer groups to get access to an FBI criminal database so they could weed out child predators. In 2003, he pressed Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) to investigate a nudist camp for teenagers, noting that "I have been fighting for years to eliminate both child pornography and so-called exploitive child modeling Web sites."

During the congressional debate in 1998 over President Bill Clinton's affair with a White House intern, Foley called Clinton's actions vile and told the St. Petersburg Times that "it's more sad than anything else, to see someone with such potential throw it all down the drain because of a sexual addiction."

While campaigning for a Senate nomination in 2003, Foley, who is single, was asked whether he was gay, and deflected the question as a matter of personal privacy before dropping out of the race.

Legislating, he told National Public Radio on June 29, "is not necessarily just trying to brand people or create a scarlet letter or subject them to unnecessary ridicule, but it's really to set a bar and a standard by which they then decide, 'I better get help professionally,' 'I better go and see how I can deal with this problem,' or, 'I should absolutely avoid contact with young people in order to ensure I don't fall into this very serious problem.' "

Hitting A Self-Destruct Button (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON

POLITICS incubates all manner of gaffe, scandal and humiliation, and then there are those rarified doozies that become classics at I.M. speed.

Hello, Representative Mark Foley, here's your special membership pin and thanks for joining Washington's "What On Earth Was He Thinking?" Caucus.

The illustrious club includes a special "Sex Scandal" subcaucus that features, among others, Wilbur Mills (D-Tidal Basin), Gary Hart (D-Monkey Business), Bob Packwood (R-Senate Elevators) and, of course, Bill Clinton (D-Oval Office).

Mr. Foley, the six-term Republican from Florida, gained slam-dunk admission Friday when he resigned from Congress and apologized to his family and the people of his state over reports that he sent sexually explicit messages to underage male pages.

Note the inclusion of the terms "sexually explicit," "underage," "male" and "page," in addition to the tidbits tidily extracted from the instant messages that ABC News reported were exchanged between Mr. Foley and his 16-year old, er, friend:

"Do I make you a little horny?" Mr. Foley reportedly asked under the log-in name "Maf54."

Teen: "A little."

Maf54: "Cool."

Mr. Foley gets double bonus points for his helpful if imprudent use of electronic mail, which made it so easy to spread around the mirth and amusement and — oops, scratch that, we mean genuine sadness and compassion. This is Washington, after all.

The exchange was quoted verbatim in the lead story of ABC's "World News Tonight" Friday and linked in its entirety on ABC's Web site under the heading of "READER DISCRETION STRONGLY ADVISED: Foley's Exchange With Underage Page."

Career-ender, in other words. At least until Mr. Foley does his confessional interview on Oprah, gets his very own talk-show ("Mark!") and secures the requisite seven-figure book advance. The book would divulge all the sordid details, except that it's hard to imagine things getting any more sordid than what's already on the Internet. The snippet quoted above is just the PG-13 teaser.

The "Sex Scandal" club is only one subcaucus in the big tent of Washington infamy and shame. There is also the "Blatant Financial Improprieties" subcaucus (with the guest star Duke Cunningham), the "Ill-Advised Nazi Comparison" subcaucus

But the sex subcaucus is easily the biggest.

"You always seem to have politicians doing bizarrely self-destructive things, especially involving sex," says Lawrence Kestenbaum, creator of "Political Graveyard," a history Web site that includes an exhaustive cataloging of transgressions by politicians.

Under the heading "Politicians Who Were Ever in Trouble or Disgrace," the section contains 420 entries, in chronological order, many of them involving present and former members of Congress. Among the escapades:

· Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, was reprimanded when it was revealed that a male lover had been running a prostitution business out of his Capitol Hill apartment.

· Donald (Buz) Lukens, Republican of Ohio, who was convicted of a misdemeanor for having sex with a 16-year-old girl.

· Dan Crane, Republican of Illinois, and Gerry Studds, Democrat of Massachusetts, both of whom were censured by the House for having sexual relations with teenage pages — Mr. Crane with a female in 1980, Mr. Studds with a male in 1973.

The "Politicians Who Were Ever in Trouble or Disgrace" section comes with the devastatingly simple disclaimer "Very Incomplete!"

Mr. Kestenbaum says improprieties in the political realm tend to resonate more than in others. First, they tend to become public, necessitating apologies and, in many cases, resignations. He points out that if Mr. Foley were a purchasing manager at some store, he might actually keep his job.

"The political world tends to be very judgmental," Mr. Kestenbaum says. This creates towering spectacles of dishonesty, famous last words that are often caught on tape. Mr. Clinton created the gold standard for this when he looked into a camera and indignantly declared, "I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Miss Lewinsky."

Mr. Foley gets triple bonus points for hypocrisy. As co-chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children, he has been a fierce advocate for tough sanctions against people who sexually exploit children over the Internet. Not that Democrats have been pointing this out relentlessly since the news broke or anything.

Or reminding people that Mr. Foley was a big supporter of President Clinton's impeachment.

"Part of his thing was, 'What do we tell the children?'" recalls the longtime Clinton aide Paul Begala. "Apparently, we'll tell them in a sexually explicit e-mail."

Gleeful, anyone? It's unclear exactly where this fits in, but any story about politicians and sex scandals feels incomplete without the iconic quote from Edwin Edwards, the rascally former governor of Louisiana: "The only way I can lose this election," Mr. Edwards once boasted to reporters, "is if I'm caught in bed with either a dead girl or a live boy."

He said nothing about instant messaging, however.

House's Program For Teenagers Is No Stranger To Scandal (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — The last time a scandal involving Congressional pages unfolded in the House of Representatives, a commission reviewing the matter reached a conclusion: those serving in the blue-coated gofer positions must be at least 16.

It was 1982, when Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., Democrat of Massachusetts and the House speaker, appointed a panel to review accusations that two congressmen had sexual relationships with teenage pages. Before the case was closed, the Justice Department had begun its own investigation and a yearlong House ethics probe concluded with the censure of a Republican and a Democratic representative.

The page program, a storied part of official Washington since 1829 and whose alumni include sitting members of Congress, is again at the center of a political controversy, as the fallout continued on Saturday from the resignation of Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida. Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, has ordered a fresh review of the program allowing high school students to work as messengers on Capitol Hill.

Congressional pages arrive in Washington from across the country, sponsored by their local representative or senator, in a highly competitive program that attracts thousands of applicants. In navy blazers and pressed white shirts, about 100 young men and women not only answer telephones, deliver documents and run errands for members of Congress, but they also have a ringside seat to internal workings of the House and Senate.

Now, their education includes a possible scandal revolving around sexually explicit Internet and cellphone messages between Mr. Foley, 52, and a 16-year-old former page from Louisiana.

Two decades ago, the page program was nearly discontinued after accusations of sexual misconduct and drug use. But a Congressional panel concluded: "We feel the pages received a bum rap from the highly publicized scandal."

Representatives Daniel B. Crane, Republican of Illinois, and Gerry E. Studds, Democrat of Massachusetts, were formally censured by the House in the sex scandal. On July 20, 1983, the two were required to stand in the well of the House chamber and listen to the charges against them, which they did not dispute.

Mr. Crane, who lost his bid for re-election, was censured for having had sexual relations with a 17-year-old female House page. Mr. Studds, who went on to serve in the House until January 1997, was censured for having had sexual relations with a 17-year-old male page on a trip to Europe during a summer Congressional recess.

In the aftermath of the scandal, the minimum age for pages was raised to 16 from 14. Tighter supervision measures were put in place, including a dormitory just blocks from the Capitol, where pages are required to live and attend classes.

Lawmakers moved to create the Page Board, a bipartisan panel that oversees the program.

Representative John Shimkus, a Republican from Illinois who heads the five-member board, had been looking into the case against Mr. Foley. But he kept the matter closely held.

The Democrat on the board, Representative Dale E. Kildee of Michigan, said he had not learned of the episode until Friday, the day Mr. Foley resigned.

"I was never informed of the allegations about Mr. Foley's inappropriate communications with a House page," Mr. Kildee said in a statement released Saturday evening. "And I was never involved in any inquiry into this matter."

The Foley Scandal (WP)

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

It's not just about Rep. Foley.

THE SUDDEN resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) involves more than an obviously troubled man who sent sexually suggestive e-mails to underage congressional pages. Numerous fellow lawmakers, including Republican leaders, apparently had at least partial knowledge about Mr. Foley's disturbing conduct. A thorough and prompt accounting is needed of what colleagues knew about his behavior, when they knew it and what they did about it.

The system of congressional pages offers valuable experience for teenage boys and girls but also puts a burden on Congress to ensure that the young people in its care are not subject to sexual harassment or abuse. In 1983 the House censured Reps. Daniel B. Crane (R-Ill) and Gerry E. Studds (D-Mass.) for sexual misconduct with pages. Given that history, initial reports about the institutional response to questions about Mr. Foley's behavior are extremely troubling -- suggestive of a self-protective desire to sweep the problem under the rug rather than to put the well-being of pages paramount.

Mr. Foley's interests were so well-known that pages reportedly warned each other to watch out for him. Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), who chairs the House Page Board, said he was told by the clerk of the House about troubling e-mails from Mr. Foley to a page "in late 2005." Mr. Shimkus said he warned Mr. Foley to cut off contact and "be especially mindful of his conduct" with pages. That hardly seems an adequate response.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) said he learned of the matter last spring, and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), after first saying he heard about it only last week, confirmed yesterday that he also was informed early this year. What did the House leaders do with this information, and did they take steps to protect other pages?

Mr. Boehner has punted the controversy to the House ethics committee. But that panel has too often been a black hole of inaction riven by partisan divisions. This isn't a matter of judging whether an individual member complied with ethics rules so much as of assessing the House's institutional response to a problem in its midst. The better course would be to appoint an outside investigator to do the fact-finding. Meanwhile, lawmakers, from the speaker on down, should divulge, fully and quickly, their conduct in this affair.

Medicare Insurers To Offer More Options In '07 (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Medicare beneficiaries will have access to more options for prescription drug coverage in 2007, with many insurers offering better value and a larger number of medications, the Bush administration said Friday. But the potential for confusion may also increase.

The administration said beneficiaries who were satisfied with their current drug coverage would not have to do anything when the six-week open enrollment period begins Nov. 15. Consumer advocates, however, said beneficiaries should carefully review the options because prices have changed, often by significant amounts.

Insurers can begin marketing their 2007 options on Sunday.

The drug program got off to a chaotic start in January. But the Bush administration, realizing that health care could be a potent issue for Democrats in midterm elections this fall, appears to have solved many of the biggest problems.

Many experts had predicted a shakeout in the market for drug coverage, which is offered through dozens of private insurers subsidized by the government. But it did not occur.

In most states, Medicare beneficiaries had a choice of slightly more than 40 free-standing drug plans this year. In 2007, every state but Alaska and Hawaii will have more than 50 drug plans, and 23 states will have 55 or more.

The number of national drug plans offering coverage in every state will rise to 17 next year, from 9 this year. In New York, 61 drug plans will be available, up from 46 this year.

John K. Gorman, a former Medicare official who is now a health care consultant, said, "Over all, Medicare beneficiaries can expect to see low drug premiums and higher levels of benefits."

To support the assertion that drug plans will offer better value, Medicare officials said the average premium for drug coverage next year would be $24 a month. That is the same as this year and 40 percent less than first estimated for 2007. But, the officials said, the average number of drugs covered by insurers will increase by 13 percent, to 4,390 next year.

Monthly premiums in 2007 will range from a low of $9.50, under a drug plan offered by the HIP Insurance Company of New York, to a high of more than $110 under plans offered by Sierra Health Services in New Jersey and some other states.

Francis B. Olsen, senior vice president of HIP Insurance in New York, said his company was now charging $40.70 a month for "virtually the same coverage" that would cost $9.50 a month next year. Clearly, he said, "it will be a better bargain for beneficiaries." Humana has the lowest premium this year: $1.87 a month in a seven-state region that includes Iowa, Minnesota and North and South Dakota.

The number of drug plans available in 2006 and 2007 far exceeds what members of Congress expected when they created the program three years ago. The existence of so many plans provides some evidence to support the theory that the federal government can stimulate fierce competition among private insurers — regulated and subsidized by the government — to help control health costs for beneficiaries and taxpayers.

"As a result of robust competition and smart choices by seniors, plans are adding drugs, removing options that were not popular, and providing more options with enhanced coverage," said Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

But Deane R. Beebe of the Medicare Rights Center, a counseling and advocacy group, said beneficiaries should not be lulled into complacency.

"Your drug plan might have worked for you this year, but you can't assume that it will be affordable or cover the drugs you need next year," Ms. Beebe said. "You should go back to the drawing board to determine whether your current plan or another one would best meet your needs."

Congress defined a standard benefit, which includes a significant gap in coverage, also known as a doughnut hole. Medicare officials encouraged insurers to help close the gap in 2007, and many companies responded. For premiums ranging typically from $40 to $50 a month, beneficiaries can enroll in plans that provide extra benefits, including coverage in the gap for generic and sometimes for brand-name drugs.

While many companies are in the market, enrollment is concentrated in drug plans offered by just a handful of companies. Two companies, UnitedHealth and Humana, attracted almost half of the people in prescription drug plans this year, but that could change.

Humana, which offered the lowest premiums in many states this year, is raising some of its charges in 2007, and other companies have cut their premiums to compete more effectively.

To illustrate the need for caution in the marketplace, Ms. Beebe pointed to changes in the most comprehensive plan offered by Humana. In New York, the premium for this plan, known as Humana Complete, will be $82.10 a month in 2007, up from $47.93 this year. But the plan, which covers both generic and brand-name drugs in the gap this year, will cover only generic products in the gap next year, according to data provided by the government and the company.

Thomas T. Noland Jr., a spokesman for Humana, said other companies were lowering their premiums "in response to our leadership."

Even though UnitedHealth often charged higher premiums than other insurers this year, it won many subscribers because it had a product endorsed by AARP, the lobby for older Americans. UnitedHealth offered one drug plan under the AARP name this year, but in 2007, it will offer three, including a so-called saver plan priced below the cheapest Humana plan in several states.

CHARGING $4,200 a dose for a new version of an old cancer drug has helped make Dr. Patrick Soon-Shiong a billionaire.

The drug, Abraxane, does not help patients live longer than the older treatment, though it does shrink tumors in more patients, according to clinical trials. And the old and new medicines have similar side effects. An independent review of Abraxane published in December in a cancer research journal concluded that the drug was "old wine in a new bottle."

Still, Dr. Soon-Shiong's company, Abraxis BioScience, has promoted Abraxane as a major advance in treating late-stage breast cancer — that is, for patients who have not responded to other treatments and are now close to death — and is seeking approval for patients to use it earlier in their treatment. And, in at least one way, Abraxane is a breakthrough: it costs about 25 times as much as a generic version of the older medicine, which is best known by its brand name, Taxol.

Because of the odd economics of the cancer drug market, though, Abraxane's price does not seem to be hurting its popularity.

About 20,000 people have now been treated with the drug, and Dr. Soon-Shiong expects its sales to approach $200 million this year. By 2010, Abraxane's annual sales could reach $1 billion, analysts say.

Those rosy forecasts illustrate the pricing power that makers of cancer drugs wield. With patients often facing grim prognoses and desperate for new therapies, and insurers relatively powerless to negotiate prices or deny coverage, the cost of treatments seems to have little impact on demand.

The rise in cancer-drug prices is a microcosm of broader trends pushing up health care costs nationally. Despite decades of efforts by governments and insurers to restrain costs, patients continue to want the newest — and most expensive — drugs and medical devices. And doctors and the health care industry have little reason to keep costs in check, because insurers rarely deny coverage for new treatments on the basis of price.

As a result, health care costs continue to skyrocket. On Tuesday, the Kaiser Family Foundation reported that the cost of employee health insurance coverage rose 8 percent, according to a survey conducted from January to May this year. Businesses now spend about $8,500 a year for health insurance for the average family, the foundation said, with employees adding $3,000, not counting the cost of deductibles and other out-of-pocket payments.

Abraxane, and cancer drugs generally, are still a tiny part of total medical spending. But their costs are rising even faster than overall health care inflation. Worldwide, spending on cancer drugs is expected to more than double from 2004 to 2009, to $55 billion, with most of that in the United States.

LARGELY as a result of investor enthusiasm for Abraxane, the stock market value of Abraxis is $4.6 billion.The company, which also makes several generic drugs used in hospitals, had a profit of $86 million last year on sales of $519 million. Dr. Soon-Shiong, the company's chairman, owns 84 percent of the stock, worth about $3.8 billion.

Dr. Soon-Shiong, a Los Angeles surgeon with a controversial history in the drug industry, says Abraxane's price is justified because it causes fewer allergic reactions than Taxol, whose chemical name is paclitaxel. And his company is spending large sums on clinical trials to test Abraxane in new categories of cancer patients, he said.

"We have a breakthrough," he said. "Look at the data."

Dr. Soon-Shiong also noted that although Abraxane has not been proved to prolong survival, it does appear to cause tumors to shrink more often than does Taxol. In the clinical trial that led to Abraxane's approval, about 24 percent of patients showed some response to Abraxane, compared with 11 percent for Taxol.

Independent oncologists agree that reducing the risk of allergic reactions is an advantage — and perhaps reason enough for doctors to choose Abraxane, costs aside. Still, in clinical trials, Abraxane's overall side-effect profile was similar to that of paclitaxel, which was approved as a chemotherapy treatment in 1992 and is still widely used. Both Abraxane and Taxol can kill white blood cells, leaving patients open to infection, as well as damage nerves in the hands and feet. Taxol causes more damage to white blood cells, while Abraxane causes more nerve damage.

Drug industry experts say Abraxane's price reflects the fact that makers of cancer drugs can charge high prices for new medicines even if they are only marginally better than their older counterparts. That pricing dynamic is enabled by insurance, which shields patients from the full price of drugs. Without pressure from their insurers, patients have little reason to choose older treatments over expensive new therapies.

Doctors, who ultimately decide what drugs to prescribe, also do not have to worry about paying for the treatments they choose.

"When I'm with a patient, my job is to be a patient advocate, not to try to save society money on chemotherapy," said Dr. Barbara L. McAneny, the chief executive of New Mexico Oncology/Hematology Consultants, in Albuquerque.

The Food and Drug Administration, meanwhile, does not regulate drug prices but considers only whether new medicines are safe and effective. Medicare, which pays for Abraxane, is also forbidden by law from considering cost in deciding what treatments to cover.

While insurers have tried to save money in other drug categories by encouraging patients to use cheaper generic drugs, they face public pressure not to restrict access to new cancer treatments. At least since 1971, when President Richard M. Nixon declared a "war on cancer" and vowed to eliminate it, cancer has been viewed as a uniquely frightening disease that deserves the highest priority for research and treatment.

At the same time, most cancer drugs cannot be easily substituted for one another, preventing insurers from playing one drug maker against a rival to achieve lower prices. Abraxis, despite having a close generic competitor for its drug, appears to be benefiting from the insurance industry's acquired habit of paying for whatever the cancer doctor prescribes.

"Everyone is well aware that prices keep going up," said Dr. Steven B. Miller, the chief medical officer at CuraScript, a division of Express Scripts, which helps companies manage their drug insurance plans. But employers are reluctant to tell Express Scripts to refuse to pay for costly new cancer drugs, Dr. Miller said.

"Do you want your employees calling and saying, 'You're denying my family the latest cancer care?' " Dr. Miller said. "Until the payor community" — that is, companies that provide health insurance — "develops the appetite to be more aggressive, it would be irresponsible for us to press them on it," he added.

But Dr. John C. Hornberger, a senior research associate at the Sphere Institute, a nonprofit health and public policy group in Burlingame, Calif., says employers are wary of interfering in medical decision-making by their employees. "They want to control costs," he said, "but they don't want to be involved."

Carol Austin-Fink, who learned last year that she had cancer in her right breast, insisted on taking Abraxane after she received the diagnosis because the chemotherapy she received in 1996 for a different cancer in her left breast had caused severe side effects. The earlier treatment did not include Taxol, so she had no idea whether Taxol would cause problems for her, but she did not want to take the chance.

Ms. Austin-Fink, a 59-year-old writer who lives in Las Vegas, said she received six doses of Abraxane over four months, a standard course of treatment. The cost of the drug did not concern her because she has excellent insurance coverage, she said.

"My insurance company just paid it, because my doctors said they needed it, and the insurance company doesn't argue with stuff like that," Ms. Austin-Fink said.

The Abraxane had few side effects and caused her tumor to shrink almost immediately. Her cancer has remained under control since her final treatment a year ago, she said. She said she believes that Abraxane worked better for her than Taxol would have, though she acknowledged that she could not be sure.

Drug companies have sharply increased prices for new cancer drugs in the last decade. Since 1998, for example, Celgene, a biotechnology company based in Summit, N.J., has raised the price of Thalomid, a drug for a cancer called multiple myeloma, to more than $35,000 a year from $4,000.

Celgene is not alone. New treatments now routinely cost several thousand dollars a month. Worldwide spending on cancer medicines, which was $24 billion in 2004, is expected to rise to $55 billion in 2009, making oncology treatments the biggest drug category, according to IMS Health, which provides data on drug sales.

The higher prices are beginning to strain the system, said Carolina Hinestrosa, executive vice president at the National Breast Cancer Coalition, an advocacy group.

Even if they have insurance, many patients face co-payments of 20 percent for their cancer drugs, an expense that can become ruinous for patients receiving combination therapy with several new drugs. For example, Abraxane is being tested along with Avastin, a treatment from Genentech that costs $8,000 a month for some patients.

Drug costs are rising so fast that some patients cannot afford the newest treatments, and access to some therapies "is beginning to be eroded," Ms. Hinestrosa said.

ORIGINALLY, Taxol itself was considered expensive. When the F.D.A. approved it in December 1992, its price of $986 a dose led to Congressional hearings. Since 2000, when Bristol-Myers Squibb's patent on Taxol expired, the drug has been available both as nonbranded generic paclitaxel and as branded Taxol, at a cost of about $150 a dose for the generic and $1,000 for the branded version, which is now sold mostly outside the United States.

These days, though, high prices rarely draw public protests, in part because most patients are still receiving their medicines. That is accomplished through a mix of insurance coverage and programs sponsored by charities and drug makers, including Abraxis, that provide free supplies to the indigent.

"There isn't an effort in terms of public policy to keep prices under control," Ms. Hinestrosa said.

Megan Murphy, an analyst at Lazard Capital Markets who follows Abraxis, agrees. While doctors and patients have begun to complain, drug makers still have substantial pricing power, she said. "At some point, something will change here," she said. "But there doesn't seem to be any real resistance right now."

Dr. Soon-Shiong said in an interview that he, too, worried about the cost of cancer treatment. But Abraxane is fairly priced, he said, because it is based on a scientific breakthrough that the company refers to as "nanoparticle technology."

This is not the first time that Dr. Soon-Shiong has aggressively promoted a new disease treatment. In the mid-1990's, he won attention for transplanting pancreatic cells into two diabetic patients. Eventually, the transplants failed.

At about the same time that Dr. Soon-Shiong was researching both diabetes treatments and Abraxane, he created a company called American Pharmaceutical Partners to market generic drugs to hospitals. American Pharmaceutical generated controversy by giving stock options to executives at a company responsible for buying drugs on behalf of hospitals nationwide. Some doctors said the stock options created a serious conflict of interest by giving the executives — who were supposed to represent the hospitals — a financial interest in American Pharmaceutical's success. American Pharmaceutical denied any wrongdoing and said all the arrangements were properly disclosed.

Dr. Soon-Shiong created Abraxis BioScience earlier this year by merging American Pharmaceutical Partners with another company he controlled, American BioScience. Shareholders in American Pharmaceutical Partners have sued him over the merger, contending that it benefited him at their expense. Dr. Soon-Shiong says that he has done nothing wrong and that the lawsuits are irrelevant to Abraxane's promise.

ABRAXANE is a reformulated version of paclitaxel, a chemical found in the Pacific yew tree that destroys cancer cells. But paclitaxel, which is given intravenously, is difficult to use. Because it does not dissolve in water, the drug must be mixed in Cremophor, a combination of castor oil and alcohol that can cause severe allergic reactions. To reduce that risk, patients who receive Cremophor first receive a steroid and an antihistamine.

Working with University of Illinois researchers in the 1990's, Dr. Soon-Shiong found a way to give Taxol without Cremophor by coating paclitaxel in fragments of albumin, a protein found in human blood. He named the new treatment Abraxane.

Abraxane patients do not need antihistamines or steroids. The drug can also be given at slightly higher doses and injected more quickly than traditional paclitaxel, which requires a three hour-infusion.

A third drug, called Taxotere, works similarly to paclitaxel but is a different chemical compound; it competes with both Abraxane and Taxol. Made by Sanofi-Aventis, Taxotere costs $2,500 a dose. It increases survival slightly in breast cancer patients, compared with Taxol. But because Taxotere has even more severe side effects, many patients and doctors prefer Taxol. Both drugs are widely used. There is no published data comparing Abraxane and Taxotere.

In the largest clinical trial comparing Abraxane and Taxol, covering 454 patients, the two drugs produced similar side effects — although Taxol caused more patients to have low white blood cell counts.

The trial also showed that Abraxane delayed the growth of tumors for 23 weeks in the average patient, compared with 17 weeks for Taxol. That difference was statistically significant, meaning that it probably did not occur by chance. But the trial did not show that Abraxane extended patients' lives longer than Taxol did, and that is the most important measure of effectiveness. After two years, roughly 75 percent of patients in the study had died, whether they received Abraxane or Taxol.

Over all, Abraxane may be slightly more effective than Taxol, and the lack of Cremophor is an advantage, said Dr. Andrew D. Seidman, a breast cancer specialist at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in Manhattan who has studied Taxol and Taxotere since the early 1990's. But the two drugs are similar, he said. "Is this a breakthrough in terms of the notion that this is a new class of drug with a new mechanism of action?" he asked rhetorically. "No."

Dr. Ramaswamy Govindan, a Washington University professor who was co-author of a December article in the Annals of Oncology about Abraxane and other, as-yet- unapproved Cremophor-free versions of Taxol, said that none of the new drugs had shown significant advantages over the older medicine.

"In general, the novel formulations so far have not stood out as distinctly superior," Dr. Govindan said.

The F.D.A. approved Abraxane as a last-ditch treatment for late-stage breast cancer in January 2005. Now Abraxis is asking the F.D.A. to allow the use of Abraxane as a treatment for early-stage breast cancer, a larger market than that for late-stage treatments. In an unusual move, the company asked the agency earlier this year to waive its typical requirement that the drug be tested in those patients before allowing the expanded use.

On Sept. 7, the F.D.A. convened a panel of experts in Silver Spring, Md., to discuss Abraxis's request.

Committee members voted against the company's proposal 13 to 1, saying that Abraxis needed more data. The company expects to begin discussions soon with the F.D.A. about designing a clinical trial to test Abraxane in early-stage patients.

At the Sept. 7 hearing, though, Dr. Michael Hawkins, Abraxis's top medical officer, made a remarkable observation about how the company's $4,200-a-dose drug compared with $150 generic paclitaxel.

Dr. Hawkins said the F.D.A. should approve Abraxane in early-stage patients without a clinical trial because such testing would probably not prove that his company's drug was different than the conventional treatment. "These are just two forms of paclitaxel," he said.

Arizonan To Head Transport Dept (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

Senate confirms Bush nominee Mary Peters, 57

WASHINGTON — The Senate early Saturday confirmed President Bush's nomination of Mary Peters, Arizona's former Department of Transportation director, as the new secretary of transportation.

Peters, a former federal highway administrator, succeeds Norman Mineta, a Democrat who resigned in July after six years in office.

In a statement issued by the White House, Bush said Peters is "an innovative thinker who will work with state and local leaders to confront challenges and solve problems."

Peters, 57, who spent most of her career in government highway jobs, is a strong advocate of privatizing roads. But highways are only a part of the Transportation Department's portfolio. The 60,000-person department also regulates aviation, railroads, pipelines, transit and motor carriers.

Her biggest challenges will be reducing highway, airport and seaport congestion. The administration in May announced a strategy to reduce highway congestion. It calls for selecting up to five interstate corridors for long-term investment.

Peters spent three years as head of the Arizona Department of Transportation and 3 1/2 years as head of the Federal Highway Administration.

Since November, she has been national director for transportation policy and consulting in the Phoenix office of HDR, an architectural and engineering firm.

A fourth-generation Arizonan, she holds a bachelor's degree from the University of Phoenix and attended Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government program for state and local government executives.

Last November, Peters dropped her bid to challenge Democratic Gov. Janet Napolitano after questions were raised about Peters' eligibility.

The Arizona Constitution requires candidates to have been Arizona citizens five years before the election, but Peters lived in Virginia and registered to vote there during Bush's first term.

Peters said she believed she was eligible to run, but was stepping aside because the issue would have been a distraction in the race.

Justices To Hear Abortion, Integration Cases (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

'Partial-Birth' Procedure and Schools' Race Policies to Dominate Court's Agenda

Abortion and race dominate the Supreme Court's agenda for the term that begins tomorrow, with the Bush administration and its conservative allies urging the justices to put limits on abortion rights and affirmative action.

Conservatives want the court to uphold a 2003 federal law banning the procedure opponents call "partial-birth" abortion, and to strike down local integration policies that distribute students by race. They are asking the court not only to rule in their favor, but to limit -- or, possibly, overrule -- recent constitutional decisions that have drawn heavy fire from the right.

The conservative push on social issues is just what Democrats and liberals, concerned about the future of Roe v. Wade , the 1973 case that recognized a right to abortion, warned against during confirmation hearings for the two Bush appointees now on the court -- Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

In response, Roberts and Alito pledged to take due account of stare decisis , the rule that says the court should avoid overruling past decisions.

So this term will be closely watched not only for the results the court reaches, but for how it reaches them.

"They don't want to make it look as if the only reason for change is that there are different people here," said Michael J. Gerhardt, a professor of law at the University of North Carolina. "They'll want to make it clear that principles and not politics dictated the outcome."

When the court takes up the federal abortion law, it will be considering a statute that was passed by a large majority in Congress and signed by Bush in 2003 -- and then struck down by every lower federal court that has considered it.

The lower courts ruled that the law is incompatible with a 5 to 4 ruling by the Supreme Court in 2000 that held that a similar state law, from Nebraska, was unconstitutional.

In that case, known as Stenberg v. Carhart , the court said the statute could be read to prohibit other procedures and lacked an exception to protect a mother's health, creating an "undue burden" on the right to abortion first recognized in Roe.

The Republican-controlled Congress included an exception to save a mother's life. It did not permit any other exception, however, based on its finding that none could be medically justified.

If the court wants to uphold the federal law without overruling a precedent that is only six years old, it could say that it is bound by Congress's factual findings, which distinguish the federal law from the Nebraska one.

DOJ_NMG_0072546

That is the course urged by the Bush administration in its brief, which speaks of "the long-standing principle that Congress is better equipped than courts to make factual findings that inform the constitutionality of federal statutes."

But, the administration brief continues, to "the extent that the Court concludes that Stenberg compels the conclusion that the Act is facially invalid . . . Stenberg should be overruled."

In a brief on behalf of several doctors challenging the ban, the Center for Reproductive Rights told the court that it owes Congress no deference on issues of medical practice, and that the administration's suggestion that Stenberg may be overruled "demonstrates an inadequate regard for the societal values held safe by the principles of stare decisis ."

The decision to rule on "partial birth" abortion despite the absence of disagreement among lower courts was expected: The court usually reviews lower-court decisions holding federal laws unconstitutional.

Taking up race-conscious public school assignments was a surprise, however. The justices had turned down a similar case a few months earlier, when Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the court.

O'Connor wrote the court's opinion in a 5 to 4 case upholding race-conscious admissions in higher education.

But after Alito replaced her, the court spent almost two months discussing the public school issue before deciding in June to hear it.

At issue are voluntary school integration plans in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky.

In Seattle, where authorities seek to overcome what they say are segregated housing patterns, students can choose to attend any high school in the city, but some are oversubscribed.

To determine who gets in, officials deny admission to new students whose race would tip an oversubscribed school's population more than 15 percentage points outside a 60-40 nonwhite-white balance.

In Louisville, which was under court order to desegregate until 2000, the policy applies from first grade through high school and aims to prevent any school from falling below 15 percent black or exceeding 50 percent black.

In both cities, white parents whose children were not allowed into the schools of their choice sued, alleging that the policies were unconstitutional.

Lower courts ruled in favor of the schools, citing O'Connor's 2003 opinion, which said that diversity could be a strong enough government interest to warrant the use of race as a factor in allocating places in the University of Michigan's law school.

Several conservative legal organizations are urging the court in friend-of-the-court briefs to use the Seattle and Louisville cases to overrule the three-year-old Michigan decision.

But in their briefs, the white parents and the Bush administration, which supports them, do not urge overruling the Michigan case -- which caused deep internal divisions over affirmative action within the administration.

Instead, they tell the court that the public school plans are different because they are not true efforts at diversity but, as the administration brief puts it, "outright racial balancing," which the court has disapproved in other cases.

Where The Rubber Meets Roe (WP)

By William Saletan

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

The issue that never changes is finally changing.

If you're among the millions of Americans who don't like the idea of abortion but also don't like the idea of banning it, good news is on the way. In the past several weeks, two bills have been filed in the House. Without banning a single procedure, they aim to significantly lower the rate of abortions performed in this country. Voluntary reduction, not criminalization or moral silence, is the new approach.

How do you stop abortions without restricting them? One way is to persuade women to complete their pregnancies instead of terminating them. The other is to prevent unintended pregnancies in the first place. And there's the rub -- or, in this case, the rubber. The two House bills used to be one proposal, backed by an alliance of antiabortion lawmakers and organizations. The alliance split because one faction wanted to fund contraception and the other didn't.

In short, the good news is that we no longer have to fight about abortion. The bad news is that we're now fighting about contraception. The old question was abortion as birth control. The new question is abortion or birth control. To lower the abortion rate, we need more contraception. And that means confronting politicians who stand in the way.

In the past two years, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton , NARAL Pro-Choice America and many House Democrats who support abortion rights have conceded that abortion is tragic and that its frequency must be reduced. Third Way , a progressive think tank, has pushed hard in this direction.

Meanwhile, Democrats for Life of America , which has eight members of Congress on its advisory board and works with 30 others, has devised a plan to reduce the abortion rate by 95 percent " by helping and supporting pregnant women ." Rep. Timothy J. Ryan (D-Ohio) was set to lead the charge.

Then Ryan looked at the data and realized that to get anywhere near that target, he and his colleagues would have to provide more birth control. That's when the squirming began.

Some of Ryan's antiabortion allies worried that "morning-after" pills might prevent embryos from implanting, so he omitted such pills from his bill. They opposed requiring private insurers to cover contraception, so he took that out, too. They complained that other pregnancy-prevention bills hadn't emphasized abortion reduction, so he put abortion reduction in the title. They wanted sex education programs to emphasize abstinence; they got it. The only troublesome thing left in the bill was birth control.

It broke the deal. Democrats for Life abandoned Ryan and began a contraceptive-free alternative. With them went Americans United for Life, the National Association of Evangelicals and 13 House Democrats, led by Rep. James L. Oberstar (Minn.), the Democratic co-chairman of the congressional Pro-Life Caucus. Ryan added his name to their bill, but they refused to add their names to his. Focus on the Family, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Rush Limbaugh and Rep. Christopher H. Smith (N.J.), the Republican co-chairman of the Pro-Life Caucus, excoriated Ryan's bill. The Catholic Diocese of Youngstown, based in Ryan's district, asked him to withdraw it.

The objectors make several arguments. They point out that birth control pills, like morning-after pills, can block implantation of an embryo. But there's no evidence that this has ever happened. The chance is theoretical, and breastfeeding poses the same chance, so you'd have to stamp that out, too. Critics also note that many birth control methods can fail. That's true, but it's an argument for using two methods, not zero.

Third, they protest that federal family planning money supports Planned Parenthood, which performs abortions. But only 14 percent of this money goes to the organization, and fewer than 9 percent of Planned Parenthood clients go there to have an abortion.

Above all, the critics insist that contraception will backfire. As the Youngstown diocese puts it, "Promotion of contraception leads to more extra-marital sexual intercourse, which leads to more unwanted pregnancies, which leads to more abortions."

The belief that you're protected does make it easier to say yes. But denying that contraceptives reduce your risk of pregnancy is as crazy as denying that an umbrella reduces your risk of getting wet.

Does the increased risk from more sex outweigh the decreased risk from more protection? Do the math. On average, contraception lowers the odds of pregnancy by a factor of seven. If you're capable of having seven times as much sex, congratulations. The rest of us will get pregnant less often, not more.

And that's what the data show. Ryan's bill targets women with family incomes below 200 percent of the poverty line, since they have higher rates of unintended pregnancy and more difficulty finding or affording contraception. Among these women, the percentage using contraception declined from 1995 to 2002. As predicted by contraception opponents, the rate of sexual activity also declined, though only slightly. Even better, from an antiabortion standpoint, when these women got pregnant unintentionally, the percentage who chose abortion fell.

Less contraception, less sex, more women choosing life. So, the abortion rate among these women went down, right? Wrong. The decline in contraception overwhelmed the decline in sexual activity, resulting in a higher rate of unintended pregnancy. And the increase in unintended pregnancy overwhelmed the increase in women choosing to have the baby, resulting in more abortions. From an antiabortion standpoint, trading contraception for "choosing life" was a net loss.

That's why Ryan insists on birth control. He's tired of pious slogans and symbolic bills crafted to save more congressional seats than babies. He has had enough of the debate between life and choice. He wants a new abortion debate. "You're either for reducing the number, or you're not," he says. He has made his decision. Now make yours.

Along With Victories, G.O.P. Takes A Few Blows (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Kate Zernike

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — Just hours before Congress closed down for the midterm elections on Saturday, Republican leaders threw together a ceremony to celebrate the passage of what they hoped to promote as their singular legislative accomplishment — a bill to bring terrorism suspects to trial.

But after House and Senate leaders formally signed the measure for the cameras, the only questions they faced from assembled reporters pertained to Representative Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who had just resigned after accusations that he sent sexually explicit Internet messages to teenage pages.

“None of us are very happy about it,” Speaker J. Dennis Hastert said before abruptly calling a halt to the questions, and the ceremony.

No doubt.

DOJ_NMG_0072548

Republicans scored significant legislative victories in the closing hours. They pushed through the bill for detainee trials after weeks of internal squabbling, won approval for 700 miles of border fencing to show they are serious about cracking down on illegal immigration, passed spending bills for defense and domestic security, and enacted new port security initiatives.

But the finale hardly went according to script for Republicans as they headed out to try to hold off Democrats determined to win a majority.

The highly publicized case of Mr. Foley, who served in the House leadership as a deputy whip, threatened to build into an institutional scandal as House leaders acknowledged that they had known about the messages for nearly a year, but had relied on Mr. Foley's word that nothing inappropriate had occurred.

But that was not all. Republicans were unable to win final approval of a bill to regulate domestic wiretapping, which Democrats feared would become a political weapon more potent than the bill governing terrorism suspects. The disclosure of a National Intelligence Estimate saying the war in Iraq was fueling terrorism called attention to the issue Democrats most want to campaign on — discontent with the administration's handling of the war. A new book by Bob Woodward did the same, claiming that the administration had ignored high-level warnings that it would need more troops.

And Republicans wrapped up the way they started the year, with new revelations about Jack Abramoff, the disgraced lobbyist whose guilty plea on Jan. 3 roiled the party and set off the events that led to the resignation of Representative Tom DeLay, a powerful party force.

"It was not a graceful exit," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, as events swirled on Friday.

Republicans were clearly rocked by the Foley episode. It gave Democrats, who need 15 seats to gain a majority, a new opening to pick up a seat in a Republican-leaning district. Florida Republicans were to meet to choose a replacement for Mr. Foley, but his name will remain on the ballot against a well-financed opponent.

Setting aside the late drama, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, was satisfied.

"Legislatively speaking, I feel pretty good," Mr. Boehner said in an interview on Friday night. He said Republicans had delivered most of what they hoped to with a series of security-related bills.

But what Republicans had at the outset dubbed Security September, Democrats declared a fizzle.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, ticked off a day-by-day list of damaging news about Iraq in the last week. "America must succeed in Iraq, and we need to win the war on terror," Mr. Reid said. "But this president and this Republican Congress are the wrong people for the job, obviously, based on their record."

Told that Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the Republican leader, had outlined "quite a long list" of his party's successes, Mr. Reid interrupted: "A long list?" he asked, incredulous, then stood back and said, "Hmmm."

"I mean, can you imagine these fiscal conservatives are burying this country in red ink?" he said, finally. "This fiscally conservative Congress — we don't even have a budget."

To some veteran Democrats, the events of recent weeks seemed familiar, reminding them of how things spiraled out of control for their own party in 1994, when they lost the majority they had held for 40 years.

"It's not exactly like 1994, but it reminds me of 1994," said Representative Edward J. Markey, Democrat of Massachusetts, who remembered a series of political mistakes that seemed to cascade. "Every day you would wake up and say, 'What is going on here?' "

Republicans had hoped Mr. Abramoff would fade into the background and deny Democrats their "culture of corruption" sound bite in the final weeks of the campaign. But the Government Reform Committee issued a report detailing his apparent contacts with top White House officials, allowing Democrats to remind voters that the Republican-led Congress had failed to enact lobbying reform despite the scandal, leaving a pledge unfulfilled.

Representative Tom Davis, the Virginia Republican who leads the committee, said the White House was irked over the report but made no apologies. "This White House doesn't want any oversight at all," Mr. Davis said. "It's my job."

Mr. Foley, a six-term congressman who was a high-profile Capitol figure for years, had the potential to become a major liability. Late Friday, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, called for an investigation into what the leadership knew, and when.

Republicans denounced her from the floor, grumbling when she introduced herself as a mother and a grandmother. But they were careful with her potentially explosive request and quickly referred it to the ethics committee.

Despite their troubles, many Republican leaders believe tumbling gas prices could be their salvation. But even that benefit has drawbacks. Many Americans tell pollsters they believe that the drop was politically orchestrated to help Republicans in the election.

Still, Republicans denounced Democratic efforts to paint them as do-nothings and enumerated accomplishments: the approval of two Supreme Court justices, tax cuts, a pension bill, a highway bill, an energy bill, an overhaul of bankruptcy and class action laws, and the last-minute flurry of security legislation.

"We've gotten things done," said Mr. Frist, who will leave the Senate at the end of the year.

But some legislative promises were left incomplete, including tax extensions sought by business, an offshore oil drilling bill, the broad immigration bill sought by the president and many lower profile issues.

And in their most basic function, lawmakers fell far short. They were forced to pass a stopgap measure to keep most of the government operating at current spending levels until Nov. 17 because they did not enact individual spending bills for nearly every federal agency.

Congress Adjourns, Leaving Much Work Undone (BOS/AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

Incumbents are preoccupied with getting reelected

WASHINGTON -- Lawmakers were off to the campaign trail after the Republicans, in danger of losing their control of Congress, sought to play to their strength by pushing through a series of security-related bills.

In a flurry of activity before their departure early yesterday morning, the Senate gave final approval to $448 billion for the Pentagon, including $70 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Senate also joined the House in approving construction of a 700-mile fence along the US-Mexican border.

Congress also sent to the president legislation to ease the threat of terrorist attack using the 11 million shipping containers entering the nation's 361 ports every year.

And legislation to convene military trials to prosecute suspected terrorists cleared its final hurdle in the House.

Much work was left undone when Congress adjourned, after a legislative year that has been marked by sharp partisanship and the failure of Congress to agree on major lobbying reform and immigration legislation.

The action on the security bills gives Republicans at least one major selling point as they try to persuade voters to keep them in power.

Senate majority leader Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee, said that in the weeks before the election Republicans must emphasize that they are the better party to fight the war on terrorism.

``We're going to have to get the message out and we have to get it out aggressively over the next 41 days to do well, but I believe we can," Frist said

Members of Congress will return after the Nov. 7 election for a lame - duck session during which they will have to pass bills dealing with domestic spending for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

So far, the only spending bills completed are the defense bill and a $35 billion bill for homeland security that contains $1.2 billion to begin construction of fences and other barriers along the US-Mexican border, plus money for jails to detain illegal immigrants and hire 1,500 more border agents.

Legislation validating President Bush's warrantless wiretapping program will have to wait for a postelection session colored by the November results. So will a bill to open the Outer Continental Shelf to oil and gas rigs.

Included in the defense budget: stopgap spending to keep agencies open through Nov. 17 if their funding bills haven't passed. Those include measures funding veterans' health care, education, health research, anticrime programs, among many others.

The final act of the Senate was approval of a companion defense bill including a 2.2 percent military pay raise, and setting policy on weapons spending and research programs considered vital to national security. The House passed the bill Friday by a bipartisan 398-to-23 vote.

The defense authorization bill was held up by Senator Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, because House-Senate negotiators dropped a Coburn-sponsored provision to analyze the costs effects of lawmakers' pet projects, called ``earmarks," on Pentagon operations. Coburn agreed to let the legislation go to a voice vote after he received a promise that his provision will be taken up when Congress returns in November. ``The American people ought to be seeing where we are spending their money," he said.

The 700-mile border fence is considered the single significant accomplishment of what had been an ambitious GOP agenda on immigration. No compromise could be found between Senate Republicans favoring a comprehensive bill including a plan to give illegal immigrants already in the United States an eventual chance at citizenship and House conservatives favoring an enforcement-only bill.

Many of the biggest legislative failures were Republican priorities that toppled when Republicans split into factions. One involved whether to divert some Social Security taxes into private retirement accounts. Bush proposed several major government overhauls in his 2005 State of the Union address -- Social Security, medical malpractice, and tax laws -- but none succeeded.

The Senate voted against taking up a House-passed bill that would criminalize the transporting of minors across state lines to obtain an abortion and avoid parental notification laws in the girl's home state.

Senators from New York and New Jersey blocked Senate action on a bill authorizing $2.1 billion for victims of HIV/AIDS because they said it would shift aid from urban to rural areas.

House and Senate negotiators could not reach agreement on a measure to expand offshore oil drilling. The Senate version would have opened more than 8 million acres in Gulf of Mexico to lease, but House leaders said that didn't go far enough. They favored opening up areas off the coasts of Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and Alaska as well.

Also left undone was approval of new ethics measures intended to respond to a string of scandals in Congress.

Congress' Accomplishments Fell Short Of GOP's Ambitions (LAT)

By Janet Hook And Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

With no gay-marriage ban or Social Security overhaul, the party's achievement gap could dog campaigns.

WASHINGTON — As Congress recessed early Saturday for the homestretch of a bruising midterm campaign, Republicans left town with a record of accomplishment that paled in comparison to the grand ambitions they laid out following their 2004 election triumphs.

It remains uncertain whether the gap between what the GOP set out to do and what it achieved will haunt its bid to retain control of the House and Senate — elections are decided by many factors beyond legislative scorecards. Still, the tally for the 109th Congress looms as a potential burden for Republican candidates.

During the two-year session, President Bush and his party abandoned or scaled back the groundbreaking initiatives they once promised voters: a remake of Social Security, a federal ban on gay marriage, strict new limits on special-interest political influence, and a broad overhaul of immigration law that would find a place for many illegal immigrants already in the country.

And, instead of returning home on the high note they expected after passing a key national security measure last week, spirits among GOP lawmakers clearly were soured by a new scandal: the sudden resignation of Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) amid revelations of sexually explicit communications he had with teenage male former House pages.

Questions about whether House Republican leaders knew of Foley's improper advances months ago and failed to act seem a likely distraction for the party and its message in the short term. And as November's vote nears, Democrats can be counted on to eagerly portray Congress as dysfunctional in general.

"This is the do-less-than-the-do-nothing Congress," House Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said recently, drawing from President Truman's famed attack on Republicans in 1948.

Nonpartisan analysts also have been critical of Congress. Thomas Mann and Norman Ornstein — two think-tank scholars who have written a book about the workings of Capitol Hill titled "The Broken Branch" — calculate that lawmakers have set a modern record for brevity by sitting in session fewer than 100 days this year.

Given lawmakers' penchant for three-day workweeks, Ornstein and Mann like to quote comedian Mark Russell's line about what members of Congress tell their colleagues every Wednesday: "Have a nice weekend."

Republicans fiercely dispute the do-nothing label, pointing to several key accomplishments. Last week, these included enactment of a new system for prosecuting suspected foreign terrorists and authorization of a 700-mile fence along the Mexico border.

Last year, Congress approved a tightening of bankruptcy law, new limits on class-action lawsuits and a major energy bill — all long sought by the business community.

"Anyone who has worked in this town for a while would have to acknowledge that [those bills] represent an incredible year of legislative accomplishments," said Bruce Josten, a veteran lobbyist for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Earlier this year, Congress also completed a major overhaul of the nation's ailing pension system.

Republicans blame Democratic obstructionism for the party's failure to complete more of its agenda, including new cuts in the estate tax (the death levy, as the GOP terms it).

But many measures — most prominently Bush's initiatives on Social Security and immigration — have foundered on divisions among Republicans.

The GOP's vaunted party discipline broke down in part because of Bush's dwindling clout as a president prosecuting an unpopular war. Also, unity has been strained by pervasive anxiety that the party will lose control of the House or Senate in the midterm election.

"This is a big-deal election," said David Winston, a Republican pollster. "The overall tension is really high."

Most Republicans are heartened by what they see as a campaign trail that appears less perilous than it did a month ago.

DOJ_NMG_0072551

With political winds blowing strongly against them in the summer, Republicans returned to Washington in early September determined to press their main political advantage — the greater trust that polls show voters have in them to deal with terrorism, compared with Democrats.

A priority was to clear the measure establishing new rules for trying terrorism suspects before military tribunals. Another was to give the White House explicit authority to conduct a warrantless wiretapping program that Bush secretly instituted after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Congress was unable to finish work on the surveillance bill. But final approval Friday of the tribunal bill set the stage for a signing ceremony at the White House that could keep the spotlight on the broader war on terrorism rather than the unpopular war in Iraq.

Many GOP strategists also anticipate that the party's fortunes will be boosted if the price of gasoline continues to drop.

But Republicans remain spooked by low approval ratings that polls find for Congress and their party. A recent Pew survey, for instance, found that 38% said this Congress accomplished less than its predecessor. And by 50% to 39%, poll respondents said they were likely to support a Democrat rather than a Republican in congressional elections.

GOP lawmakers have sought to put the best possible face on their record. "Given the unprecedented — and increasing — frequency of obstruction and political gamesmanship … we've accomplished more than might be expected," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said last week.

Gone from their rhetoric, however, is the list of ambitious goals Bush and other Republicans unveiled after the 2004 elections gave the president a second term and the GOP a wider margin of control in the House and Senate.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) set the tone when he said in his first speech of 2005, "In this Congress, big plans will stir men's blood."

His associates saw a historic opportunity to advance their agendas. "My fellow conservatives, we have waited our entire lives for the chance the American people have given us," then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) said shortly after the 2004 results. Now DeLay is in private life, driven from office by corruption charges.

As the Republicans focused on national security matters in September, Congress left unfinished several policy initiatives, including some that had seemed close to passage.

A bill to expand offshore oil drilling in the Gulf of Mexico stalled. Action to stave off a scheduled cut in Medicare doctor fees languished, despite heavy lobbying by the influential American Medical Assn. Grand promises to crack down on lobbying excesses, in the wake of the influence-peddling scandal centered on disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, produced only modest changes in House rules.

The tech industry, meanwhile, is baffled that lawmakers could not manage to extend a popular tax credit for research and development.

"We have clearly had far fewer accomplishments than we have had in previous Congresses," said Ralph Hellmann, a former GOP aide on Capitol Hill who is a lobbyist for the Information Technology Industry Council.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) defended his party against such assessments, saying, "It's always easy for people to look up and say the glass is half-empty. I'm going to say the glass is half-full."

A key question, however, is whether the glass is full enough to satisfy core GOP supporters who had high hopes when Congress convened in early 2005.

The disappointed include some conservative activists who lament the demise of the same-sex marriage ban and the collapse of an 11th-hour effort to place new restrictions on a minor's ability to get an abortion without a parent's consent.

"There's a sense of ennui" among anti-abortion groups, said Mike McMonagle, director of the Pro-Life Political Action Committee of Southeastern Pennsylvania. "The source of the ennui is our lack of realization of certain goals. Elected officials that we supported let us down."

House's Work Stalls Without Its 'Hammer' (HC)

By Bennett Roth And Michelle Mittelstadt

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

DeLay's power to get things done is missed, but the controversy isn't

WASHINGTON — Without Tom DeLay around to keep Republicans in line, the House has been unable to resolve tough issues, from immigration to lobbying reform. It has been criticized by independent experts and Democrats as a "do-nothing" chamber.

DOJ_NMG_0072552

But as they prepared to leave town last week to hit the campaign trail, several Republican lawmakers said they had little nostalgia for the iron-fisted former majority leader from Sugar Land who resigned from Congress under an ethics cloud.

Though praising the Texan's accomplishments, such as his ability to push through legislation, they said that his legal woes and sharp partisanship caused political headaches for fellow GOP members.

The legislators appreciate the more collegial style of Rep. John Boehner, the tanned and telegenic Ohio Republican tapped to replace DeLay as majority leader.

"I feel like the team is more of a team now. It's not Central Command," said Rep. Zach Wamp, R-Tenn., who echoed other Republicans in saying Boehner has been more willing to consult the rank-and-file about legislation and strategy.

Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, part of the House Republican leadership, said that Boehner "reaches across the aisle" to consult with Democrats, an approach the combative DeLay often avoided.

'A lightning rod'While he was in office, DeLay's legal troubles hurt others in his party, said Pryce, a moderate facing a tough re-election battle.

"Tom had become a lightning rod for many of us," she said.

Democrats declared DeLay a poster child for what they said was a culture of corruption in the Republican Party — a theme they hoped would resonate with voters in the November congressional elections. But the issue has not turned out to be major in most campaigns, which Republicans attribute, in part, to DeLay's departure.

DeLay did not return a call seeking comment. DeLay, who left Congress in June after 22 years, announced recently that he signed a book deal to write about his career and how it furthered the conservative cause.

When he permanently relinquished his majority leader's post in January, he warned that the Houston area would suffer because of his diminished clout.

"The majority leader controls what comes to the floor, and the Houston-Galveston area has benefited from that. That changes now," he said. Critics who "never gave me an even shake ought to think about that," he said.

He is awaiting trial in Texas on criminal charges related to campaign finances. Two of his former government staffers, Tony Rudy and Michael Scanlon, have pleaded guilty to corruption charges related to their work with former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who often traveled overseas with DeLay. Abramoff also pleaded guilty this year to corruption charges related to his lobbying activities.

Going beyond leadersBoehner said his goals are to be more inclusive, involving members outside the leadership in making decisions, and to reduce the acrimonious atmosphere in the House between the two parties and factions among Republicans.

"We've had our disagreements, but the temperature on the floor has been a lot lower than it was. I think that helps breed more cooperation among members," he said.

Though some Democrats say they harbor less animosity toward Boehner than DeLay, they also deny that he has been more successful at bridge-building between parties.

"I'm totally unaware that he's in communication with Democrats," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California.

Rep. Barney Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat who had little fondness for DeLay, said Boehner is less powerful — as is to be expected.

"It's not that Boehner is weak, it's just that (unlike DeLay) he's more like every other leader," Frank said.

DeLay, he said, wielded unparalleled control over House Republicans because he could tap lobbying and social conservative allies outside Congress to mobilize conservative grass-roots and campaign cash that could be used as leverage against GOP members wavering on legislation he favored.

But with DeLay's downfall and Abramoff's conviction, DeLay's model has been discredited, he said.

Dick Armey, the former House GOP majority leader from Texas who often feuded with DeLay, offered a crisp comment on how Republicans are faring without DeLay.

"There is no doubt in my mind we are better off" with Boehner, Armey said.

Boehner has spent less time catering to social conservatives, which, according to Armey, has enabled the majority leader to better reach out to moderates in the party, who are more interested in fiscal issues.

Boehner has appealed more to fiscal hawks, Armey said, with his criticism of earmarks, the pet projects often tacked to spending bills at the behest of lobbyists or lawmakers. The House approved a measure forcing lawmakers to disclose their earmarks but did not take up proposals to curb the proliferation of the practice.

Under scrutinySocial conservatives lamenting DeLay's departure still are assessing Boehner.

"The jury is still out" on Boehner's commitment to causes important to religious conservatives, said Tom McClusky, vice president of the socially conservative Family Research Council. As an example of how DeLay courted the social conservatives more than Boehner, McClusky noted that when the House voted on a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriages several years ago, DeLay delivered the closing remarks. But earlier this year when the House again took up the amendment, Boehner delegated that role to someone else.

Some GOP activists bemoan the loss of DeLay, saying his legendary arm-twisting skills are sorely missed. Lawmakers devoted much of September to crafting legislation setting ground rules for putting terror suspects on trial. They eventually reached a compromise between President Bush's demands and those of lawmakers who wanted the guidelines to hew to international agreements. But the debate over tribunals crowded out consideration of other issues before Congress. Lawmakers did not find time to complete action on most of the spending bills for the fiscal year that begins today.

"This is their core responsibility, getting the spending bills done," Norman Ornstein, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, said.

As a result of rifts within the GOP, they also have been unable to reach consensus on a comprehensive immigration overhaul sought by Bush.

Eager to leave Washington to campaign for the upcoming elections, Congress also has failed to enact most of a tough lobbying-reform package promised in the wake of the Abramoff scandal or take on offshore oil drilling and many other promised priorities.

Grover Norquist, a conservative activist, said it is unlikely that DeLay could have been more successful in the current political environment.

In Bush's first term, Norquist said, DeLay could rely on votes by some conservative Democrats to pad a thin Republican majority. But Pelosi, the Democratic leader, has been increasingly successful since DeLay's departure in holding Democrats together to oppose GOP initiatives, forcing Republican leaders to scramble to find support among their sometimes recalcitrant moderates.

Furthermore, many moderate Republicans and conservatives have been refusing to follow the GOP leadership on issues such as spending as Bush's popularity has waned.

"It is hard to maintain discipline when people are running for the doors," said David Keene, chairman of the American Conservative Union.

Effects on TexasTexas Republican lawmakers clearly miss DeLay, whom they often see when their former colleague drops in on their weekly luncheons on Capitol Hill.

Now that DeLay is gone from leadership, the Texans say they have to work much harder to secure federal help for the state.

"We've had to adjust quickly because the delegation had relied on Tom and his leadership role for so many issues, from NASA to highway funding," said Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands.

DeLay's effectiveness on the political front could reduce the state's clout in Congress if Democrats regain control of the House in the Nov. 7 elections.

Under the DeLay-spearheaded congressional redistricting in Texas, three of the state's longest-serving Democrats in the House, Martin Frost, Charles Stenholm and Jim Turner, were squeezed out of office. They were in line to become committee chairmen.

As many Republicans appear eager to move beyond the DeLay era, Keene said it may be impossible to duplicate his political skills: "What Tom DeLay brought to the job was a strategic view and an ability to get things done."

"It is a little bit like we replaced Mickey Mantle with somebody else," Keene said. "The other guy might get a few hits, but he is no Mantle."

Unfinished Budget Business (NYT)

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Control of the nation's purse strings is one of Congress's greatest powers and, as such, a core responsibility of lawmakers. But how can a serious obligation compete with political expediency?

The new budget year, 2007, starts today. But Congress left town last week without having passed the spending bills needed to pay for about 20 percent of the federal government, basically everything except the military and homeland security, and automatic payments like Social Security and interest on the national debt.

Republican legislators could not agree among themselves, let alone with the Democratic minority, on spending levels for matters as vital as education, diplomacy, environmental protection, public transportation and scientific research. Rather than make choices — and leave a record for voters to assess — they fled, promising to act after the election.

For now, departments and programs that Congress has not gotten around to funding will operate at last year's level, or somewhat below. But fallback funding will not necessarily prevent hardship. Take the State Children's Health Insurance Program, paid for by the states and the federal government to insure four million low-income children. At least 17 states are entering the new budget year without enough money, jeopardizing coverage for 600,000 children. It's appalling that Congress did not act to avert this, especially since the Census Bureau recently reported that the percentage of uninsured children rose last year for the first time since 1998.

Appalling, but not surprising. Congressional Republicans rammed through spending cuts in domestic programs last February, most of them in programs for low-income Americans. The ostensible purpose of the cuts was deficit reduction. But three months later, in May, they worsened the deficit by slashing taxes, which will mostly benefit wealthy households. On top of that, they tried repeatedly this year to gut the estate tax, which would only have benefited America's richest families.

It's impossible to say what will happen in the lame duck session, or beyond. But if the future Congress bears a strong resemblance to this one, it will not bode well for budget responsibility or basic fairness.

Education's Moving Target (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Common sense and conservatism, which are usually similar, said that the No Child Left Behind law, which vastly expanded the federal government's supervision of education from kindergarten through 12th grade, was problematic for two reasons: A few of the 50 state governors are apt to be wise innovators, so let policymaking remain at state and local levels. And when Washington makes a mistake, as it has been known to do, it is a continental mistake.

The federal government has recently made one that subverts a promising development in education at the state level. That development is the 65 percent requirement: 65 percent of every school district's education operational budget should be spent on classroom instruction.

Nationally, 61.3 percent is so spent. The 3.7 percentage point difference amounts to nearly $15 billion, which could pay for 370,000 teachers at $40,000 apiece, or a computer for every K-12 student in the country. Only three states today hit the 65 percent target. Seventeen states and the District of Columbia spend less than 60 percent.

Although Georgia already was at 63.6 percent, Gov. Sonny Perdue won passage of a 65 percent requirement. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius signed legislation making 65 percent "the public policy goal of the state of Kansas." Texas Gov. Rick Perry did it by executive order.

Louisiana's legislature unanimously asked the state Board of Elementary and Secondary Education to enact the 65 percent goal. (It has not yet done so.) In Colorado, an initiative to mandate 65 percent is on the November ballot. Signatures are being gathered to put such an initiative on Oregon's 2008 ballot. When Minnesota's Democratic-controlled Senate blocked passage of a 65 percent requirement, Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty called for a 70 percent requirement. Republican gubernatorial candidates in Florida, Colorado, Ohio, Michigan and Wisconsin endorse the idea.

But in July the National Center for Education Statistics, part of the U.S. Education Department, undermined this national effort. A report on expenditures for public elementary and secondary education for the 2003-04 school year contained this finding: "The percentage of current expenditures spent on instruction and instruction-related activities was 66.1 percent in 2003-04 for the nation as a whole" (emphasis added). Seasoned students of government verbiage noted the suspiciously vague phrase "instruction-related activities."

Opacity is a sign of insincerity: Government language becomes opaque as the government's conscience becomes uneasy. When no Iraqi weapons of mass destruction were found, the U.S. government began speaking foggily of finding "weapons of mass destruction-related program activities."

Now that Americans' concern is shifting from how much money is spent on education to how much education the money is buying, government has blurred the measurement in a way that says 66.1 percent of education dollars already reach the classroom. If the "instruction-related" criterion is not added, the percentage of dollars devoted to instruction has declined for five consecutive years, to 61.3.

The 65 percent standard requires transparency from state education establishments, which may explain resistance to it. In Oregon, the House majority leader and chairman of the education committee have asked school districts for documentation of spending patterns, but no district has responded. A state senator says a lobbyist for the Oregon School Boards Association told him that he had asked them not to respond.

Perhaps Oregon's school bureaucrats are similar to Oklahoma's. The Oklahoma Council of Public Affairs, a think tank, asked all 539 school districts for spending details such as the number of employees making more than $75,000 a year; payments for lobbying and public relations; information as to whether competitive bidding was required for maintenance, food and transportation services; and the number of automobiles owned or reimbursed by the districts. (Many districts purchase vehicle insurance through the Oklahoma State School Boards Association, which can spend the profits it makes from this on lobbying the legislature and whose members have gone to court to keep a 65 percent requirement off this November's ballot.) Two-thirds of Oklahoma's districts have not responded.

Warren Buffett has written that "yardsticks seldom are discarded while yielding favorable readings," but when readings are unfavorable, "a more flexible measurement system often suggests itself: Just shoot the arrow of business performance into a blank canvas and then carefully draw the bull's-eye around the implanted arrow."

No Child Left Behind supposedly promotes education accountability by mandating reliable data to measure progress. But Washington looks like an untrustworthy manipulator of data when it uses the phrase "instruction-related activity" to draw a bull's-eye around the status quo.

THE EDUCATION ISSUE (WP)

By Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

President Bush's No Child Left Behind Act was premised on three revolutionary goals. The first was to focus on low-performing schools and students; hence, No Child Left Behind. The second was to beef up the federal role in education, enforcing national standards through testing. The third was to bring facts and evidence to the notoriously squishy world of education policy, promoting teaching methods backed by "scientifically based research" instead of instinct and fad. This was the least-publicized goal, but arguably the most vital; the phrase "scientifically based research" appeared more than 100 times in the landmark 2001 law.

The centerpiece of the new research-based approach was Reading First, a $1 billion-a-year effort to help low-income schools adopt strategies "that have been proven to prevent or remediate reading failure" through rigorous peer-reviewed studies. "Quite simply, Reading First focuses on what works, and will support proven methods of early reading instruction," the Education Department promised.

Five years later, an accumulating mound of evidence from reports, interviews and program documents suggests that Reading First has had little to do with science or rigor. Instead, the billions have gone to what is effectively a pilot project for untested programs with friends in high places.

Department officials and a small group of influential contractors have strong-armed states and local districts into adopting a small group of unproved textbooks and reading programs with almost no peer-reviewed research behind them. The commercial interests behind those textbooks and programs have paid royalties and consulting fees to the key Reading First contractors, who also served as consultants for states seeking grants and chaired the panels approving the grants. Both the architect of Reading First and former education secretary Roderick R. Paige have gone to work for the owner of one of those programs, who is also a top Bush fundraiser.

On Sept. 22, the department's inspector general released a report exposing some of Reading First's favoritism and mismanagement. The highlights were internal e-mails from then-program director Chris Doherty, vowing to deny funding to programs that weren't part of the department's in-crowd: "They are trying to crash our party and we need to beat the [expletive] out of them in front of all the other would-be party crashers who are standing on the front lawn waiting to see how we welcome these dirtbags."

Doherty has since resigned, and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has pledged to review Reading First, emphasizing that the "individual mistakes" detailed in the report occurred before she became secretary. Still, Spellings expressed full confidence in the overall program: "Thanks to Reading First, struggling students are far more likely to get the help they need from teachers using scientifically based classroom reading instruction."

But the report barely scratched the surface of the incestuous process that dominated the formation of Reading First. The initiative didn't promote scientifically based reading instruction, the third goal of No Child Left Behind. And it's providing ammunition to critics of the second goal, strong national standards. The billion-dollar question is whether it may imperil the first goal: Will some children get left behind?

Bush administration officials frequently say that Reading First does not play favorites or intrude on local control, that states and districts are free to choose their own textbooks and programs -- as long as they're backed by sound science. But aggressive muckraking by the newsletter Title 1 Monitor and reading advocates at the Success for All Foundation have eviscerated those claims, and the inspector general's report officially contradicted them, accusing the department of breaking the law by promoting its pet programs and squelching others. In his internal e-mails, Doherty frequently admitted using "extralegal" tactics to force states and local districts to do the department's bidding. A report by Success for All documented how state applications for Reading First grants that promoted the preferred programs were the only ones approved.

In fact, the vast majority of the 4,800 Reading First schools have now adopted one of the five or six top-selling commercial textbooks, even though none of them has been evaluated in a peer-reviewed study against a control group. Most of the schools also use the same assessment program, the same instructional model, and one of three training programs developed by Reading First insiders -- with little research backing.

"They kept denying it, but everybody knew the department had a list," said Jady Johnson, director of the Reading Recovery Council of North America. "They're forcing schools to spend millions on ineffective programs."

To some extent, the controversy over Reading First reflects an older controversy over reading, pitting "phonics" advocates such as Doherty against "whole language" practitioners such as Johnson.

The administration believes in phonics, which emphasizes repetitive drills that teach children to sound out words. Johnson and other phonics skeptics try to teach the meaning and context of words as well. Reading First money has been steered toward states and local districts that go the phonics route, largely because the Reading First panels that oversaw state applications were stacked with department officials and other phonics fans. "Stack the panel?" Doherty joked in one e-mail. "I have never heard of such a thing . . . <harrumph, harrumph>." When Reid Lyon, who designed Reading First, complained that a whole-language proponent had received an invitation to participate on an evaluation panel, a top department official replied: "We can't un-invite her. Just make sure she is on a panel with one of our barracuda types."

Doherty bragged to Lyon about pressuring Maine, Mississippi and New Jersey to reverse decisions to allow whole-language programs in their schools: "This is for your FYI, as I think this program-bashing is best done off or under the major radar screens." Massachusetts and North Dakota were also told to drop whole-language programs such as Rigby Literacy, and districts that didn't do so lost funding. "Ha, ha--Rigby as a CORE program?" Doherty wrote in one internal e-mail. "When pigs fly!"

Said Bruce Hunter, a lobbyist for the American Association of School Administrators: "It's been obvious all along that the administration knew exactly what it wanted."

But it wasn't just about phonics.

Success for All is the phonics program with the strongest record of scientifically proved results, backed by 31 studies rated "conclusive" by the American Institutes for Research. And it has been shut out of Reading First. The nonprofit Success for All Foundation has shed 60 percent of its staff since Reading First began; the program had been growing rapidly, but now 300 schools have dropped it. Betsy Ammons, a principal in North Carolina, watched Success for All improve reading scores at her school, but state officials made her switch to traditional textbooks to qualify for the new grants.

"You can't afford to turn down the federal money," Ammons said. "But why should we have to give up on something that works?"

The answer lies in the Reading First grant process, which was almost comically skewed. Michigan was the first state approved, after it simply proposed to adopt the five best-selling textbooks. But when Rhode Island officials proposed to require "high-quality reading programs that meet the test of having a scientific research base," they were rejected. Doherty told them to check out Michigan's list, so they cut and pasted it into their application, while suggesting that districts could still adopt other programs justified by research. They were rejected again. So they limited their program to the textbooks. Only then were they approved. Similarly, Oklahoma unsuccessfully proposed to require reading programs backed by three years of longitudinal data before it got the hint and proposed the Michigan list.

So instead of advocating scientifically based reading programs, Reading First has promoted programs with "key elements" endorsed by a national reading panel, which could describe almost any program. It may not be a coincidence that the initiative was essentially outsourced to a few experts with a dizzying array of apparent conflicts of interest.

For example, when the department needed reviewers to evaluate reading assessment programs, it contracted with a University of Oregon team led by Edward Kame'enui, Roland Good and Deborah Simmons. Good had developed an assessment called Dynamic Indicators of Basic Early Literacy Skills (DIBELS), and Kame'enui, Good and Simmons had all served on the design team for Voyager Passport, a remedial program built around DIBELS. Ultimately, DIBELS was the only assessment used in Reading First, and Voyager was the most popular supplemental program.

Similarly, the department steered states to just three providers of professional development services: Kame'enui and Simmons at Oregon, Louisa C. Moats at the for-profit Sopris West, and Sharon Vaughn at the University of Texas at Austin. Vaughn was the other member of the Voyager Passport design team, and one of the four chairmen of the secretary's Reading Leadership Academy, which exerted enormous influence over Reading First; the others were Moats, Kame'enui and his Oregon colleague Douglas Carnine. States such as Alabama, North Carolina and Washington specified in their Reading First grants that every one of their reviewers for local proposals would have to be approved by one of those chairmen.

Kame'enui and Simmons also wrote the "Consumer's Guide" that most states agreed to use to evaluate Reading First programs, and ran one of Reading First's three "technical assistance centers" at Oregon. They co-wrote one Reading First textbook, and Kame'enui earned more than $100,000 last year from royalties on another, according to his financial disclosure when he moved to an Education Department job. In her 2004 book "In Defense of Our Children: When Politics, Profit, and Education Collide," Elaine Garan recalled color-coding the various financial connections running through Reading First; when it came to Kame'enui, she wrote, "I ran out of colors."

The department declined a request to interview Kame'enui, but Undersecretary Henry Johnson said the department takes conflicts of interest seriously, and will adopt all the inspector general's recommendations. "We're going to dig into this," he said.

But Johnson said states are ultimately responsible for making sure their programs are scientifically based, which is small comfort for applicants pressured into adopting programs they didn't want. "It's been very frustrating for those of us who really believe in evidence-based programs," said Richard Long, a lobbyist for the International Reading Association, which represents 90,000 reading teachers and specialists nationwide.

Then again, Long thinks spending $1 billion a year on reading is a great idea. And he thinks it's helping kids to read: "Have there been mistakes in implementation? Oh yeah. But teachers in Reading First schools believe progress is being made."

The bottom line, Johnson said, is that Reading First works. A department report found that teachers in Reading First schools spent 19 minutes more per day on reading than teachers in other schools, and were more likely to place struggling students in reading intervention programs. A new report by the nonpartisan Center on Education Policy suggested that Reading First is having a positive effect on state reading scores, although Johnson said much more needs to be done.

"Despite all the problems with Reading First, there's evidence that it's helping states," said Jack Jennings, the center's president.

Of course, $5 billion over five years ought to help states; the question is whether it's helping as much as it should. Without the kind of rigorous studies the law promised but the implementers failed to deliver, it's not clear.

But it is clear that Reading First has been a terrific boon for the textbook publishing industry, and for the department's favored programs. For example, the company that developed Voyager Passport was valued at about $5 million in a newspaper article before Reading First; founder Randy Best, whose Republican fundraising made him a Bush Pioneer, eventually sold it for $380 million. He then put Lyon and Paige on his payroll.

Local domination of education is an American tradition, and Bush took up a storied cause in challenging it; reformers since Horace Mann have promoted national education policy as a way to encourage common culture and equal opportunity. But local-control advocates have always warned that empowering heavy-handed federal bureaucrats would breed self-serving, one-size-fits-all solutions. Now, Reading First is making them look like prophets.

THE EDUCATION ISSUE (WP)

By Paul A. Hanle

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

I recently addressed a group of French engineering graduate students who were visiting Washington from the prestigious School of Mines in Paris. After encouraging them to teach biotechnology in French high schools, I expected the standard queries on teaching methods or training. Instead, a bright young student asked bluntly: "How can you teach biotechnology in this country when you don't even accept evolution?"

I wanted to disagree, but the kid had a point. Proponents of "intelligent design" in the United States are waging a war against teaching science as scientists understand it. Over the past year alone, efforts to incorporate creationist language or undermine evolution in science classrooms at public schools have emerged in at least 15 states, according to the National Center for Science Education. And an independent education foundation has concluded that science-teaching standards in 10 states fail to address evolution in a scientifically sound way. Through changes in standards and curriculum, these efforts urge students to doubt evolution -- the cornerstone principle of biology, one on which there is no serious scientific debate.

This war could decimate the development of U.S. scientific talent and erode whatever competitive advantage the United States enjoys in the technology-based global economy. Already, U.S. high school students lag near the bottom in math skills compared with students in other developed nations, and high school seniors are performing worse in science than they were 10 years ago.

These trends can only worsen if students come to regard evolution as questionable or controversial. Thirty-seven percent of the high school Advanced Placement biology examination tests knowledge of evolution, evolutionary biology and heredity, according to the College Board. Students who do not thoroughly understand evolution cannot hope to succeed on this exam; they will be handicapped in competitive science courses in college and the careers that may follow.

By teaching intelligent design or other variants of creationism in science classes at public schools -- or by undercutting the credibility of evolution -- we are greatly diminishing our chances for future scientific breakthroughs and technological innovations, and are endangering our health, safety and economic well-being as individuals and as a nation.

This is not a war of religion against science. The two have thrived together for centuries. Nor is it a struggle of believers against godless materialists; many believers practice science and find inspiration for it from their faith. It is a battle between religious dogma cloaked as science and open inquiry that leads to new knowledge and understanding of the natural world.

The notion of intelligent design is clever; it has a certain philosophical appeal. The evolution of a human eye from a series of random mutations, for example, is indeed difficult to understand; the notion of an intelligent creator solves such problems, and feeds our spiritual needs. But it distracts us from learning what is scientifically testable and reduces students' will to probe the natural world.

The opposition to evolution discourages the development of entire high-school classes of future scientific talent. "It seems like a raw deal for the 14-year-old girl in Topeka who might have gone on to find a cure for resistant infections if only she had been taught evolution in high school," H. Holden Thorp, chairman of the chemistry department at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, wrote in the New York Times last spring.

Multiply that girl's plight thousands of times -- in school districts in Georgia, Kansas, Ohio and other states that are discouraging the teaching of evolution.

Last year, a report from the National Academies' Committee on Prospering in the Global Economy of the 21st Century showed us a glimpse of the future. Of all the patent applications reaching the U.S. Patent Office, the report noted, the most by far still come from the United States. However, from 1989 to 2001, the rate of increase of patent applications from the world's fastest-growing economies, such as China and India, was nearly three times that of the United States. By that measure, innovation in those economies will blow past ours in little more than a decade -- just about the time the current classes of high school biology students will be starting their research careers.

Non-scientific viewpoints deserve respect. But to combat the spread of HIV/AIDS, bio-warfare and pandemic diseases, to discover lifesaving cures and life-improving breakthroughs, tomorrow's biologists must be equipped with scientifically based knowledge today.

Nations that value open inquiry and use scientific criteria in education, research and industry will outperform those that do not. If we are to continue to be leaders in the global economy, we must teach science, not religion, in the science classroom.

Early Admissions Aren't The Problem (WP)

By Amy Gutmann

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

To end or not to end early admissions: That is the question that colleges and universities are debating once again. The passion is great, but the stakes are small and the debate is a distraction from a far more important matter: the urgent need of all but a handful of colleges and universities to improve financial aid for students from low-income and middle-income families.

At the University of Pennsylvania and many other colleges and universities, early admissions have not been an impediment to improving access, and abolishing the practice will do no significant social good. Because of our outreach activities and improved financial aid policies, many more minorities and low-income students are applying to Penn for both early and regular decisions. Once again this year we enrolled a record number (and proportion) of minority students.

But we will accomplish nothing significant in improving access for students from low- and middle-income families unless we focus our attention on strengthening our need-based financial aid program and our outreach to students who attend schools where they have not been informed about the availability of need-based financial aid.

Financial aid based on need is the great equalizer of opportunity in higher education. Nothing promotes equity and socioeconomic diversity more effectively. Even if tuition rates were frozen, a college education would simply be out of reach for low-income and most middle-income families were it not for need-based financial aid.

Over the past two decades, most colleges and universities have moved in precisely the wrong direction: They have increasingly relied on merit-based aid (scholarships based on scholastic ability) and athletic scholarships, both of which disproportionately favor students from higher-income families, rather than need-based aid. Consequently, they have widened the enrollment gap between high-income and both middle- and low-income students.

Recently a relatively tiny number of colleges and universities (Penn included) have dramatically improved financial aid -- based on need -- for low-income students. Last year we substituted grants for loans for students from families earning less than $50,000 a year.

The road to greater access must be paved with more than good intentions. Making college truly accessible to middle-income as well as low-income students is a daunting financial challenge. The total increase in grant aid at Penn over the past five years has been twice the rate of our tuition increases. For colleges and universities to do our part in making high-quality higher education affordable -- and therefore accessible -- to talented, hardworking students from all backgrounds, fundraising for need-based financial aid must take priority.

The stakes are even higher than is conveyed by the ideal of equal educational opportunity. American democracy can flourish and our economy remain competitive on a global stage only if we offer the highest-quality education to the most talented children from all socioeconomic backgrounds. For the sake of our nation's future, federal and state governments need to do their part in improving elementary and secondary education and in joining with us -- for example, by significantly increasing the level of Pell grants and extending financial aid to more middle-income students -- to make college a realistic aspiration for all.

Both the ideal of equal educational opportunity and the reality of our country's future standing in the world demand that academia not be distracted by internecine debates in which relatively little will be gained or lost, regardless of who is right, and instead focus our efforts on providing a quality education and increasing financial aid based on need for all students.

THE EDUCATION ISSUE (WP)

There should be efforts to very actively recruit middle-class people into neighborhood schools and make sure these really are schools that prepare kids for college. This recruitment has to be done with artistry and couldn't be started without straight talk about education and race.

In the District, you've got all this cherry-picking and vouchers that increases segregation across the system. If you're going to have millions of little charter schools, it's very hard to have a coherent educational plan for the city. The premise of that approach is that it's hopeless and you can just pick on the bones.

Gary Orfield, professor of education and social policy at the Harvard Graduate School of Education

Putting responsibility and authority together in the same place is essential. I think that means having very strong principals in schools. That means giving them authority but it also means rewarding good work. It means paying them very well and making it a very attractive job.

If you have a growing professional class, anything you can do to persuade those parents to keep their kids in the public schools is going to help everybody. Because those parents can be great advocates. And there's a growing body of evidence that diversity is in fact a very powerful educator of people. So part of the pitch to the middle class is to say: At least your kid's going to get a better education.

Colin Diver, president of Reed College, featured in
J. Anthony Lukas's "Common Ground" as a parent of children in the Boston public schools

A hundred efforts to reform the D.C. school system have foundered on the shoals of bureaucratic lethargy, union contracts and messed-up governance. A dozen "reformist" superintendents have come and gone. What's worked best to date -- albeit not perfectly -- is creating alternatives to the system's schools and letting children freely attend them. The District's burgeoning charter-school sector and its scholarship/voucher program attest both to the demand for such alternatives and to the feasibility of providing them. Adrian Fenty should do all within his power to accelerate and intensify this promising strategy.

Chester E. Finn, Jr. senior fellow, Hoover Institution at Stanford University, and president,
Thomas B. Fordham Foundation

Two key things happened in Boston: The city moved from an elected school committee to an appointed one. And Tom Menino as mayor became a real champion of the schools. His two kids graduated from Boston public schools and he's now got five grandchildren in the public schools. You have to show others that you really believe what you're talking about.

Thomas Payzant, superintendent of Boston public schools from 1995 to 2006

The best way to reform the D.C. public schools is to focus on the fundamentals of education: excellent teachers, experienced principals, manageable class sizes, a solid curriculum and modern facilities. If these fundamentals are missing, then no rearrangement of the structure or control of the school system will make a difference. There are no shortcuts in education, no silver bullets, no magical solutions.

Diane Ravitch, New York University professor and assistant secretary of education under President George H.W. Bush

The objective should be small schools of parental choice, each autonomously designed and managed by its teachers and providing a program that is legitimately "college preparatory." In order to do that, the city must push authority down, with district-wide authority vested in a board made up of faculty members of each school. Visitors from D.C. institutions of higher education would formally inspect each school every year, making their findings available to the media. Admission would be by "blind" lottery, except for siblings of students already enrolled, who would be automatically admitted, if their parents desired it.

Ted Sizer, founder, the Coalition of Essential Schools

Students' work must be central and public, and related to the school's broad mission. Only schools whose faculty is as excited as the kids hopefully will be, and whose families and communities presume they are respected partners, can engage the natural curiosity and energies of the young. A good education cannot happen until the young take on the task as their own.

Deborah Meier , author of "Many Children Left Behind" (Beacon), and founder and director, Central Park East Secondary School, a New York City public high school

I have never been to a meeting on school reform in the District where students were invited to be part of the conversation. And yet students know what is not working in schools. They will tell me that most adults in their schools do not know them well, and that they are not held accountable for much. They tell me that many teachers talk at them, rather than exploring learning with them. Students want to be involved in improving their schools and they want to be held accountable. D.C. students are very sophisticated about their own education. Most adults do not give them credit for this.

OTHER NEWS:

Even If Rates Don't Move, The Interest Bill Will Rise (NYT)

By Daniel Gross
The New York Times, October 1, 2006

MONEY has gotten more expensive. The Federal Reserve's benchmark short-term interest rate has risen to 5.25 percent, from just 1 percent in June 2004. Long-term interest rates have risen less sharply.

When considering the broad impact of higher rates, economists have focused mostly on how they have affected businesses and the vast real estate complex. The truism that higher interest rates function as a tax on people who hold variable debt has been particularly apparent to homeowners holding adjustable-rate mortgages.

Mark Zandi, the chief economist at Moody's Economy.com, notes that about $2 trillion in A.R.M.'s are scheduled to reset at higher rates from the beginning of 2006 to the end of 2008. If the mortgages adjust upward by an average of 2.5 percentage points, the interest payments by holders of such mortgages would be $50 billion higher in 2009 than they are today. "That's not much in the grand scheme of a $13 trillion economy, but it is a problem for those homeowners," Mr. Zandi said.

But a much larger group of Americans is already paying a steeper price: taxpayers. After all, the United States government is the largest adjustable-rate borrower in the world. Each year, the national debt grows. Congress spends more than it is willing to raise in taxes, so it finances operations by selling debt to the public. In the last five years, the gross national debt, which includes bonds pledged to fund Social Security and other entitlements, has risen 46 percent, to about $8.5 trillion, from $5.8 trillion at the end of September 2001.

For much of the last decade, the rising national debt didn't weigh on taxpayers much. Interest rates were generally tame in the late 1990's, and Alan Greenspan, then the Federal Reserve chairman, cut short-term rates repeatedly in 2001 and 2002 and left them at historically low levels through 2004.

"Net interest spending, as a percentage of the overall budget, actually was cut in half between 1995 and 2004 because interest rates were dropping," said Brian M. Riedl, senior budget analyst at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

In the early years of this decade, even as President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress sharply increased spending, net interest payments fell — to $184 billion in 2005 from $206 billion in 2001.

Now the dynamic is reversing. The government relies on short-term financing to finance its operations, and with interest rates rising, its cost has gone up. According to the Bureau of the Public Debt, the average interest rate paid by the government on public debt rose to 4.853 percent in August from 4.176 percent in the same month last year — a 16 percent increase. As a result, the government's interest bill is expected to rise to $220 billion this year from $184 billion in 2005.

This extra $36 billion makes interest the fastest-growing component of federal spending, noted Adam Hughes, director for federal fiscal policy at OMB Watch in Washington. And it has aggravated the budget strife on Capitol Hill, where bitter debate has raged over spending on everything from legislators' pet projects to the war in Iraq. In fiscal 2005, the government spent more on interest than it did on Medicaid ($182 billion). Citizens Against Government Waste, an advocacy group based in Washington, identified "earmarks" for lawmakers' pet projects that totaled $29 billion in fiscal 2006. "Even if Congress were to get rid of all those, it wouldn't come close to making up for the higher interest payments," Mr. Hughes said.

When it comes to debt, borrowers' pain generally translates into lenders' gains. "The people who are holders of U.S. government bonds benefit because their disposable income rises," said Michael Mussa, senior fellow at the Institute for International Economics.

But a growing proportion of today's higher interest payments are not recycled into the domestic economy. "Since 2000, a large share of the government debt has been financed by foreign purchasers," noted Robert E. Scott, director of international programs at the Economic Policy Institute, based in Washington.

As of June, foreign agencies and institutions owned $2 trillion in United States government securities, or more than 40 percent of the government's debt that is sold in the bond market. And so the rising interest rates are contributing to rising income in China, the Persian Gulf region and Japan. In 2005, the United States government paid about $77 billion in interest to foreign creditors, according to the Commerce Department.

MANY analysts believe that the Federal Reserve has stopped raising short-term rates. And in recent weeks, long-term interest rates have fallen as investors have fretted about slowing growth. But because the government continues to replace lower-yielding securities issued in the last 10 years with higher-yielding debt, the government's interest cost is also expected to continue to grow rapidly. The Congressional Budget Office projects that the interest bill, after climbing nearly 20 percent this year, will rise 13.2 percent in 2007, to $240 billion, and more than 8 percent in 2008, to $270 billion. With each passing year, interest payments are likely to eat up a bigger chunk of total spending and crowd out other priorities.

In February 2004, Mr. Greenspan advised home buyers that they would be better off with adjustable-rate mortgages than they would be with the old-fashioned, fixed-rate variety. Taxpayers now find themselves in the same boat as those who followed Mr. Greenspan's advice, said Maya MacGuineas, president of the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, based in Washington.

"The government pursued a strategy of borrowing short-term debt while rates were low, so the interest costs would be lower in the short run," she said. "But doing so leaves the borrower in a much more vulnerable situation when rates began to rise."

Happy Birthday, Bull Market. (Now, Make A Wish.) (NYT)

By Paul J. Lim

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

NEXT week, the bull market will celebrate its fourth birthday. This means that this bull is on the verge of accomplishing what four of the past seven could not — surviving to at least the start of Year 5.

If history is any guide, that fifth year may be surprisingly robust. Since 1942, bull markets that made it that far still had enough gas in the tank to generate average fifth-year gains of 10 percent, according to Standard & Poor's.

If that's the case, why isn't Wall Street in a more celebratory mood?

It may have to do with how long this bull market is taking to bring stock prices back to their previous highs. It's been more than six years since equity prices peaked, in early 2000. Although the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has rallied for four consecutive years, that benchmark is still 13 percent below its highest close in the previous bull market. As for the Nasdaq composite index, it is still down a stunning 55 percent from its record high.

To be sure, the Dow Jones industrial average last week flirted with its all-time high close of 11,722.98, set in January 2000. But one reason that the Dow may have recovered faster is that it had a shorter path to travel. From peak to trough, the Dow fell 38 percent in the most recent bear market. Compare that with the 49 percent loss suffered by the S.& P. and the 78 percent plunge in the Nasdaq.

Historically, the S.& P. has needed 3.3 years, on average, to return to new highs after suffering through a bear market, according to an analysis by InvesTech Research. But this time, don't be surprised if it takes significantly longer.

For starters, the bear market that preceded this bull was no ordinary sell-off. "It was the bursting of the largest bubble in U.S. capital markets history," said Robert D. Arnott, chairman of Research Affiliates, an asset management firm based in Pasadena, Calif.

Investors must realize that "great bear markets have a lasting effect," said Jeremy Grantham, chairman of Grantham, Mayo, Van Otterloo, the asset management firm in Boston. This hangover continues to influence the market today, he said.

What's more, not all bull markets are created equal. Many, in fact, have simply not been strong enough to return stocks to their previous highs.

Since September 1900, there have been 33 bull markets, according to Ned Davis Research. Of those 33, only 15 were able to establish new all-time highs. In other words, more than half of all bull markets fail to return stock prices to their prior peaks.

Much of this depends on what kind of bull market you're dealing with. Mr. Arnott says that there are two types of bull and bear markets. First, there are cyclical bulls and bears, which run their course in the span of a few years. Then, there are longer-term, secular bull and bear markets; those can last for decades.

Mr. Arnott noted that short-term cyclical bull markets could occur within longer-term secular bear markets. From 1966 to 1982, for instance, the broad stock market went virtually nowhere. But within that period, there were several cyclical bull and bear markets that sent stocks prices up and down.

Many market strategists say that the current bull market is a cyclical rally stuck within a secular bear. One telltale sign is that the S.& P. has yet to revisit its record high.

Consider, too, the modest range of the recent four-year rally. "While this has been one of the longest bull markets we've seen historically," Mr. Arnott said, "it's also been among the weakest."

From the market trough in Oct. 9, 2002, the S.& P. 500 has climbed 72 percent. By comparison, the average bull market has returned almost twice as much from trough to peak, based on data back to 1932, according to InvesTech.

The solid but unspectacular returns are a classic symptom of a cyclical bull within a secular bear market, said Jeffrey A. Hirsch, editor in chief of the Stock Trader's Almanac.

Mr. Hirsch recently studied past cyclical bulls trapped in secular bears. In those instances, the Dow rose by only around 35 percent, on average, going back to 1929. By comparison, cyclical rallies within secular bull markets have typically pushed stocks higher by 110 percent. For the record, the Dow is up by about 60 percent in the current bull market.

The last cyclical bull market to occur within a secular bear started in October 1974, according to S.& P. I It's hard to miss the similarities between today's market and that one.

Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at S.& P., noted that the bull that started in 1974 produced gains of 38 percent in the first 12 months, 21 percent in the next 12 months, a loss of 8 percent in the third year and 7 percent gains in the fourth and fifth.

In the current bull run, the S.& P. 500 gained 34 percent in the first year, 8 percent in the second and 7 percent in the third. And it is up by about 12 percent so far in the fourth.

Mr. Stovall added that the two periods have other things in common, like "high oil prices, concerns over inflation, fallout from an expensive and unpopular war and a not-so-popular Republican president in his second term."

If this is a secular bear market, how long until it goes back into hibernation? That's hard to say.

Given the enormity of the late-90's bubble and the duration of past secular bear markets, Mr. Arnott said, it could be that, taking inflation into account, "15 years from now, stock prices won't be materially higher than they are today."

If he's right, investors will have to rely less on capital appreciation and more on personal savings to help them reach their investment goals. "They're going to have to save more aggressively to get ahead," he said.

Investors must also reset their overall expectations. Just because we're in a bull market right now, the stock market won't necessarily produce the 20-percent-plus annual gains to which investors grew accustomed in the late 1990's.

"Forget it," Mr. Arnott said. "Wake up — this is a different market."

After Midterm Elections, The Party Begins (WSJ)

By KAREN TALLEY And MOHAMMED HADI

The Wall Street Journal, October 1, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average didn't manage to set a new record last week. But hang on. History suggests there's a good chance it will after the Nov. 7 election.

Stocks tend to do very well following midterm elections, which occur two years into each presidential term. Indeed, since 1950, the average return for the Dow Jones Industrial Average from the November of a midterm-election year through the following October has been 18.6%. That's far better than the average annual gain of 8.4% from November 1950 through October 2003, a year after the last midterm election, in 2002.

That's a historical record that professional investors and other market watchers have a hard time ignoring, even as they speculate about why it's been the case.

Most commonly, the market advances are thought to be driven by expectations that elected officials will strive mightily to boost the U.S. economy -- such as by tax cuts or increased government spending -- before the coming presidential elections.

"Once you get past the midterm election, the focus of the entire government becomes the economy," explains Marc Pado, U.S. market strategist at Cantor Fitzgerald.

A Boost from the Fed

And there's another trend that tends to coincide with the year after a midterm election. The Federal Reserve is often moving from raising interest rates to lowering them.

From a stock-market standpoint, that signals more corporate expansion and the prospect of higher profits, says Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist at PNC Wealth Management in Philadelphia.

A move by the Fed to cut rates "is good news because it encourages investors to put more money in the [stock] market and drive it higher," Mr. Kleintop explains. That indeed may be the direction the Fed is currently headed, after holding its target short-term interest rate steady at two meetings after a long series of rate boosts since 2004.

On average, historically, it hasn't made a big difference for stock performance which political party does better in the midterm elections.

In a recent research note, Alec Phillips, Goldman Sachs vice president of Washington research, tracked returns following midterm elections since 1950.

When Republicans controlled both the Senate and the House of Representatives, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose nearly 26% in the almost 14 months from Election Day to the end of the following year. When Democrats controlled Congress, the S&P 500 advanced by nearly 23% on average.

Why Gridlock Is Good

The best performance, though, a rise of 28%, occurred in periods of "gridlock," when the parties split control of Congress, making it tough for either party to advance its agenda. That congressional gridlock is the best possible situation for stocks makes sense to Barry James, president of fund manager James Investment Research in Alpha, Ohio. "A do-nothing Congress is better than a do-something Congress, because it takes away uncertainty," he says.

Barry Ritholtz, chief market strategist at Ritholtz Research & Analytics in New York, concurs: "The diversity forces everybody into the middle, because no one has absolute control. That means more compromises and less extreme legislation, like very big tax hikes or increased deficits," he says.

While Republicans currently are in the majority in both houses, it appears that Democrats have a good chance to retake the House and lower odds in the Senate.

To be sure, most money managers say investors shouldn't put too much stock in historical patterns such as these rallies after midterm elections. This year, for instance, Mr. James says concerns about the slowing economy should temper any enthusiasm based on past trends.

That doesn't mean he's running away from stocks. Rather, Mr. James says he is seeking out those companies that "have a history of good earnings and are trading at multiples below the market."

Liz Ann Sonders, chief investment strategist at Charles Schwab, adds that while the post-election trend is pretty powerful, "I don't tend to ever look at one thing as gospel for what the market is going to do. It just has to go into the mix of indicators that you look at."

Housing Drag

Like Mr. James, she thinks much will depend on whether the economy can avoid slipping into recession, and on whether the housing slowdown drags consumer spending with it. Right now, Ms. Sonders thinks there's a 50/50 chance of a recession -- worse odds than many others give the economy.

With the economic uncertainty, "we're not looking to swing for the fences," she says. Moreover, she notes that investors can currently earn as much as 5.25% annual interest in low-risk savings accounts.

Mr. Kleintop of PNC Wealth Management is fairly optimistic these days, predicting "an extension of the rally we've seen in recent months, as we benefit from a number of catalysts, including the midterm election and the Fed moving into easing mode."

Winners by Party

With five weeks to Election Day, meanwhile, some investors are speculating about stock-market sectors that could benefit or suffer if the Democrats gain additional power in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0072564

For example, Mr. Pado of Cantor Fitzgerald says a Republican victory could lead to tax breaks that benefit the wealthy, and thus might drive spending on high-end consumer goods. Democrats instead might push tax cuts for middle-income Americans, which could benefit "Sears and J.C. Penney more than Nordstrom," he says.

Under Democratic majorities, efforts to raise the minimum wage could heat up. A higher minimum wage could be a negative for retailers and fast-food chains.

Outlook for Health Stocks?

Healthcare companies could see an effect in terms of legislation that encourages greater use of generic drugs, which could hurt major drug companies. The big pharmaceutical firms could also be affected by Democrats pushing for the Medicare drug program to be able to negotiate volume price discounts with the drug manufacturers.

Democrats might also reverse or ease up on favorable tax treatment for big oil companies. And conversely, the alternative-energy sector -- focused on areas such as solar, wind and thermal power -- could get a boost.

"I wouldn't be surprised to see Democrats move towards subsidies or tax cuts" that favor alternative energy, Mr. Ritholtz of Ritholtz Research says.

Bush Still Serves As GOP's Fundraiser In Chief (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

A sitting president is always a big draw. This one reaches beyond the party's top politicians to campaign on behalf of its House candidates.

WASHINGTON — President Bush has raised more than $180 million for the Republican Party and its candidates since he was reelected — an average of more than $261,000 per day. And now, the pace is picking up.

This week, he begins a Western fundraising trip: Monday in Reno; Tuesday in Stockton, El Dorado County and Bel-Air; and Wednesday in Scottsdale, Ariz., and Englewood, Colo.

Among the beneficiaries in California will be Reps. Richard W. Pombo (R-Tracy) and John T. Doolittle (R-Roseville). Each has had ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and each was considered vulnerable earlier in the campaign. But both represent Republican-leaning districts, and their standings are believed to have improved.

Bush's trip is part of what aides say will be an active travel schedule as the November elections approach. Although the president himself is not on any ballot, the results Nov. 7 could go a long way toward determining the outcome of his final two years in office.

If Democrats wind up with a net gain of six Senate seats, they win control of the Senate; in the House, a pickup of 15 seats would turn the chamber over to the Democrats.

"If the Democrats take over, it will make life much worse" for Bush, said Gary Jacobson, a political science professor at UC San Diego. "Democrats will start talking about accountability, investigating management of the war in Iraq, and there will be endless headaches for him."

Bush will spend more time campaigning for GOP candidates in these weeks before election day, aides said. The White House continues to receive more requests for Bush's time as a campaigner than he can meet, said Deputy Press Secretary Dana Perino. "Supply is not keeping up with demand," she said.

Bush has never been reluctant to stick his hand out and ask for money for the GOP. Over nearly six years in office, he has done so more than 200 times.

The result in just the current 2005-2006 campaign cycle has been a gross of $182 million as of Thursday, said Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tracey Schmitt.

Vice President Dick Cheney has brought in an additional $38 million, and Laura Bush $13 million.

To put the money chase into perspective, as of midSeptember, the major Republican fundraising operations — the National Committee and the committees overseeing party campaigns for the Senate and House — reported that they had brought in $369 million in the two-year cycle. By comparison, the Democrats' groups reported $264 million.

Bush's fundraising helped build the GOP groups' total, but some of the money he raised went to other outlets, such as state Republican organizations, gubernatorial candidates and individual candidates for Congress.

Presidents have long been top-draw political fundraisers. What is different now is the mix of candidates for whom Bush is working.

Until recently, presidents generally restricted their fundraising to gala affairs for their national parties and the occasional gubernatorial or Senate candidate — the top dogs in the political world.

DOJ_NMG_0072565

But Bush is making the pitch further down the ticket, for Republican House members. This year, he campaigned for five non-incumbents — candidates who in the past would have been lucky to have drawn a vice president or a leader in the Senate or House.

It used to be that "every once in a while a president went out and did a House race," said Anthony Corrado, a professor of government at Colby College in Maine. But throughout Bush's presidency, he said, House races have been on the agenda — even more than under President Clinton, an inveterate campaigner.

This reflects the possibility that Democrats will seize the majority in November's election, and the threat that could pose to Bush's final two years in office.

Given that Bush's approval ratings are in the low 40s in many polls, there is debate about whether the presidential visits help Republican candidates in tightly contested districts.

But Rep. Bob Beauprez, a Republican running for governor of Colorado, said Bush remained a campaign asset.

"He is the president, after all, and there's only one of them. And I think the mood of the general public is very much starting to think, 'You know, we still do have this safety, this security issue that is out there, and we haven't been attacked in five years.' "

Besides, he said, Bush stirs the most loyal voters to get to the polls — the eventual theme of any campaign as it shifts from fundraising to voter turnout.

"Part of the issue in this election is making sure our base comes home, and there isn't anybody that can rally the base better than the president of the United States when he's your president," Beauprez said.

Cheney Shelves Enmity To Celebrate A Milestone (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — Reporters traveling with Vice President Dick Cheney were treated to an odd celebration last week aboard Air Force Two after he headlined his 100th campaign fundraiser of the 2005-06 election cycle.

It was a milestone like no other, in part because of Cheney's famous animosity toward the media. But no matter — en route from Grand Rapids, Mich., to Andrews Air Force Base here, Cheney briefly emerged from his private cabin for some cake and banter.

It was a sharp contrast to previous outings.

Cheney rarely takes reporters with him and when he does, generally avoids unscripted contact or gratuitous hospitality.

On a memorable trip overseas, Cheney commandeered one of just two working electrical outlets on board so he could recharge his iPod, thwarting journalists efforts' to file their stories on deadline.

So there was a certain amount of puzzlement last week when reporters were beckoned to the front of the cabin by Cheney's staffers, who had procured bakery goods marking Cheney's milestone.

"You're the only one who's been to all one hundred," Cheney's political director, Mel Raines, told the vice president.

"And I'm the only one who always has to give a speech," Cheney replied.

The cake was white with raspberry filling, with white frosting and red, white and blue frosted bunting. The message on the top read, "100 On to Victory."

"Does my wife know about this?" Cheney asked.

After handing out cake, Cheney was asked which of the 100 events was most memorable. He thought for a moment before giving up.

"Stuff from 30 years ago is easier to remember," Cheney said. "The rest is a blur."

Bush's road show heads to the WestPresident Bush so far has done 55 fundraisers in the same time frame, with just over half closed to the media.

Who knows what goes on behind closed doors? White House officials said Bush's events are generally closed when they are in a private home.

This week, the president is heading west for three days of political fundraising in Nevada, California, Arizona and Colorado. Most of the events are open to correspondents, with limited access for cameras.

In rare move, Snow to hit the money trail

Apparently in response to popular demand, White House spokesman Tony Snow as well will be hitting the hustings to raise money for the party and its candidates this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0072566

It's an unprecedented move for any White House spokesman. It's also a revealing byproduct of the television age, which has made minor celebrities of a succession of presidential mouthpieces.

"These are not going to be speeches where I go out and start railing against Democrats," Snow said. "What I'm going to do is talk about the president's record and what he's done."

The few events he's done so far have been closed to the media; Snow said he expects upcoming events to be open. On whether he saw any conflict in the White House spokesman operating in political secrecy, Snow said, "That's a good question."

"I was approached by the political office saying that we've got a lot of inquiries and a lot of people would like (me) to do this," Snow said. "What followed were a long series of conversations, because I think this is pretty unplowed ground."

The Republican National Committee will be paying Snow's expenses. The spokesman said it's being left up to him to set the ground rules for what he can say to political groups.

"If I overstep, you can whack me," Snow said.

Short take

"We're both beneficiaries of continuing low expectations," Bush said last week to embattled Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

In Taking On Fox, Democrats See Reward In The Risk (NYT)

By Lorne Manly

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

THE Fox News Channel doesn't officially turn 10 until this week, but the Democrats have already begun doing their best to spoil the celebrations.

The party crashing began last Sunday, when former President Bill Clinton transformed an interview with Chris Wallace on "Fox News Sunday" into a finger-pointing tirade against what he called a "conservative hit job." Howard Dean, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, quickly released a statement applauding Mr. Clinton for standing up to what he described as a right-wing, bullying propaganda machine.

In separate appearances on Fox News over the next two days, Lanny J. Davis, a former special counsel to Mr. Clinton, and Barbara Boxer, the Democratic senator from California, mocked the news channel's trademarked motto of being "fair and balanced."

And on Wednesday Paul Begala and James Carville, Democratic commentators for CNN, engaged in more than five minutes of high-decibel debate on Fox with Bill O'Reilly about Mr. Clinton's appearance, daring Mr. O'Reilly to "come out of the closet" and admit Fox News is a "right-leaning, anti-Clinton network."

The attacks represent a new twist on the Democrats' complicated dance with the cable news channel. Though Fox News maintains that its reporting is down the middle, Democrats have long complained that the news channel operates like a public relations outpost of the Bush White House. But never before has that anger built into a mad-as-hell-and-not-going-to-take-it-any-more moment, and spilled over in such naked and sustained fashion onto Fox News itself.

"The Republicans are using Fox News to gin up their base, and now — for the first time — the Democrats are doing it, too," said Steve McMahon, a Democratic strategist with McMahon, Squier & Associates who handled Mr. Dean's presidential campaign.

Engaging Fox News in such an aggressive manner, however, may not be the smartest strategy. If there's a base that needs energizing for these midterm elections, it belongs to the Republicans, and a Clinton-led attack may only revivify them. And so far, there is just one clear beneficiary: Fox News. The news channel has highlighted the contretemps on many of its programs, boosting the ratings in the process.

Democrats do not view Chris Wallace as a partisan gunslinger, as they do some other Fox News personalities. But his questions about whether Mr. Clinton did enough to destroy Al Qaeda ignited simmering Democratic and Clintonian anger.

Democrats had been furious with White House attempts over the last few months to to portray Democrats as weaker on national security than Republicans. And defenders of the Clinton administration were furious about "The Path to 9/11," the ABC docudrama that they claimed depicted the administration in an unfair light. All this fed into last week's reaction, Democratic officials and strategists say. "I think it's important for us to call it what it is," said Karen Finney, communications director for the Democratic National Committee, speaking about the recent incidents. "We can't let conservatives and Republicans get away with painting us in a corner and mischaracterizing who we are and what we stand for."

The incendiary interview appeared on the same day the pessimistic National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq was leaked. And the two events provided an opportune moment to strike, Ms. Finney said.

Soon after the "Fox News Sunday" telecast, Mr. Dean mentioned both items in a combative statement. And the Democratic National Committee followed up Mr. Dean's statement with an e-mail fundraising appeal, complete with a YouTube link to the interview.

DOJ_NMG_0072567

"I think you're seeing the beginning of an alternative Democratic approach," a desire to strike back hard, said Mr. Begala, a former Clinton adviser.

"Clinton tapped into something in the Democratic zeitgeist," Mr. Begala said. "We're really tired of being bullied, particularly by Fox."

Democrats have believed, nearly from the moment Fox News began in October of 1996, that the news channel was institutionally biased against them. Fox News officials have disputed such charges, saying the network is merely a corrective to what they contend is a pervasive liberal bias in the news media.

Nonetheless, most Democrats have believed the network could not be ignored. If no one appeared on their shows, who would make the Democratic case? The cable news channel, despite a fall-off in ratings over the past year, still towers over its competitors. And although the viewers who regularly watch Fox News are more likely to be Republican, Democrats and independents still turn up in significant numbers — 20 percent and 17 percent, respectively, compared with 34 percent who are Republicans — according to a recent survey from the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

Swing voters are important in some states, particularly the Northeast. How they react to the Democrats' more confrontational approach could help determine how far the Democrats get in their efforts to gain control of the House and Senate.

Some Democrats said they believe that a more muscular approach in taking on the Republicans could help them grab onto an issue that has been an Achilles' heel for the Democrats in recent elections: national security.

And that couldn't make some Republicans happier. "I think it puts national security front and center and reminds people that this administration is taking the fight to the terrorists and recognizes the threat America faces," something the Democrats do not, said Danny Diaz, Republican National Committee spokesman.

The Republican National Committee is doing its bit to spread that point of view. After the Clinton interview, it sent talking points to its grassroots membership and to the news media, and ramped up efforts to book people on TV and radio programs to comment on the debate.

And Fox News executives have not seemed to mind furnishing screen time to Democrats so they can bash the network. (Roger Ailes, the chairman and chief executive of Fox News and Fox Television Stations, was unavailable to comment for this article.)

After all, the ratings don't lie.

The first three days of the week saw primetime and daily increases of 20 percent and 13 percent, respectively, compared with the average over the previous four weeks. And "Fox News Sunday" got its best ratings in three years.

Pastors Guiding Voters To GOP (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

The Christian right seeks out members who might not go to the polls. The focus is issues, but some leaders don't oppose endorsement.

With a pivotal election five weeks away, leaders on the religious right have launched an all-out drive to get Christians from pew to voting booth. Their target: the nearly 30 million Americans who attend church at least once a week but did not vote in 2004.

Their efforts at times push legal limits on church involvement in partisan campaigns. That is by design. With control of Congress at stake Nov. 7, those guiding the movement say they owe it to God and to their own moral principles to do everything they can to keep social conservatives in power.

Preachers "ought to put their toe right on the line," said Mathew D. Staver, founder of Liberty Counsel, a nonprofit law firm that supports conservative Christian causes.

The Rev. Rick Scarborough, a leading evangelical in Texas, has recruited 5,000 "patriot pastors" nationwide to promote an agenda that aligns neatly with Republican platforms. "We urge them to avoid legal entanglement, but there are times in a pastor's life when he needs to take a biblical stand," Scarborough said. "Our higher calling is to Christ."

The campaign encourages individual pastors to use sermons, Bible studies and rallies to drive Christians to the polls — and, by implication or outright endorsement, to Republican candidates. One online guide to discussing the election in church, produced by the Focus on the Family ministry, offers this tip: If a congregant says her top concerns are healthcare and national security, suggest that Jesus would make abortion and gay marriage priorities.

At a recent rally in Pennsylvania, Focus on the Family founder James C. Dobson told a crowd of 3,000 that it would be "downright frightening" if Republicans lost control of Congress. If there's a good Christian on the ballot, he said, failing to vote "would be a sin."

The law restricting political activity of churches and charities dates to 1954, when then-Sen. Lyndon B. Johnson pushed it through in a pique of anger over a nonprofit's effort to derail his reelection. Tax-exempt organizations, including churches, may not participate or intervene in political campaigns on behalf of any candidate. Intervention is broadly defined as "any and all activities that favor or oppose one or more candidate for public office," according to the Internal Revenue Service.

That sounds straightforward. In practice, though, there are many ways around the restriction, as the faithful recognize.

"If the pastor is doing the right job, the people will automatically vote for the right person," said Gale Wollenberg, who belongs to a conservative evangelical church in Topeka, Kan.

Perhaps the biggest loophole is that churches can campaign on policy issues — even if that effort benefits a particular candidate. Scarborough, for instance, has spent a great deal of time far from his Texas parish, rallying Christian voters against an initiative promoting embryonic stem-cell research in Missouri. At his events, Scarborough makes a point not to mention Missouri's Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who is in a tight fight for reelection.

But in private, he says candidly that he expects — and hopes — his efforts will give Talent a boost. "If a pro-life candidate benefits from Christians being involved, to God be the glory," Scarborough said.

Pastors can further help their favored candidates by distributing "issue-oriented" voter guides in church, a tactic used for years among secular (often left-leaning) groups such as the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People and adapted to faith communities by the Christian Coalition in the 1990s.

The voter pamphlets are supposed to be neutral, but often present issues through a distinctly partisan lens. A guide distributed by a conservative group in Minnesota in 2004 laid out the candidates' views on aborting "unborn babies." One produced this year by the liberal evangelical group Sojourners describes immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops as the only way to bring peace to Iraq.

Pastors have a right to work directly for candidates on their own time, as long as they don't use church resources. In a recent article aimed at evangelical preachers, Staver wrote that they "should feel free" to go even further and endorse a candidate from the pulpit because he thought the IRS law was unconstitutional. He repeatedly noted that the IRS had rarely sanctioned churches. The Church at Pierce Creek in Binghamton, N.Y., is the only one ever to lose its tax-exempt certification, for sponsoring newspaper ads that opposed presidential candidate Bill Clinton.

Far more often, IRS agents resolve complaints by training church leaders to avoid future missteps, said Lois G. Lerner, who directs the IRS unit for tax-exempt groups. In 2004, the IRS resolved dozens of complaints this way, including such blatant violations as churches donating to a candidate's campaign or placing political signs on their property.

Given the slim chance of serious sanction, "I encourage pastors to exchange their muzzles for megaphones," Staver wrote in the Rev. Jerry Falwell's monthly newspaper, the National Liberty Journal.

Political preaching has been particularly fervent this season in Ohio, where two conservative mega-churches have promoted the Republican candidate for governor, J. Kenneth Blackwell. They've featured him in at least six rallies that blended patriotic appeals with Christian revival.

Yet the latest poll shows Blackwell trailing by 19 points. In part, that's because Ohio voters seem to be in an anti-Republican mood, after scandals involving state GOP politicians. It also shows that a pastor's influence only goes so far.

Many on the Christian right credit their aggressive mobilization, similar to this fall's campaign, with securing President Bush's reelection. And turnout among evangelical voters did jump 9% from 2000 to 2004.

But two religious groups that heavily back Democrats also came out in droves: Turnout was up 15% among Jews and 13% among mainline Protestants who attend liberal churches, according to surveys conducted by John C. Green, a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life. Overall turnout was up 4 points.

"It's really difficult to parse out" the effectiveness of the religious right's mobilization in 2004 "because it was such an intense campaign," Green said. "It does seem to bear fruit, but it varies a great deal from congregation to congregation."

Church-based campaigning may have been most influential in voters' choice of candidate. Bush won 78% of the evangelical vote in 2004, up from 68% in his first presidential bid. And evangelicals were far more likely than any other group of voters to say that religion was the most important factor in their political thinking.

Voter education from the church "can be enormously effective," said Colin Hanna, who directs the Pennsylvania Pastors Network. The group of 850 seeks to mobilize voters against "abortion and other evils," according to its website.

Some of this fall's efforts are aimed at energizing politically active but disillusioned Republicans who might otherwise stay home. But Hanna is particularly eager to reach the 30 million regular churchgoers, and an overlapping group of 19 million evangelicals, who did not vote in 2004. Their indifference to politics is "either a tragedy or a scandal," he said, but he's certain it can be overcome.

Liberals, too, see potential in mingling faith and politics. Black churches have a long history of political activism from the pulpit, dating to the civil rights movement — but their efforts did not boost voter turnout in 2004. This time around, other Christians, including liberal Catholics, are jumping in to try to energize the religious left.

They plan to distribute more than 1 million voter guides urging Christians to evaluate candidates based on issues such as poverty and global warming. A new consulting firm, Common Good Strategies, aims to help Democratic candidates make stronger pitches to communities of faith.

For the most part, however, the left is far behind the right: "They've got organization and discipline that we don't really have yet," said Jack Pannell of Sojourners. "It may take us a generation."

With both the left and the right pursuing faith-based strategies, the IRS issued a warning in February that churches may be in danger of becoming "arms of political campaigns and parties." Agents are looking into about 40 reported violations by churches and other tax-exempt nonprofits. A few are holdovers from 2004, including the high-profile probe into an antiwar sermon at a liberal Pasadena church. But new allegations continue to come in at a brisk clip.

Liberal clergy in Ohio have filed a protest about the pastors' efforts on behalf of Blackwell. On the right, the website http://www.ratoutachurch.org is recruiting volunteers to report partisan activity from the pulpit that favors Democrats.

Melissa Rogers, a visiting professor of religion and public policy at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, N.C., says she expects more complaints as the election approaches. In their zeal to bring politics into the pews, some religious leaders "have made a decision to walk on the razor's edge of the law," she said. "Or over the edge."

The Inside Agitator (NYT)

By Matt Bai

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Not all states are equal on an election map, and Alaska is one of those less populous states — like Kansas or Idaho or Alabama — that national Democrats almost never bother to visit. For one thing, just getting there presents a logistical ordeal: the journey from Washington takes as long as it would to reach, say, Nigeria, and even then you sometimes need a hydroplane to get around. And more to the point, there aren't a whole lot of people to see once you get there. Registered Republicans outnumber Democrats by a margin of 2 to 1 in oil-crazed Alaska, which hasn't sent a Democrat to the House or Senate in more than 30 years. To put it another way, there were more Democrats in Central Park for the Dave Matthews concert a few years back than there are in the entire state of Alaska — all 656,000 square miles of it.

It seemed somewhat bizarre, then, when Howard Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, chose to make the long odyssey to Alaska at the end of May, near what was the beginning of one of the most intense and closely contested national election campaigns in memory, when every other Democrat in Washington was talking about potentially decisive states like Ohio, Pennsylvania and Connecticut. It was also strange that no one in Democratic Washington seemed to know he was going. Although I had been following Dean closely for months, I found out about the trip accidentally and invited myself along — an intrusion that Dean seemed merely to tolerate. We met up first in Las Vegas, where he was making appearances with Harry Reid, the Senate minority leader. Dean, who enjoys his image as an unpretentious New Englander, is given to finding his own flights on discount Web sites, so it's sometimes hard for even his own staff to track his itinerary. On the morning we left for Alaska, Dean went missing for a good half-hour. It turned out that he was in the business center of the MGM Grand, where he had been trying to figure out how to print his boarding pass but somehow ended up in an impromptu game of online backgammon with a guy who claimed to be in China.

Touching down in Anchorage, we were greeted by Jonathan Teeters, a 25-year-old former offensive lineman at the University of Idaho who had been hired to help the state party begin to organize Democrats. It took less than 10 minutes, as Teeters drove us through a pounding rainstorm to the state headquarters, for Dean, seated in front, to unleash his usual brand of havoc on a state unaccustomed to it. First, he absently asked Teeters what kind of radio interviews he would be doing during his 24-hour stay and was told that he was booked on the local Air America affiliate, the only liberal radio option in town. This is what party chairmen get paid to do — rally the faithful, collect their money and urge them to vote.

"Bull," Dean snapped, using a slightly more elongated version of the term.

"Huh?" Chris Canning, Dean's personal aide, suddenly looked up from a loose-leaf binder. He seemed to think he had misheard.

"I'm not going to do that," Dean replied firmly, craning his neck to address Canning in the back seat. "I didn't come all the way up here just to talk to people who already agree with us. I want to talk to everyone else. I'm fine with doing Air America, but we have to do something else too. Isn't there some conservative show we can do?" Teeters warned that the few right-wing shows in town could get nasty for the chairman. “If you can set something else up too, great,” Dean said with finality. “Otherwise, I won’t do Air America.”

Then Dean wanted to know how many organizers the state party now had on the ground, and Teeters told him there was just one: Teeters himself. The D.N.C. created his job — along with a position for a communications director — last year as part of Dean’s signature program, known as the 50-state strategy. Under this program, the national party is paying for hundreds of new organizers and press aides for the state parties, many of which have been operating on the edge of insolvency. The idea is to hire mostly young, ambitious activists who will go out and build county and precinct organizations to rival Republican machines in every state in the country. “We’re going to be in places where the Democratic Party hasn’t been in 25 years,” Dean likes to say. “If you don’t show up in 60 percent of the country, you don’t win, and that’s not going to happen anymore.”

In paying for two new staffers, Dean had, virtually overnight, doubled the size of Alaska’s beleaguered state party, which used to consist of only an executive director and a part-time fund-raiser. But now, as Dean considered the vastness of the state’s landscape, he decided that one organizer wasn’t enough. “In most states, we have three or four,” Dean said, thinking out loud. “Seems like you should really have more. We should be able to find that money in the budget.”

That night, after meeting with Dean at the sad little storefront office that houses the state party, Alaska’s party chairman, Jake Metcalfe, announced to 400 assembled Democrats at a fund-raiser that Dean had just promised to hire an additional organizer for the state. The ballroom erupted in grateful applause as Dean sat there beaming. The members of his staff, gently rolling their eyes, began calling back to Washington, warning the political staff that they would need to find the money for yet another salary in, of all places, Alaska.

In just a few hours, Dean had nicely demonstrated why so many leading Democrats in Washington wish he would spend even more time in Alaska — preferably hiking the tundra for a few months, without a cellphone. It’s not that Democrats in Congress don’t like the idea of building better organizations in the party’s forgotten rural outposts. Everyone in Democratic politics agrees, in principle, that party organizations in states like Alaska could use help from Washington to become competitive again, as opposed to the rusted-out machines they have become. But doing so, at this particular moment and in this particular way, would seem to suck away critical resources at a time when every close House and Senate race has the potential to decide who will control the nation’s post-election agenda, and when the party should, theoretically, be focused on mobilizing its base voters — the kind of people who live in big cities and listen religiously to Air America.

It’s true that adding a second organizer in Alaska will cost the national party only a modest sum, maybe $35,000 this year, but that same money could pay the salaries for canvassers in Pennsylvania or Connecticut, where a few thousand votes could mean the difference between swearing in Speaker Hastert or Speaker Pelosi next January. Overall, Dean’s investment in state parties could cost the D.N.C. as much as $8 million this year, every dime of which could be crucial when you consider that the Republican National Committee says it will pour as much as $60 million into local races to defend its Congressional majorities. (The D.N.C. has pledged to spend $12 million on this fall’s races.) With the president’s approval ratings stuck around 40 percent, and polls suggesting that the Democrats may have a real chance of rolling back 12 years of Republican rule, numerous Democratic insiders are privately and, at times, publicly deriding the 50-state strategy as an indulgence that could cost them their best and last opportunity to sweep away the Bush era, once and for all.

This conflict between the party’s chairman and its elected leaders (who tried mightily to keep local activists from giving him the job in the first place) might be viewed as a petty disagreement. But in fact, it represents the deepening of a rift that has its roots in the 2004 presidential campaign — a rift that raises the fundamental issue of what role, if any, a political party should play in 21st-century American life. Dean ran for president, and then for chairman, as an outsider who would seize power from the party’s interest-group-based establishment and return it to the grass roots. And while he has gamely tried to play down his differences with elected Democrats since becoming chairman, it seems increasingly obvious that Dean is pursuing his own agenda for the party — an agenda that picks up, in many ways, where his renegade presidential campaign left off. Now, at power lunches and private meetings, perplexed Washington Democrats, the kind of people who have lorded over the party apparatus for decades, find themselves pondering the same bewildering questions. What on earth can Howard Dean be thinking? Does he really care about winning in November, or is he after something else?

The mere fact that Democrats would consider a “50-state strategy” to be novel — as if a national party might reasonably aspire to something less — says volumes about the rapid deterioration of the party that was, for most of the last century, America’s dominant political force. Back when Democrats were the established majority, the state parties were run by bosses who doled out jobs and delivered votes, while the national party, functioning as a subsidiary of whoever happened to occupy the Oval Office, worried about electing presidents. For decades, the party claimed a sizable majority of the nation’s governors, senators and congressmen, and in every one of the states where it controlled those seats, there was a centralized organization — a party “infrastructure,” in the parlance of today’s activists — whose job it was to recruit candidates and make sure voters got to the polls.

All that began to change with the social movements of the 1960's and 70's, which redefined the Democratic Party, in the minds of many rural voters, as mostly a coalition of urban blacks and high-minded intellectuals. From the Deep South up through the populist Plains, voters began abandoning Democratic candidates at the polls, and the old state machines found themselves out of power and starved for patronage. Slowly, the parties in these states atrophied, laying off staff members and allowing their network of local volunteers to dwindle. "We were on the verge of extinction, pretty much," Barry Rubin, the executive director of the Nebraska Democratic Party, told me recently.

When Dean took over the D.N.C. last year, he sent assessment teams, made up of veteran field organizers and former state party officials, to every state. A typical assessment report on one rural state — I was allowed to see the report only on the condition that I not name the state involved — bluntly stated that its local activists were "aging" and that its central committee was "dysfunctional." In most states, there were hardly any county or precinct organizations to speak of. More than half the states lacked any communications staff, meaning that no one was there to counter the Republican talking points that passed from Washington to the state parties to the local media with a kind of automated precision.

For the Democrats, winning presidential elections came to mean doing so without any help from the South or West, and that, in turn, meant cobbling together a relatively small number of so-called battleground states rather than running a truly national campaign. The D.N.C. quit doing much of anything in conservative rural states, and the party's presidential candidates didn't bother stopping by on their way to more promising terrain. Every four years, the national party became obsessed with "targeting" — that is, focusing all its efforts on 15 or 20 winnable urban states and pounding them with expensive TV ads. The D.N.C.'s defining purpose was to raise the money for those ads. The national party became, essentially, a service organization for a few hundred wealthy donors, who treated it like their private political club.

None of this was much on Howard Dean's mind when he set about running for president in 2003 with drab notions of health-care reform and a balanced budget; by the time he made his infamous "scream" speech in Des Moines a year later, however, Dean had become a folk hero for marginalized liberals. How this happened has been largely misunderstood. Dean has been credited with inciting an Internet-driven rebellion against his own party, but, in fact, he was more the accidental vehicle of a movement that was already emerging. The rise of Moveon.org, blogs and "meet-ups" was powered to some extent by the young, tech-savvy activists on both coasts who were so closely associated in the public mind with Dean's campaign. But the fast-growing Internet community was also a phenomenon of liberal enclaves in more conservative states, where disenchanted Democrats, mostly baby boomers, had long felt outnumbered and abandoned. Meet-ups for Dean drew overflow crowds in Austin, Tex., and Birmingham, Ala.; what the Web did was to connect disparate groups of Democratic voters who didn't live in targeted states and who had watched helplessly as Republicans overran their communities. These Democrats opposed the war in Iraq, but they were also against a party that seemed to care more about big donors and swing states than it did about them. Attracted to Dean's fiery defiance of the Washington establishment, these voters adopted him as their cause before he had ever heard of a blog.

"What our campaign was about, not that I set out to make it this way, was empowering people," Dean told me recently. "The 'you have the power' stuff — that just arose spontaneously when I realized what incredible potential there was for people to get active who had given up on the political process because they didn't think either party was helping them."

Over the course of the campaign, Dean turned into an apostle, in politics, of the economic concept of "disintermediation" — the idea that, in the Internet age, voters could connect with candidates, and with one another, without the party acting as the conduit. In a sense, this is what his candidacy was all about. He still believed, though, that only a strong national party could mobilize voters on Election Day. At the Democratic convention in Boston, six months after he dropped out of the presidential race, he met with frustrated delegations from 18 "untargeted" states, meaning that the national party and its candidate, John Kerry, had completely ignored them. Dean was appalled. "The best window we have to talk to Democrats, the time when they pay the most attention, is in the presidential campaign," Dean told me, "and we were just saying to the people of those 18 states, 'We're not interested in you.' You cannot be a national party if you say that to anybody. Anybody."

It didn't take long, after the election, for a new band of Democratic outsiders — some inspired by Dean's campaign, others not — to begin asserting themselves on the local level. In Maryland, Terry Lierman, a venture capitalist who had been one of Dean's campaign-finance chairmen, ran for state party chairman, despite having had no previous involvement in local Democratic politics, and won. In North Carolina, Jerry Meek, a 35-year-old lawyer, took over the state party on a promise of re-energizing county organizations, even though both the governor and the state's leading national figure, John Edwards, strongly backed an inside candidate. Colorado and Arkansas, too, rejected incumbent chairmen in favor of obscure newcomers. In Texas, Fred Baron, a trial lawyer and Democratic contributor, established a privately financed effort to rebuild the Texas state party from the ground up — without the party's consent.

Meanwhile, the bloggers who supported Dean were taking up the same cause, inciting sporadic local rebellions. Chris Bowers, an influential blogger on the leftist site MyDD.com, demanded that the national party focus less on targeting races and more on recruiting candidates to run in every Congressional district in America. Bowers's call for individual activists to overwhelm and rebuild their local parties became a rallying point for the emerging Netroots party-reform movement. Setting his own example, Bowers got himself elected the captain of his local precinct in Philadelphia's 27th Ward and then won a seat on the party's state committee.

The question for Dean was how to harness and aggregate this state-by-state uprising that he had, by example, helped to create. Immediately after dropping out of the presidential race, he formed a political action committee called Democracy for America, whose mission was to raise money for "progressive" candidates seeking local offices, from mayoral and Congressional seats down to the local water board. This was revolt on a small scale, however, and Dean continued to ponder some grander strategy. He admits now that at the time he considered forming a third party, deciding, ultimately, that such ventures never went far in American politics.

Like Ronald Reagan, whose activist insurgency during the 1976 primaries failed to topple the Republican president, Gerald Ford, Dean might have begun work instantly on the next presidential race, building on his support among the Democratic base. But unlike Reagan, Dean had always exhibited more passion for campaigning among the grass roots than he did for the prospect of actually being the nation's president; he seemed less focused on changing the country than he did on changing the party. And the best way to do that, he concluded, was to run for chairman.

Dean, the celebrity candidate in a crowded if rather underwhelming field, campaigned on what seemed like a brazenly political promise to lavish spoils on the forgotten state parties, whose local activists held most of the votes for the chairmanship. The outcome was never much in doubt, although some skeptical Democrats refused to support him. Metcalfe, the Alaska chairman, told me that he supported Simon Rosenberg, a party strategist. "Simon was saying, 'I don't know if I can fund all the states,' and I thought that was honest," Metcalfe said. "Dean said he would give money to all the states, and I thought, That's not going to happen — not out here. I thought I was being realistic. He proved me wrong."

There were awkward moments during Dean's first months in Washington, early in 2005, when he found himself working among the party leaders he had repeatedly maligned. In his first official visit to the newly renovated D.N.C. building, Dean was greeted in the lobby by his predecessor, Terry McAuliffe, a close friend of the Clintons and probably the most gifted fund-raiser in the party's history, whom Dean's supporters had long pilloried as the personification of a party run by hacks and obsessed with corporate money. McAuliffe, a man of maddeningly good cheer, pointed to the new wall-size glass building dedication in the lobby, which featured McAuliffe's name at the very top, followed by a list of contributors. "Now, Howard," he said, "don't you go chiseling that down."

Not long after, Dean sat down with the party's Congressional leaders, Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi, who had tried, ineptly and with almost comical desperation, to find a candidate who could stop him from becoming chairman. Reid and Pelosi promised to work with Dean, but they asked him to resist speaking out on key policy positions and acting as if he were the party's public face. In other words, Dean would be doing everyone in Washington a favor if he would just stay out of sight and raise money.

The latter goal proved challenging. The truth was that neither Dean nor the aides he brought with him from the presidential campaign knew much about the inner workings of the national party, and some of what they assumed they understood, based on contempt for anything they perceived to be the status quo, turned out to be more complicated than it first appeared. Determined to break the grip of millionaires on the party apparatus, Dean's team came into the D.N.C. with a plan to raise huge sums of money online, as Dean had done during the presidential campaign. Dean didn't bother reaching out to many of the party's top contributors, who were as suspicious of him as he was of them. But getting small-dollar donors excited about an established party proved a far more arduous task than getting them excited about an insurgent campaign. The situation grew perilous until, several months into his term, Dean relented and brought in one of McAuliffe's old acolytes, Jody Trapasso, to get the fund-raising operation in order. Trapasso introduced Dean to the big spenders, pushing him to devote a few hours of every day to making calls until the checks started rolling in.

Dean was discovering that he needed to find some Washington insiders to trust, after all — and he found them in what seemed an unlikely quarter. In his primary campaign in 2003, Dean struck up a friendship with Tina Flournoy, a well-respected operative who worked with Al Gore and Joe Lieberman during the 2000 presidential race and who now held a senior position at the American Federation of Teachers, one of the party's most influential unions. Flournoy was also a charter member of an informal dinner clique whose members referred to themselves, good-naturedly, as the Colored Girls. The core group included several African-American women who had reached the highest echelons of Democratic politics. Donna Brazile, the veteran organizer who managed Gore's presidential campaign, was a regular; so were Minyon Moore, a consultant who worked in the Clinton White House; Yolanda Caraway, a public-relations specialist; and Leah Daughtry, who was McAuliffe's chief of staff (and who was retained in that job by Dean). Guest speakers at their dinners frequently included probable presidential candidates and top members of Congress. During the race for chairman, Flournoy brought Dean in as well, and he quickly clicked with the group.

Dean tapped Flournoy to run his transition team, and although she later returned to her job at the teachers' union, it is now common knowledge among Democrats in Washington that few big decisions are made at the D.N.C. without Flournoy's approval. The Colored Girls, as a whole, are unusually influential with Dean. It's an odd pairing, given that Dean governed one of the whitest states in the country, but what Dean and these women share is resentment, sometimes subtle and sometimes not, of the elite Washington Democrats who have always run the national party. Activists like Flournoy and Brazile have attained star status in the party, but they have never thought of themselves as insiders. This is partly because they are black women in a party dominated by white men — men who often seem to prize them more as symbols of diversity than for their expertise. But it is also because the women came up in Democratic politics as local field operatives — that is, as young organizers who knocked on doors, principally for Jesse Jackson — in an era when all of the power in the party was concentrated in the hands of the Washington consultants who made TV ads and polled the electorate. Dean came to Washington vowing to take power from the insiders and give it, instead, to ground-level activists. "That's our loyalty to Dean," Brazile says. "He gets it."

With help from Flournoy and the others, Dean cultivated an outsiders' culture inside the D.N.C. building. (It is more than symbolic that Dean himself never moved to Washington; he stays at the Capitol Hill Suites a few days a week before heading back to Burlington, Vt.) Dean's political staff hails largely from the state organizations, rather than from Washington; his political director, Pam Womack, formerly ran the Virginia party and the National Governors Association. Top Washington reporters and senior aides on Capitol Hill frequently complain that they now have trouble getting their calls to the D.N.C. returned, while state activists rave about the new responsiveness at headquarters.

Flournoy also introduced Dean to the pollster Cornell Belcher, who became a constant fixture inside Dean's D.N.C. Belcher, a deep thinker and jazz aficionado who wears suit coats with unlaced Converse sneakers, had been an outsider, too, in the sense that he didn't fit into the capital's pinstriped culture and wasn't well known before Dean started taking him to meetings on the Hill. In public appearances, Dean almost always refers proudly to the fact that he has retained a "37-year-old African-American pollster" to shake up the staid Washington crowd. In fact, the main theme of Belcher's work concerns the white middle-class men and women who have deserted the Democrats in recent years. These voters care more about their faith and the character of their communities than they do about individual issues, Belcher says, and Democrats do better with rural and small-town voters when they frame their positions as values rather than as policy prescriptions. This is not an entirely new insight, but to Dean it is critically important. In his mind, it means that any voter in any state can be a Democrat, if only you bother to talk to him, and if only you make the right kind of argument.

The ultimate manifestation of this philosophy, of course, is the 50-state strategy, under which, for the first time, the national party has begun directly financing the staff at all but a few state headquarters. It's probably fair to say that if there hadn't been a quagmire in Iraq or a Hurricane Katrina — if the White House's political fortunes hadn't imploded over the last year — the 50-state strategy would not have aroused much opposition among Washington Democrats. It was only when they realized that they actually had a chance to take back the House, and maybe the Senate too, that Democratic leaders began to ask, with increasing urgency, what it was that Dean was doing with all the party's money.

This fall, the question of who will control Congress is likely to come down to about 40 Congressional districts and some dozen states with close Senate races, including such perennial battlegrounds as Pennsylvania, Ohio and Missouri. Candidates raise most of their campaign funds themselves, but they rely on additional money from Washington to pay for voter-turnout programs and last-minute TV ads. Each party has three separate entities to raise and disburse those dollars: a committee for Senate races, a second committee for House campaigns and the national party headquarters.

For Democrats, the fund-raising environment has improved over the last two years, as Bush has blundered from one legislative or foreign-policy disaster to another and as Democratic donors have seen the prospect of controlling at least one house of Congress — a notion that seemed unthinkable in 2004 — become a possibility. The Democrats who lead their party's Senate and House campaign committees, Senator Chuck Schumer of New York and Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, respectively, have done their parts to make the party competitive. The Democratic Senate committee, which narrowly outperformed its Republican counterpart in 2004, has opened up an even wider margin in this election cycle. The Democratic House committee, which raised only half as much as the G.O.P.'s committee did two years ago, has closed that gap somewhat and, at last count, had virtually the same amount in the bank as its rival. Over at the D.N.C., however, it's a very different story. In 2004, the D.N.C., under McAuliffe, actually raised slightly more money than the Republican National Committee. Since Dean has taken over, however, the R.N.C. has taken an almost 2-to-1 lead in fund-raising, and going into the fall campaign it had more than $39 million stashed away, compared with just over $11 million for the Democrats. For Schumer and Emanuel, this discrepancy between the two parties is like a train coming down the track, and they're the ones sitting in its path. The R.N.C. will dump tens of millions of dollars into individual House and Senate races in the closing weeks, through TV ads and get-out-the-vote operations, and Democrats won't be able to counter it.

DOJ_NMG_0072574

In a city rife with unchecked egos, few politicians exhibit the kind of unbridled self-assuredness for which both Emanuel and Schumer are known; to call the two of them pushy would be like calling Tom Cruise excitable. Emanuel, a triathlete who was

Bill Clinton's deputy chief of staff and enforcer, speaks in violent bursts of shrapnel, profanities flying in all directions. Schumer, like his native Brooklyn, can be, by turns, charming or downright dangerous, depending on which route delivers him faster to his destination.

Before this midterm election-year began, but not long after Dean became party head, Emanuel and Schumer decided that if Dean wasn't going to raise anywhere near as much money as his rivals at Republican headquarters, then he ought to at least give them whatever resources he could muster. They went to work on Dean, pleading with him to transfer as much as $10 million to the two committees to help them respond to the Republican TV barrage. Emanuel told anyone who would listen that back in 1994, when Republicans sensed a similarly historic mood swing in the electorate, the R.N.C. kicked in something like $20 million in cash to its Congressional committees. (This argument was impressive, but not exactly true; the R.N.C. spent roughly that much on federal and local races combined in 1994, and little, if any, of that money went directly to the committees themselves.) Dean categorically refused to ante up. Having opposed the very idea of targeting a small number of states and races, he wasn't about to divert money from his long-term strategy — what he calls the "unsexy" work of rebuilding the party's infrastructure — to pay for a bunch of TV ads in Ohio. He wanted to win the 2006 elections as much as anyone, Dean told them, and he intended to help where he could. But Democratic candidates and their campaign committees were doing just fine on fund-raising, and the party couldn't continue giving in to the temptation to spend everything it had on every election cycle — no matter how big a checkbook the Republicans were waving around.

For Schumer, Emanuel and their allies, this rejection was irritating enough. When they heard the stories of how Dean was actually spending the party's cash, however, it was almost more than they could take. Dean was paying for four organizers in Mississippi, where there wasn't a single close House race, but he had sent only three new hires to Pennsylvania, which had a governor's race, a Senate campaign and four competitive House races. Emanuel said he was all for expanding the party's reach into rural states — roughly half the House seats he was targeting were in states like Texas, Indiana and Kentucky, after all — but he wanted the D.N.C. to focus on individual districts that Democrats could actually win, as opposed to just spreading money around aimlessly. The D.N.C. was spending its money not only in Alaska and Hawaii, but in the U.S. Virgin Islands as well. Democratic insiders began to rail against this wacky and expensive 50-state plan. "He says it's a long-term strategy," Paul Begala, the Democratic strategist, said during an appearance on CNN in May. "What he has spent it on, apparently, is just hiring a bunch of staff people to wander around Utah and Mississippi and pick their nose."

The disagreement with Emanuel and Schumer frayed Dean's already fragile détente with Washington's Democratic elite. Since coming to Washington, Dean had worked hard to forge a level of trust with Congressional leaders, subjugating some of his more combative impulses. In particular, he had formed what he thought of as a genuine friendship with Harry Reid. Nonetheless, the party's elected leaders and their legions of consultants remained uneasy about Dean. They suspected, correctly, that he strongly sympathized with outside forces — militant bloggers, disillusioned donors, Moveon.org — that were fomenting rebellion at the grass roots. It didn't help that Dean's younger brother, Jim, a onetime salesman who had taken over the PAC Dean started, Democracy for America, was out there proselytizing for insurgent candidates like Paul Hackett, whom Schumer eventually muscled out of a Senate primary in Ohio, and Ned Lamont, who upended Joe Lieberman in Connecticut. While campaign laws prohibited the Dean brothers from coordinating their activities, Washington Democrats assumed that Jim Dean's job was to carry out the chairman's subversive wishes.

In separate conversations, Reid and Pelosi each asked Dean — Reid in his quiet way, Pelosi more stridently — to send some money to the two campaign committees. Dean rebuffed them too. But he did promise that the D.N.C. would help with get-out-the vote campaigns. Emanuel and Schumer then began pressing Dean for a specific field plan — that is, a blueprint for how the D.N.C. would spend money on mobilizing voters, and where. The argument finally exploded during a meeting in May among Dean, Emanuel and Schumer in Dean's third-floor office at the D.N.C. Emanuel told Dean that the 50-state strategy was a waste of money; Dean shot back that winning elections wasn't only about TV ads. Emanuel wanted to know what Dean was doing to help in California's 50th district, where voters were about to hold a special election. When Dean said he had organizers on the ground, Emanuel erupted. <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="41705;159602">"Who?" he demanded. "Tell me their names!" Emanuel, who had a vote at the Capitol, stormed out of the meeting, cursing as he walked down the hall. </object.title>

By now, the situation had as much to do with clashing egos as it did with the elections. "The issue here is not our field plan," Dean told me. "The issue is an issue of control. I'm the new guy on the block, and they thought they were going to get me writing the check." For his part, Emanuel, who had been a pivotal adviser in several national elections (he was the model for the character Josh Lyman in "The West Wing"), seemed annoyed that Dean wouldn't defer to Democrats with more experience. That Dean raised money by talking about the closeness of the 2006 elections — and then spent much of that money in states that had nothing to do with the midterms — made Emanuel, whose office sits a floor below Dean's in the D.N.C. building, want to reach through the tile ceiling and throttle him. “I’m for a long-term strategy,” Emanuel told me, “but I don’t see how you have a long-term strategy if you take a historic election and walk away from it.”

What was remarkable about this fight, as it dragged on throughout the summer, was just how public it became, and the extent to which it seemed to be pulling influential Democrats into its vortex. Bren Simon, a wealthy Democratic patron from Indiana who has entertained virtually every leading Democrat at her second home in Washington, told me that she warned Emanuel and Schumer that she wouldn’t write them any more checks if they didn’t stop fighting Dean over his 50-state strategy. Then there was the morning early in the summer when Brazile ran into Emanuel on the steps of the D.N.C. building and started loudly lecturing him about his attacks on the chairman, in full view of party employees. Emanuel protested that he just wanted to win back the House. Two of the Democratic Party’s leading strategists — one who had helped run the White House, the other who had managed a presidential campaign — stood there barking at each other on the street.

Underneath this clash of field plans and alpha personalities lay a deeper philosophical divide over how you go about rebuilding a party — which was really a dispute about cause and effect. Did you expand the party by winning elections, or did you win elections by expanding the party? Most party insiders had long put their faith in elections first, arguing that the best way to broaden the base of the party was to win more races. Schumer said as much in a written statement that his spokesman forwarded to me in response to my questions about his differences with Dean. “Our long-term goal is the same — a strong Democratic Party,” Schumer stated. “But we” — meaning he and Emanuel — “believe that nothing does more to further that goal in 2006, 2008 and beyond than taking back the House and Senate so that we can implement a Democratic platform.”

Recent history, though, would seem to undercut this theory. In the 1990’s, the Democrats won two presidential elections behind a popular leader, and yet the party didn’t grow. In fact, Democrats lost ground at every level of government except the White House and cemented their position as the party of coastal states. Steadily investing in political activity on the local level, as Republicans have done for years, seems to Dean and his allies a more realistic way for Democrats to expand the electoral map than simply trying, every four years, to piece together the same elusive majorities. Of course, every Democrat in Washington says he’s for expanding the party’s efforts beyond the familiar 18 or 20 battleground states, but only Dean, among his party’s leaders, has been willing to argue that there is a choice involved, that you cannot actually invest for the long term unless you’re willing to forgo some short-term priorities.

It takes courage, Dean told me, to try something new in the face of failure, which is why Washington Democrats were resisting his plan. “I think politicians are incredibly risk-averse, especially legislating politicians,” he said. “This is like deciding to go to a psychiatrist — the risk of staying the same has to be greater than the risk of changing. And right now, in the history of the party, that’s exactly where we are. The risk of doing nothing, the same old thing, is enormous. The risk of trying something new is much smaller. The risk of the 50-state strategy is much smaller than if we continue to do what we’ve been doing.”

But you can accept Dean’s premise and still wonder whether his 50-state strategy is really the best way to go about building the party. Even some Democrats who support Dean’s larger vision have doubts about whether he has built enough accountability into his model for financing state parties. Republicans, as I saw firsthand in Ohio during the 2004 campaign, demand certain metrics of their local organizers. Field workers are expected to sign up so many new voters, or knock on so many doors, by a given date, and people who don’t meet their quotas and deadlines can find themselves replaced — even if they’re volunteers. Republican staffs in the states are required to take part in an unrelenting succession of conference calls with Washington.

By contrast, Jonathan Teeters, the 25-year-old activist I met in Anchorage, told me that he wished he spoke more often with his superiors at the D.N.C. “It’s kind of an as-needed thing,” he said. “As far as I can tell, they trust me to get it done. As long as I’m staying in contact, and as long as we’re having success, that’s how they know we’re getting it done.” When I asked Teeters how he knew if he was having success, he mentioned having attracted several hundred people to “Democratic reunion” barbecues across the state. “The first thing we have to do is create this energy, so people know we’re here and we’re active,” he said.

Dean has no illusions that the 50-state strategy will succeed in every state. “They’re going to make terrible mistakes — I know that,” Dean said. “You never make changes without people making mistakes.” He said he had visited 46 states as chairman, and each time he goes into a state, he gets some sense of the progress on the ground.

Unlike past chairmen, who mostly traveled to see donors and do some interviews, Dean spends a fair amount of time visiting party offices and mingling with grass-roots activists. His trips to more rural, conservative states, however, the kind of places where a sizable segment of voters go to church and follow Nascar, also raise some complicated issues for his fellow Democrats. Dean is treated like a Beatle by rank-and-file activists who have rarely seen a party leader in their midst, but for the rest of the country, Dean is that lefty who howled on national TV. Some Democratic governors and candidates have avoided Dean when he has been in town, for fear that their opponents would portray them as extremists. Which underscores the peculiar situation of Dean and his 50-state plan: he is the one guy in Washington determined to deliver the Democratic message to every part of the country, but as it turns out, he is also a guy from whom much of America doesn't want to hear it.

It's not that Dean doesn't try his damnedest to make himself palatable to culturally conservative voters. Acting on the advice of Cornell Belcher, his young pollster, he has taken to framing his positions in terms of faith and values, sometimes so transparently that it can make you wince. In Las Vegas, I heard Dean, who is not known to be a religious man, say to a Latino audience, "I don't expect the church to come out for gay marriage, but I do expect that we could say on an issue like this, 'What would Jesus do?' Equal rights under the law is not something that can be abridged by the Democratic Party, because it's really the law under Jesus Christ." The audience stared at him a little blankly, as you might stare at your mechanic if he rolled out from underneath your car and suddenly started speaking Latin.

Fairly or not, Dean has come to embody a species of Democrat that a lot of Americans of both parties find off-putting: the 60's antiwar liberal, reborn with a laptop and a Prius. On the day we landed in Anchorage, Tony Knowles, the former Democratic governor of the state, had just announced that he would run to reclaim the post. This was exciting news for Dean, since he and Knowles had served as governors together, and the two men would be attending the fund-raiser that night. But while we were at the party headquarters, the state party's executive director cautioned Dean, gingerly, that he should probably avoid getting too close to Knowles in public or saying nice things about him from the lectern. "I think he'd prefer to distance himself from the national party as much as he can," the executive director, Mike Coumbe, said.

Later that night, at the fund-raiser, I approached Knowles and asked him if it was true that he felt he needed to put some space between himself and his old friend. "I think they're about to introduce me," Knowles said, glancing helplessly toward the front of the room. "I do want to answer your question." But he was already backing away.

When dean and I last spoke, in August, I wondered aloud if the entire 50-state program wasn't, in a very basic way, inconsistent with the larger philosophy that guided his 2004 campaign. If Dean believed in disintermediation, then why was he spending so much money to strengthen the intermediaries? Weren't the state parties essentially just middlemen between the voters and the Democratic National Committee? What Dean seemed to be creating was a multilevel field organization modeled after the political machines of the 20th century rather than a new party that fostered direct communication between local activists and their leaders in Washington.

"That would be true if we thought we had to be centralized," Dean replied, raising an index finger. In fact, he went on, the Democratic Party needed to be decentralized, so that grass-roots Democrats built relationships with their state parties but had little to do with Washington at all. "State parties are not the intermediaries," he said. "If I get them trained right, they're the principals."

In other words, I suggested, he was talking about "devolving" the national Democratic Party, in the same way that Reagan and other conservative ideologues had always talked about devolving the federal government and returning power to the states. "That's what I want to do," Dean said firmly.

This struck me as a radical idea, and one that went to the heart of what Howard Dean is really thinking. Now that Dean has wrested control of the national party, his real agenda, it seems, is to radically reduce its relevance, in the same way that Grover Norquist and his crowd of conservative activists talk about "starving the beast" of the federal government they now control. Once you understand that, it's easy to understand why Dean isn't troubled by having less cash in the bank than people think he should, and why he isn't concerned about quantifying the success of the state parties he's financing. In Dean's mind, every dollar that goes to Alaska or Mississippi, or even to the Virgin Islands, even if it isn't perfectly utilized, is a dollar that isn't going into the pockets of the Washington syndicate of admen and pollsters who seem to profit more from each election cycle. And that is an end in itself. By shipping the party's money out of Washington as fast as he can collect it, Dean is trying to finish what he started three years ago — namely, the slow dismantling of the Democratic establishment.

This philosophical shift is bound to have consequences for the party's next presidential nominee. Dean argues that the 50-state strategy is actually going to broaden the playing field in 2008. By the time the next nominee is crowned, he says, a field network will already be in place, covering most of the counties and precincts in the United States; flip a switch, and the whole grid will light up with activity, from Baton Rouge to Boise. More than that, rebuilding Democratic ground operations in more states will force Republicans and their nominee to spend millions more dollars in states that the G.O.P. usually takes for granted, dollars that would otherwise be spent in the Midwest or in the pivotal Sun Belt.

This makes some sense, but it's also true that presidential candidates have long relied on the D.N.C. to do two simple things: underwrite TV ads and coordinate extensive field operations in a handful of perennially contested states — so much so, in fact, that every four years the nominee essentially takes over the D.N.C., installing his own strategists and fund-raisers to provide his campaign with air and ground support. If Dean isn't going to relinquish control or shift his resources into battleground states, the next nominee could find himself (or herself) outspent by the R.N.C. — and as piqued at Dean as Emanuel and Schumer are now.

Some more conspiracy-minded Democrats discern in Dean's decentralizing strategy the careful machinations of a shrewd and ambitious politician. After all, if the party's nominee loses in 2008, doesn't that set up Dean, potentially, as the grass-roots choice for 2012? Might this be his real plan — to strengthen the local activists who form his natural base of support while at the same time weakening the Washington apparatus that once tried to derail him?

It's an elegant theory, but it doesn't take into account Dean's basic ambivalence about electoral politics. In Vermont, Dean, a physician and part-time lieutenant governor, turned down the chance to run for governor, taking office only when his predecessor died. He may have run for president, as a former confidant of his once explained it to me, largely because he was looking for something to do. Dean has never evidenced much in the way of Machiavellian ambition. It's easier to imagine him, several years from now, serving as a cabinet secretary, or maybe running a university, than it is to see him rising up to lead a Reagan-like revolt at a raucous nominating convention in Las Vegas or Phoenix.

the more immediate question is whether Dean can make it through this year's elections without becoming a permanent pariah among his party's elected leadership. In September, Dean finally reached a compromise of sorts with Rahm Emanuel. In the end, Dean didn't pull any money from his 50-state strategy, nor did Emanuel successfully pressure him into giving cash directly to the campaign committees. Dean agreed, in principle, to pour about $2.6 million, on top of what he was spending on the 50-state strategy, into field operations in 40 targeted districts. "We have a basic understanding," Emanuel told me, sounding more peeved than conciliatory. "It's not everything I want, but I don't have any time to waste anymore, and I'm not waiting for Godot. I've got to get going." The deal seemed to ensure, at least, that Dean and the House campaign committee would be able to work in harmony through the elections. (Peace talks with Schumer were still going on.) It did not, however, do anything to resolve the underlying, more intractable disagreement: the importance of winning elections versus a longer-term investment in state parties. That argument will continue well after November's referendum on Republican rule.

Nor, clearly, did the compromise do much to endear Dean to his critics in Washington. "I'm not going to be on his holiday mailing list, and he's not going to be on my holiday mailing list," Emanuel snapped at one point during our conversation about Dean. "But this isn't about him or me." If Democrats fall short of retaking the House of Representatives in November, the party's elected leaders will almost certainly blame Dean for the near miss. They will say that he squandered their best chance in more than a decade to control the country. They will say it proves that Dean's risky strategy has badly hurt the party.

And yet, you could make a compelling argument that anything short of total victory in November would prove precisely the opposite. With polls consistently showing voters to be deeply nervous about a protracted war, high gas prices and stunted wages, this is that rare election that should turn less on tactics than on fundamental choices about the direction of the country; in other words, this election season is about the fear and fury of the electorate, not the addition of a few more door-knockers in New Haven or some negative 30-second spot broadcast in Columbus. As the Democratic strategist James Carville told Al Hunt, the Bloomberg News columnist, in August, "If we can't win in this environment, we have to question the whole premise of the party."

Most analysts in both parties now believe that Democrats have better-than-even odds of winning at least the House. But if they don't, rather than dissect the mechanical failures that cost them a few thousand votes here or there, Democrats might be forced to admit, at long last, that there is a structural flaw in their theory of party-building. Even a near miss, at a time of such overwhelming opportunity, would suggest that a national party may not, in fact, be able to win over the long term by fixating on a select group of industrial states while condemning entire regions of the country to what amounts to one-party rule. Which would mean that Howard Dean is right to replant his party's flag in the towns and counties along America's less-traveled highways, even if his plan isn't perfect, and even if he isn't the best messenger to carry it out. As another flawed visionary, the filmmaker Woody Allen, once put it, 80 percent of success is just showing up.

Dean: '08 May Hinge On Race, Immigration (AP)

By John Heilprin

AP, October 1, 2006

Race and immigration could determine the 2008 presidential race, Democratic Party chief Howard Dean told a group of Hispanic leaders Saturday.

Dean said he's trying to encourage the turnout of minority voters who support Democrats, particularly in the Albuquerque, N.M., area, by encouraging their use of mail-in ballots, a tactic he said Republicans have used effectively.

"If that works, we're going to do that in 2008 all over the place, but in the meantime this is a great opportunity for us in 2006," Dean told 225 people attending a luncheon at the party's annual Hispanic leadership summit.

In New Mexico's largely Democratic 1st Congressional District, home to what Dean called a Democratic National Committee pilot project, five-term Republican Rep. Heather Wilson is fighting to get re-elected. Her opponent, Democratic Attorney General Patricia Madrid, grew up in a Hispanic household near the Mexican border.

DOJ_NMG_0072578

Democrats hope to turn back the Republican Party's advances among Hispanic voters in recent years. President Bush's efforts to court Hispanic voters have helped double the GOP's share since 2000.

"We can't afford to have 45 percent of Latino population voting for Republican presidents. That diagram has to change," said Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif.

Dean and Solis said issues such as public education, health care, affordable housing, the minimum wage and immigration protection should continue to be party priorities.

DAVENPORT, Iowa (AP) — Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, a potential presidential candidate for 2008, called on Democrats to embrace the national security debate in the campaign's closing weeks.

"I am happy to have a national security debate with the Republican Party," Obama said Saturday during his second visit in two weeks to Iowa, which traditionally opens the presidential nominating season. "What we need is a tough and smart national security agenda."

Obama said Democrats must stand up to Republicans' strategy of portraying them as weak on national security. He said Republicans "have a lock on the tough and dumb strategy" that Democrats must expose.

"We can't afford to be bullied because there's too much at stake," Obama said. "The only strategy the other side has is fear. That's what you're seeing and you're going to see more of it."

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Sen. Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., on Saturday launched a new TV ad that compares his nearly 18 years in the Senate with challenger Ned Lamont's relative inexperience.

The 30-second ad features a light bulb and a voice that asks: "Still waiting to hear a new idea out of Ned Lamont? Here's an idea for you."

The bulb lights up and the voice continues, "Experience matters."

In a Quinnipiac University poll released Thursday, voters by a margin of 47 percent to 38 percent said Lamont does not have the "right kind of experience" to serve as a U.S. senator.

Lieberman, who was defeated by Lamont in the Democratic primary last month and is now running as an independent, has a 10-point advantage among likely voters in the poll. He leads Lamont 49 percent to 39 percent in a three-way race. Republican Alan Schlesinger trails with 5 percent.

Lamont campaign spokeswoman Liz Dupont-Diehl said Lieberman's experience has led to the Bush-Cheney energy bill, increased terrorist activity and the loss of manufacturing jobs.

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney supported plans to reduce illegal immigration from Mexico but said Saturday the U.S. should do more to keep foreign students who come here and earn advanced degrees.

"There's only one condition on getting your Ph.D. here in the U.S. and that is: You leave as soon as you get it," he told New Hampshire Republicans gathered for their annual convention. "Let me tell you, you get a Ph.D. here in one of our great institutions, I want you to stay. ... It makes no sense that we put up a big concrete wall against those who have education and skills but our doors have been wide open to people that have neither."

Romney, a possible 2008 presidential candidate, spoke about a growing gap in technology and education between countries like China and the United States. He described a conversation he'd had with a leader of a Massachusetts high-tech company, who said he expected that in 10 years, 90 percent of his employees will be in Asia.

"I was shocked," said Romney. "China alone graduates seven times the number of engineers that we are."

Outside Groups Spending Millions On Ads (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 1, 2006

The images are searing, violent. Smoke and flames pouring from the World Trade Center towers. Bullets ripping through military protective vests.

The scenes are from this year's campaign ad wars, waged outside the control of candidates or political parties.

Heading into the final weeks before the Nov. 7 elections, independent advocacy groups, many financed by a few wealthy donors, are spending millions on ads in some of the most contested states and congressional districts.

DOJ_NMG_0072579

Between Jan. 1 and Sept. 26, Republican-leaning groups spent $13.8 million on advertising while advertising on behalf of Democrats totaled $6.3 million, according to the Campaign Media Analysis Group. Throw in the advertising the political parties are paying for, and the Republicans have spent $5 on ads for every $3 spent by Democrats.

That is a significant reversal from 2004, when Democratic groups outnumbered and outspent Republican organizations. Now, some Democratic officials are wondering when their deep-pocketed liberal allies will step in to help.

"If it's there, I haven't seen it," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "I can't tell you what happened from '04 to '06 and why some decided either not to participate in this election or not be at the same level."

As election day nears, television viewers have been introduced to Republican-oriented groups with names such a Progress for America, Softer Voices and the Economic Freedom Fund. Their benefactors include Univision founder Andrew Perenchio; conservative philanthropist John M. Templeton Jr. of Bryn Mawr, Pa.; Foster Friess, former manager of the Brandywine mutual funds; and Bob J. Perry, the Texas builder who helped finance the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth that attacked Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam record during the 2004 presidential race.

Progress for America is credited with helping President Bush's re-election with a powerful ad evoking the Sept. 11 attacks. The GOP-leaning group now is running ads in Missouri and Ohio that support the war in Iraq.

The Economic Freedom Fund, bankrolled by Perry, is running ads in congressional districts in Iowa, Indiana, Georgia and West Virginia.

Softer Voices, backed by Friess and Templeton, has spent $850,000 in an ad campaign in Pennsylvania on behalf of Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, who is running behind Democrat Bob Casey.

So far, most of the Democratic advertising help has come from MoveOn.org, a liberal group has been raising smaller contributions as a federally regulated political action committee.

MoveOn spent most of its advertising money in March, targeting congressional districts that were not yet considered vulnerable for Republicans but have since become competitive. Right now, MoveOn is only advertising in two New York congressional districts and one in New Hampshire.

Democrats have gotten help from VoteVets, a PAC formed by military veterans who are critical of the Iraq war. The group is focusing on Santorum and Republican Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Conrad Burns of Montana.

The VoteVets ads accuse the senators of not supporting legislation to get better equipment for U.S. troops. The ads have been small buys, but have benefited from media coverage because they dramatically portray a sharpshooter firing through a protective vest.

A group of Democratic strategists has tried to raise about $20 million for an October advertising blitz. The effort, called the September Fund, is being led by Harold Ickes, a former aide to President Clinton and an adviser to Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y.

In a letter circulated to potential donors this month, the organizers said: "While we have achieved unprecedented unity, it is only meaningful if we can mobilize the power of progressive donors to ensure sufficient financial resources are available."

Among those solicited was billionaire financier George Soros, a donor to liberal causes who contributed more than $20 million to defeat Bush in 2004. Soros has put more than $2 million into this election, much of it toward get out the vote efforts. In an interview this month on CNN, Soros said he did not plan to spend as much as 2004.

"That was an exceptional situation," he said.

Democratic Party officials said outside groups such as the September Fund are organizing too late. "If it was September '05, I'd feel better," Emanuel said.

This year, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has run the biggest ad campaign: $7.3 million on behalf of Republican candidates and $1.2 million on behalf of business friendly Democrats in primary contests. But the chamber had to stop those ads on Sept. 7, to abide by a legal prohibition on the use of union or corporate funds for electioneering ads 60 days before the vote.

Just in September, Progress for America has aired three rounds of ads linking the war in Iraq to the broader effort to combat terrorism. The ads area appearing on national cable networks and were broadcast statewide in Missouri and Ohio.

The first ad showed images of jet planes slicing into the World Trade Center Towers. The narrator warned, "These People Want to Kill Us." A new ad features Iraq war veterans describing the war's successes. None of the ads features politicians nor voices support for or against any elected official.

"A lot of people turn off political ads when they see a candidate," said Stuart Roy, a GOP consultant working with Progress for America. "These ads have a longer lasting effect than those that mention a candidate."

Still, some ads can backfire, and operatives from both parties have mixed views on their effectiveness.

Michael Steele, the Republican candidate for Senate in Maryland, was forced to repudiate a radio ad by an independent group supporting his candidacy that claimed Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican and that Democrats initiated the Ku Klux Klan. Steele called the ad "insulting to Marylanders."

DOJ_NMG_0072580

"Independent expenditures are overrated mostly because you're operating outside the strategic framework of the campaign," said Steve Elmendorf, a former top aide to one-time House Democratic leader Richard Gephardt and deputy campaign manager in Kerry's presidential campaign. "Sometimes they just create clutter."

MoveOn's executive director, Eli Pariser, said this election will be won on the ground, not the airwaves.

"For all the talk about ads," he said, "this is not a persuasion election as much as it is a turnout election."

Of Party Dues And Deadbeats On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 30 — To move up the ladder in Congress, you must do more than win votes. You are, quite literally, expected to pay your dues.

If you are a rank-and-file member of the House, the amount is up to $100,000. If your ambitions are to preside over a powerful committee, the duty is $300,000. For a top party leader, the tally can climb beyond $600,000.

Make those checks payable to the Republican or Democratic Congressional campaign committees.

Whether or not they are in competitive races, lawmakers are asked to mount vigorous fund-raising drives to fill their own campaign chests. Then they dole to the party, which spreads the money to the most competitive campaigns in the country.

Four years after Congress tried to reduce the influence of money in politics by rewriting the rules of how campaigns are financed, Republicans and Democrats alike have found myriad replacements for the river of financial contributions known as soft money.

The practice of paying what the parties refer to as dues is not illegal, and it is not an entirely fresh notion by either party. This year, Democrats are hoping to glean about $33 million in dues from their House members, an amount that would be about one-third of their fund-raising goal. That makes the dues an important piece in the Democrats' strategy to overtake the Republican majority.

As members of Congress scurried to finish their business in Washington before heading home for the final stretch of the midterm election campaigns, leaders of both political parties were placing an unusually tight squeeze on colleagues who have not settled their bills.

With five weeks remaining in the race, nearly half of the House Democrats are in arrears. Even a month-by-month installment plan — let alone the prospect that they could regain control of the chamber if they can out-hustle the Republicans — has not provided an incentive for Democrats to pay what they owe.

"Some people make a lot of money for the party, others make a lot of issues," said Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio, who contributed for the first time this week, but still owes $115,000. "I work on the issues side. That's where I excel."

The delinquency statements that Democrats sent via overnight delivery to representatives' homes throughout the year have been supplanted by telephone calls or personal visits from party leaders.

Representative Luis V. Gutierrez, Democrat of Illinois, said he had no intention of paying his dues of $250,000, assessed because of his seniority on the Financial Services Committee. But after a two-minute telephone conversation with the minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, he changed course and sent in a check for $15,000.

"It's kind of hard to ignore," Mr. Gutierrez said in an interview, conceding that before Ms. Pelosi rang his cellphone, he had not given a nickel. "I still owe $225,000. Thank God it doesn't affect my credit score when I go get a mortgage."

It could, however, affect what committee assignments are passed out when Congress convenes in January. Several members said they had been told by party leaders that their positions could be on the line if they fail to contribute.

Last weekend, Ms. Pelosi made more than 50 telephone calls to members of her caucus, chiding them to pay their dues. Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois and chairman of the Congressional Campaign Committee, has barred Democrats from using the telephones at party headquarters if they had not paid at least some of what they owed.

"This is not my job," said Mr. Emanuel, recalling the message he repeats again and again to fellow Democrats. "This is our job."

Strong-arm techniques, though, can backfire. So last week, in the final Democratic caucus before the recess, both Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Emanuel softened their language. Still, they distributed a spreadsheet, laying out for everyone to see how much — or how little — members had given to the party.

The grid showed that Representative Maxine Waters, Democrat of California, had contributed $47,500. As a chief deputy whip of the party, she owes a total of $250,000.

Ms. Waters said she did not take kindly to humiliation or intimidation.

DOJ_NMG_0072581

"Nobody puts the screws on me. I don't allow that," Ms. Waters said in a brief interview during a long evening of debate on the House floor. "I'm not trying to prove anything to anybody. Some years I've raised a lot, some years I've not raised so much, so I'll do whatever I do."

At the same time, contributions from more than a dozen Democrats have far exceeded their dues. Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York contributed twice as much as his $300,000 assessment and Representative John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania has nearly doubled his $250,000 requirement. Both men have their eye on leadership positions.

"When I see what some of these guys have to do to scratch for money, it's really too bad," Mr. Murtha said. "They can't raise the money, so we help them out."

At least once a quarter, Democrats receive a fund-raising report card. To increase the motivation — or, perhaps, to embarrass them in front of their peers — the statement also points out how much money is available in individual campaign bank accounts.

The most recent document, for example, pointed out that Representative Robert E. Andrews, Democrat of New Jersey, had a balance of $2,054,562 but had paid only $40,000 of a $125,000 bill.

"I've held on to my money because New Jersey politics can be volatile," said Mr. Andrews, who has told some Democrats that he had been keeping a close watch on his state's Senate race if Senator Robert Menendez stumbles. "But there's no doubt I'll be contributing the full amount."

For Republicans, each member of the House is expected to make a contribution to the Battleground Program. The amounts range from $70,000 to $600,000, depending on the member's position. Since July, when the program began, party leaders said, about 90 percent of the members have contributed to the program, which they hope will raise $22.5 million.

There is no public disapproval for those who do not participate. Arm-twisting is conducted privately, which is why Republican officials said at least five members were summoned this week for a meeting with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois; the majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio; and the majority whip, Roy Blunt of Missouri.

"Oftentimes Wall Street gauges a business's future success by the number of employees investing in their company," said Representative Eric Cantor, Republican of Virginia, who heads the House program. "I view Battleground the same way."

In the Senate, neither the Republicans nor the Democrats employ a rigorous system of dues and contributions.

Many senators raise more money for their respective party committees than their colleagues in the House, but committee assignments in the Senate depend on a tradition of seniority.

Still, in the House, where financial contributions and other demonstrations of party loyalty can trump seniority, not all longtime Democratic members believe this year's strong push to collect dues will ultimately raise, or lower, a member's prospects of winning an influential committee seat.

"No Democrat really believes that if you're going to be the chairman and you don't give the money that you're going to lose your seat," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts. "If you're a Republican, you do."

Showing some admiration for Republicans' efficiency, Mr. Frank said: "They threaten. We shame."

Mr. Frank has surpassed his dues of $300,000. His current tally? $310,700. And if Democrats win in November, he is poised to become chairman of the Financial Services Committee.

Democrats Less Sure About Recapturing House (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

Some Democratic election strategists are less confident than they were a month ago about recapturing the House in November as a result of tighter party-preference polls that show Republicans rallying behind their embattled party.

"I'm not as confident of the House switching as I once was," a Democratic campaign consultant said last week.

But other Democratic congressional campaign advisers point to about two dozen congressional races where Republican incumbents are facing aggressive challenges that they say could return Democrats to power if there is a voter-turnout surge in November demanding change.

And the resignation Friday of Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, gave Democrats another opportunity to pick up an open seat.

Mr. Foley, who stepped down after press reports that he sent sexually explicit e-mails to an underage former male page, had been considered a shoo-in to win a seventh term in the heavily Republican 16th District. His Democratic challenger, Tim Mahoney, a businessman, has been aggressively campaigning for more than a year, and Republican officials acknowledged it would be difficult for a new candidate to become well-known in the five weeks before Election Day.

Democrats need to win 15 additional seats to take control of the House, and in a tight election, Mr. Foley's seat could put them over the top.

But recent surveys by Gallup and other pollsters have shown Republicans closing the Democrats' yearlong advantage as President Bush and his party sharpen their campaign messages on terrorism, Iraq and the economy and as voters begin focusing more closely on the elections.

"I think in a lot of places where there really isn't a competitive race at hand, Republicans are finding their way back into the electorate and are voting for their own," said Alan Secrest, a veteran campaign consultant and pollster who is advising Democratic House candidates across the country.

"But in the hot races, the competitive races where we're working, they remain as competitive as they were. So I believe the Gallup numbers showing a tightening in the generic polls can be true, even as the truly competitive races remain so," he said.

However, another Democratic campaign adviser, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the Republicans' stronger poll numbers in the part- preference surveys could make the Democrats' efforts to win back the House "a steeper climb."

"I expect things to tighten up," the campaign adviser said.

These concerns were confirmed last week by a top election forecaster who closely monitors the House's most competitive races.

"There has been a slight uptick in national GOP numbers, and that could help in a number of tight races, particularly in Republican-leaning districts that have been regarded as in play," campaign analyst Stuart Rothenberg told his newsletter subscribers.

Mr. Rothenberg said he thinks that "Democrats are now poised to net 15-20 seats, which would narrowly return the House to their control." But, he added, "they don't have much of a margin for error."

Mr. Secrest doesn't see the Democratic erosion that Gallup found last month in its national poll of likely voters ,which showed the party preference vote in a "dead heat."

"In the competitive races we are working in, the Democratic opportunity [to take back the House] is undiminished," he said.

Ace Of Base (NYT)

By Mark Halperin

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

BILL and Hillary Clinton have been known to cite a quip widely attributed to Einstein: “The definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result.” George W. Bush and Karl Rove live by an alternative dictum: Why do things differently when you like the results you have been getting?

In the 2002 and 2004 national elections, the president and his top political adviser won by margins provided by conservative voters who shared the White House’s view that the country should continue to move right. Although the president is not on the ballot in November, the Bush-Rove model animates the Republican Party’s election strategy for 2006.

Yet two years of controversy over the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina, and the perils of high gas prices and low poll numbers, have led many to believe that the Republicans’ strategy of fighting from the base has worn out its welcome. Therefore, this view holds, a campaign that appeals to moderates, one waged from the center, is the only way for the party to maintain control of the House and Senate.

Interesting theory, but it probably won’t work. If the Republicans want to keep their majorities in the midterm elections, their best chance is to stick with the old, base-driven Bush-Rove electoral strategy.

Why? In the eyes of the Bush team, America is a polarized country, one where there are fundamental divisions worth fighting over. A president — and a party — should not worry about slender margins of victory or legislative control. The goal is to accumulate just enough power to use the energies and passions of the base to effect ideological change in the nation’s laws and institutions, even if — sometimes especially if — those changes might be at odds with majority public opinion.

For the Republicans, this brand of politics works because the United States in many ways remains a fundamentally conservative nation. Polls consistently indicate that there are more staunchly conservative Americans than liberal ones. Republican politicians, therefore, have the advantage of being able to proudly announce what they really think. They can go on offense.

The party is helped, of course, by superior financial resources. And the Republicans have mastered micro-aiming rousing messages to ideologically sympathetic voters. These messages, generally on hot button issues like gay marriage and abortion, stir the kind of emotion and anger that provide the energy in Bush-Rove politics.

It’s important to note, though, that this strategy depends on something else: the inability of Democrats to play by the same rules, to go on offense.

If Democrats in Congress took a secret ballot, it is safe to say there would be overwhelming support for a variety of positions that, in theory, could rally the party’s base: a timely withdrawal of American troops from Iraq; a tax increase for the wealthy; universal health care; and increased rights for homosexuals. These are all positions in line with the activist wing of their party. And yet most Democrats will not openly espouse such policies, concerned that backing them could hurt their chances in 2006.

If they actually articulated what was in their hearts, Democrats worry that they would be marching into a buzz saw of negative political commercials and White House-led attacks. Democrats rightly believe that such attacks would energize the conservative base and also eat into their support among centrist voters. But their chosen alternative — in which they swallow their true beliefs on important national issues — demoralizes their own base.

If you have any doubts about the confusion of the Democrats, just look at the party's midterm strategy. On the one hand, Democrats are reluctant to push for liberal policies that would motivate their base. But the core of their enunciated message — both vowing to stop the president's right-wing policies and blurring their differences with Republicans on highly charged issues — has in recent elections been a recipe for defeat. Such equivocation is the kind of themeless pudding that does not match up well with the conviction of the White House message and is uninspiring to both the Democrats' base and the center.

For months, the president was in severe political peril, with approval ratings regularly hovering around 30 percent, in large measure because he was missing the support of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents that is essential to his majority. Despite conservative disaffection with the White House over the past year on issues like spending (and even, in some cases, on Iraq), the latest polls show the G.O.P. base is coming home — and just in time. Base support is headed toward 90 percent, just about where it was before the 2002 and 2004 elections.

The speeches the president gave about national security leading up to the fifth anniversary of 9/11 re-engaged the base and raised his overall approval rating to around 40 percent. He also has shifted the debate back to his favored playing field: national security.

Although some Democrats are energized by the aggressive posture struck last week by Bill and Hillary Clinton on national security, the couple's visibility seems to be energizing the Republican base as well, perhaps more so.

As in 2002 and 2004, the Democrats have been baited into a heated discussion on terrorism and Iraq, blocking out debates that would be more favorable to their cause, like Social Security, the economy and gas prices. The Clintons have whipped up Democrats into a frenzy to fight back, but on Capitol Hill and on television they are largely fighting back on Republican terrain.

This is exactly what happened in the last two elections: Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove fired up the base on national security, taxes and social issues and found a way to win a majority of the electorate, even as they lost the allegiance of a majority of the country over all. The national security debate, the visibility of the Clintons and the momentum the Republicans gain from Mr. Bush's rising poll numbers — all of these echo previous election cycles.

Critics of the Bush administration assert that the politics of the base has run its course, and that the Iraq war, the partisan zealousness and the conservative social policies of the administration have made voters yearn for a more centrist, bipartisan government. But Mr. Bush's opponents may be imprudently lulled by the current storyline and broad national polls, both of which miss the power and consequence of a Republican base that may have one more victory to give.

Parties For Pay Fill D.C. Calendar (KCS)

By Matt Stearns

The Kansas City Star, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON | Lonely lobbyist: The oxymoron of the season.

Every day, faxes and e-mail pour across lobbyists' desks, requesting the pleasure of their company — and that of their checkbooks — at dozens of campaign fundraisers.

Breakfast invitations. Lunches. Cocktails. Dinners. Even hunting and golfing trips.

The Kansas City Star asked one lobbyist for a Fortune 500 company to save a week's worth of fundraiser invitations in the final days of the current congressional session in the heated run-up to the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

How many invitations did he get? About 200. How many of the events did he attend? Eleven.

Did he feel like an ATM sometimes? You bet.

The lobbyist was offered the chance to nibble sushi and stone crabs with Rep. Connie Mack, a Florida Republican. Join the Mooseburger Oktoberfest with Rep. Don Young, an Alaska Democrat. Listen to bagpipes at Scotch Tasting Reception (kilt optional) hosted by Rep. John Campbell, a California Republican. And "dove shoot, sporting clays, bow and rifle deer hunting, fishing, horseback riding and golf" over a weekend on a 6,000-acre South Carolina plantation, courtesy of Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham.

That the party-and-pay carousel continues unabated shows that the lobbying scandal that rocked Washington earlier this year has changed nothing, said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group.

DOJ_NMG_0072584

And because lawmakers require ever greater piles of money to finance their campaigns — PAC cash given to congressional candidates this election cycle totaled about a quarter-billion dollars by July — they don't have much interest in real reform, she said.

"What has driven me nuts about lobbying reform is all the onus has been put on lobbyists, as if members of Congress are these babes in the woods," Sloan said. "That is so not the case."

Fundraising invitations often list members' committee assignments right under their names, Sloan said.

"It's intended to say, 'Do you have any clients with interests in front of me?' "

Attendees come with checks because they support a member of Congress' work and agenda, said Chuck Knapp, a spokesman for U.S. Rep. Todd Tiahrt, a Kansas Republican.

In September, the congressman was host of the second Todd Tiahrt European Driven Pheasant Hunt at the Flint Oak Hunting Resort near Fall River. The event was a benefit for Tiahrt's leadership PAC.

Cost: $2,500 per attendee.

Leadership PACs help a member gain influence within the caucus," Knapp said. "That's beneficial to the congressman in his work representing the district."

Graham's hunting, fishing and golfing extravaganza, to benefit his political action committee, was even pricier: $5,000. It was limited to 25 participants.

To Mary Boyle, a spokeswoman for Common Cause, a nonpartisan government watchdog group, such weekend trips are particularly troubling.

"They're meant to be sold as this opportunity to get real snuggly-close with a member of Congress," Boyle said. "That's what lobbyists are buying: access and influence."

The more typical events in Washington, where animals are not ducking for cover, cost a lobbyist at least $500, or $1,000 from his employer's PAC.

At least no lobbyist will go hungry.

On one typical September weekday, there were seven fundraising breakfasts and two lunches held at restaurants, Capitol Hill town houses owned by members of Congress or big companies and clubs associated with the Democratic and Republican parties.

The evening hours offered more than a dozen receptions and dinners around Capitol Hill and downtown Washington. Among them: the second fundraiser of the day for Sen. Jim Talent, a Missouri Republican.

Tiahrt also had his annual Fall Steak Out, that day, and U.S. Rep. Kenny Hulshof, a Missouri Republican, offered an "intimate dinner" at Bobby Van's Grill.

Perhaps most intriguing of all: "Pirates of Key West Night" at the Capitol Hill home of Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican.

As Common Cause might say: Arrghh!

Presidential Hopefuls Boost Florida Candidates, Look To Help Themselves (FLSUNSEN)

By Anthony Man

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 1, 2006

Presidential candidates are flocking to Florida, hoping to boost their parties' candidates for governor and Congress -- and their own dreams of reaching the White House.

Two of the most prominent prospects, Democrat John Kerry and Republican Rudolph Giuliani, just completed South Florida swings. Even though the 2008 election is more than two years away, Broward and Palm Beach counties will be filled with presidential candidates in the five weeks between now and Election Day.

"We're going to be seeing more of them. We've gotten a lot of calls and e-mails from their staffs," said Shane Strum, Broward Republican chairman. "They're going to crop up real quick."

The interaction between national and state candidates is the ultimate symbiotic relationship, like the tickbird feasting on insects from the back of cattle. While the presidential candidates garner publicity and build networks of supporters for their own campaigns, the gubernatorial and congressional candidates also enjoy the publicity and use the visitors to help attract donors to fundraising events.

Kerry, the Massachusetts senator who lost the 2004 presidential election, stopped in five cities Saturday for four candidate fundraisers and two news conferences. Most of his events weren't big, public gatherings.

It was different with Giuliani, the former New York mayor who was propelled to superstar status for his leadership after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He has the ability to attract far more television cameras than even a candidate for governor might get on his own.

Outside a fire station in Dania Beach on Wednesday, Giuliani was the big draw for a rally at which he endorsed fellow Republican Charlie Crist's campaign for governor. As the event wound up, retired Miami-Dade firefighter George Carbonell of Miramar yelled out his political hope: "Giuliani for president."

Carbonell, a registered Democrat, said his cry of support wasn't premeditated or planted by political operatives. Giuliani demurred, saying later he wouldn't make any decisions until after the November elections.

Kerry said Saturday that he would make a decision in late 2006 or early 2007.

He said his mission Saturday was to help elect Democrats, but said he hopes there is some political benefit. "Of course you hope that it's positive, but I can't predict. I can't tell you what's going to happen," he said.

Average voters like Carbonell aren't the motivation for visits by prospective presidential candidates.

More important is winning the support of people such as Mitchell Berger and William Scherer, both Fort Lauderdale lawyers.

Berger is a prominent national political fundraiser and finance chairman for Democratic gubernatorial candidate Jim Davis. Scherer is a prominent Republican fundraiser, reaching pioneer status for raising at least $100,000 for George W. Bush's 2000 campaign. In 2004 Scherer was a Bush ranger, raising at least $200,000.

Scherer, who said he won't pick a presidential candidate until after the gubernatorial election, is raising money for Crist this fall. The presidential candidate visits provide opportunities for people like Scherer and Berger to see the prospects up close, helping them evaluate whom they want to work for.

Bryan Miller, a lawyer who works in Fort Lauderdale and West Palm Beach, leads the Democratic Professionals Council, a regional group of moderate and business-oriented Democrats.

Miller said the presidential hopefuls are working with gubernatorial and congressional candidates and appearing before his group because Broward and Palm Beach counties are full of wealthy donors who can help fund their campaigns.

"They're down here to build fundraising bases," Miller said.

Miller and Mitch Ceasar, the Broward Democratic chairman, said Florida's role in determining the presidency is another factor.

"Of all the big states in the country, there's only one swing state," Miller said. "Just do the math and Florida is the juggernaut in any presidential election."

California and New York are solidly Democratic and Texas is solidly Republican. Neither Republican red nor Democratic blue, Florida can go either way, and the state's 27 electoral votes are a tenth of what's needed to win the presidency.

"Florida is the only swing mega-state in the country," Ceasar added.

Another reason national figures in both parties want to help elect a governor is the value of the governorship in the presidential contest in two years, Berger said.

Berger said Bill Clinton almost won Florida in 1992, despite devoting little effort or money on the state, because Democrat Lawton Chiles was governor. In 2000 and 2004, President Bush benefited from his brother, Gov. Jeb Bush.

"Florida is a pivotal state," Scherer said. "Having the governor and the Legislature would make it far more friendly for a Republican candidate for president than it would be the other way around."

Democrats see it the same way. "The national party thinks that having a Florida governor is worth about five points in a presidential race," Miller said.

It's part of the way candidates build their networks of supporters.

"As long as it stays a purple state, that's a place the presidential candidates have to come," Miller said. "We're talking about a very crowded presidential field in 2008, and that makes it all the more important to be out early."

Romney Directs GOP Cash To Campaign States (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As chairman of the Republican Governors Association, Mitt Romney has directed the organization's largest contributions to candidates in three states that are key to any presidential run, enhancing his exposure in politically important precincts as he prepares for a 2008 run for president.

The heavy investment in those three states -- Florida, Michigan, and Iowa -- underscores the extent to which Romney is using the governors ' association to build his presidential résumé. Romney is traveling the nation under the auspices of the association and getting to know the deep-pocketed donors who play crucial roles in presidential candidacies.

Romney, as chairman, plays the primary role in recommending which races receive funding, though all decisions are approved by an executive committee of the governors' association.

Florida, Michigan, and Iowa each have competitive governors' races, and Romney said in an interview that each funding decision was based on the merits.

Still, in a year in which even Romney concedes that Republicans are highly likely to suffer significant losses in governor's races nationally, some of the choices of where to send the association's money have raised eyebrows in political circles.

Two weeks ago, Romney traveled to Florida to deliver a $1 million check to Republican gubernatorial nominee Charlie Crist, even though polls have shown Crist holding a steady lead.

Even without the governors' association's contribution, Crist had nearly tripled the fund-raising kitty of his opponent, Democrat Jim Davis, suggesting the association's money might be better spent in other contests.

Also getting $1 million is Dick DeVos, who is running for governor in Michigan, a closely divided state that holds early presidential primaries -- and where Romney's father served as governor.

Though DeVos's race against Democratic Governor Jennifer Granholm is tight, DeVos is hardly strapped for cash, since he has already pumped more than $16 million of his Amway fortune into the race.

``We laughed at the Michigan money," said Jennifer Duffy, who tracks governors' races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. ``It's like Romney's third home state, after Utah and Massachusetts."

Romney is directing about $750,000 to Iowa, where Representative Jim Nussle, the chairman of the House budget committee, is locked in a campaign that's widely considered a toss-up.

While the tightness of the election makes the state a good target for governors' association money, the donation is noteworthy for its size, given that Iowa is a sparsely populated state with low advertising costs.

Romney has paid frequent visits to Iowa, which has the first presidential nominating contest in the nation, including a series of stops last week.

``If Nussle wins, it gives [Romney] a friend in the governor's seat here, which can be useful as you look forward to the caucuses," said Peverill Squire , a political science professor at the University of Iowa. ``Even more important than that, it gives him a presence here, and elevates his profile among party activists. That's how you put together a campaign organization."

Romney said each contribution represents a strategic decision based on the 2006 races, not his own ambitions. Some states, including Michigan and Florida, were given more money in part to reward major donors in those states, Romney said. Iowa, he added, represents perhaps the GOP's best chance for replacing a Democratic governor with a Republican.

``States that have provided a lot of money to the RGA have generally gotten more money back," Romney said. ``I'm sure when this is over, people will say, `Why did you send it there?' But we're sending money where we think it can best be spent."

Though the association declined to release its full spending figures, Romney himself has identified Florida, Michigan, and Iowa as the top three recipients so far. As a 527 organization, the RGA is required to file quarterly reports with the IRS, and third-quarter fund-raising and spending won't be released until mid-October.

RGA officials said the association also has spent heavily in states that don't figure as prominently in presidential campaigns. Romney said the group is making sizable investments in Wisconsin, Oregon, Colorado, and Maryland, among others.

By the end of the election cycle, Romney said, between 10 and 12 states will have received cash infusions of roughly similar amounts, though he declined to name the states or the amounts so as not to reveal strategy. He said he hopes those states include Massachusetts, where his lieutenant governor, Kerry Healey, is running to succeed him, but he has recused himself from decisions involving his home state.

At the same time, the governors' association has essentially written off governors' seats in New York and Ohio, and given little attention to Illinois. The association has passed up the chance to make big donations to Republican efforts to unseat Democratic incumbents in states that are historically friendly to the GOP. These include Kansas, Oklahoma, Wyoming, Tennessee, and Arizona.

The organization has given virtually nothing to Republican candidates in New Hampshire and South Carolina, two of the most important states in the presidential calendar, but where incumbents have big leads. Republican Governor Mark Sanford of South Carolina appears safe, as does Democratic Governor John Lynch of New Hampshire.

Despite Romney's efforts, polls and analysts say Republicans are likely to have a net loss of between four and eight governorships this year. If they lose four or more, they'll lose their majority status among governorships for the first time since 1994.

``The math would suggest we lose quite a few governorships," Romney said. ``We hope to do better than that, obviously."

By contrast, Romney's counterpart at the Democratic Governors Association, Bill Richardson of New Mexico, is predicting a banner year for Democrats in the 36 governor's races that will be decided Nov. 7. Richardson, like Romney, hopes to use the platform of the governors' association to boost his 2008 presidential prospects

Citing the most recent public polls, Richardson said Democrats are in a position to turn a 22-28 deficit in governorships into at least a 28-22 advantage. Richardson said Democratic pickups are likely in Massachusetts, New York, Maryland, Ohio, Arkansas, and Colorado. He said Democrats also stand good chances to take over from Republicans in Nevada, Alaska, Minnesota, and others.

``Two-thirds of the country is at stake, and we will get to a majority of governorships," Richardson said.

The factors driving the major trends in the governors' races are beyond Romney's control. Low approval ratings for President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress are harming Republicans up and down the ballot. Romney has also been hampered by a rash of retirements among Republican governors -- including his own.

It all suggests an inauspicious debut on the national stage for Romney, who has become an increasingly public face on behalf of GOP gubernatorial candidates this year. But analysts say the losses are unlikely to significantly harm his presidential chances.

The most important task of a governor s' association chairman is raising money, and Romney has maintained Republicans' historic cash advantage in governors' races, with the RGA raising $25.9 million -- a record for a nonpresidential year -- compared with the DGA's $17.9 million.

Because of his success bringing in money, Romney is unlikely to face recriminations for his leadership, even if the election turns out to be a bloodbath for Republicans, said Jeffrey Berry , a political science professor at Tufts University.

``Elephants have short memories, I suppose," he said.

Since taking over last November, Romney has retooled the RGA to eliminate its policy functions, allowing him to focus exclusively on fund-raising.

Even if Republicans falter on Election Day, Romney will end up glad he took on the RGA job, predicted Mickey Edwards, a former Republican representative who now teaches at Princeton University.

The travel has given Romney national exposure, and kept him in close contact with the moneymen and GOP powerbrokers who are crucial to the presidential nominating process, he said.

``It's been a big plus for him," Edwards said.

Romney Says He Must Obey Law On Marriage For Out-of-state Gay Couples (BOS)

By Michael Levenson

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. -- Governor Mitt Romney all but admitted defeat yesterday in his effort to appeal a Suffolk Superior Court ruling that allows gay couples from Rhode Island to get married in Massachusetts.

``I have to follow the law," a resigned Romney said in an interview at the Republican State Convention in Concord, N.H., where he delivered the keynote address. ``This is a nation of laws, even if I don't like them."

The governor's concession was made a day after Attorney General Thomas F. Reilly said he would not appeal the decision, despite a letter Romney had sent urging him to do so. The decision disappointed Romney as he looks to solidify his conservative credentials for a potential 2008 presidential run.

For the first time, the ruling makes it possible for gay couples from outside Massachusetts to come to the state and be granted marriage licenses. Issued Friday by Judge Thomas E. Connolly , the decision said Romney and Reilly cannot use a 1913 law to block Rhode Island couples from marrying in Massachusetts because Rhode Island's laws do not explicitly ban gay marriage.

Romney, who has said he does not want Massachusetts to become ``the Las Vegas of gay marriage," said the only option left is for Congress to approve a Constitutional amendment to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The amendment would then need the approval of three-fourths of the states.

President Bush has also called for such an amendment, but Congress has not approved it. Romney yesterday reiterated his call for a similar amendment to the Massachusetts Constitution, which he hopes to place on the ballot in November 2008.

``Let the citizens decide," Romney said. ``And I'm confident that if the citizens decide it in the privacy of a voting booth, they'll protect traditional marriage."

At the convention, held at the Capital Center for the Arts, several hundred Republicans enthusiastically applauded Romney, who delivered a speech in which he spoke about his experience managing the 2002 Winter Olympics, urged the nation to produce more scientists to compete with Asian nations, and expressed support for the ``sanctity of marriage and the foundational nature of the family."

DOJ_NMG_0072588

``You and I agree on something about that, and that is my Supreme Judicial Court made a monumental error in saying that our Constitution in Massachusetts requires people of the same gender to marry," Romney said as Republicans cheered. ``I disagree with them on that. I think John Adams would disagree with them on that, as well."

Marriage, he said, is not a relationship ``just about adults."

``Marriage is primarily about the development and nurturing of children, and every child deserves a mother and a father," Romney said to more cheers and applause.

Romney has been trying to lock up support in New Hampshire, where the early primary makes it an important state in presidential elections. Last week, the Commonwealth PAC, a political committee Romney is using to help lay the groundwork for a possible presidential run, signed up Tom Rath , a former New Hampshire attorney general, as its senior adviser. The committee has also doled out more than $100,000 to the New Hampshire GOP.

Wayne Semprini , the party's chairman, told delegates yesterday that Romney gave $60,000 to the state party this summer, when money was so tight ``the lights were flickering" at party headquarters. He also reminded delegates that Romney owns a home in New Hampshire, on the shores of Lake Winnipesaukee.

``We do love the state, as you all know," Romney's wife, Ann , said in brief remarks to the convention.

Delegates said yesterday that they were impressed with Romney.

``I think his message was excellent," said Norm Olsen , 54, of Portsmouth . ``He has some real experience in solving big problems."

Democrats Work The Factory Floor (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

Hillary Clinton is the front-runner for the next Democratic presidential nomination, but suddenly this is John Edwards's party. If you look across the states where the party is being defined in 2006, you find candidates who sound a lot more like him than her.

Democrats are running strong Senate campaigns in the upper South (James Webb in Virginia, Harold Ford in Tennessee), in the big job-loss states (Bob Casey in Pennsylvania, Sherrod Brown in Ohio, Claire McCaskill in Missouri) and even in a few places out West (Jon Tester in Montana). And in each case, the candidates are running as factory-floor populists who would throw up if they had to sit through a Renaissance Weekend.

Senator Clinton is a well-educated professional who was influenced by the values politics of the 1960's and 70's. But most of today's strong Democratic candidates are traditionalist manly men who give the impression that if they had been involved in the Chicago riots, they would have been on the side of the cops, not the hippies. The Claritas research firm segments the country into different psychodemographic clusters. Today's most prominent Democratic candidates are more Mines and Mills than Towns and Gowns.

The Democrats were once a free trade party. But Sherrod Brown wrote a book called "Myths of Free Trade: Why American Trade Policy Has Failed" and most of this year's strong Democratic candidates rail — like John Edwards — against outsourcing and trade agreements. Their core issue is the economic resentment of the struggling middle class. Brown recently explained the political strategy to a gathering of liberal journalists: "I know that trade issues work with white male, nonunion, culturally conservative voters because they know how anxious trade issues have made them and their families."

Many of this year's prominent candidates are also surprisingly nationalist on immigration, playing off concerns about declining wages. "I do believe we must gain control of our borders," Webb said during a debate. "We also must gain control over corporate America's use of illegals. This, along with the Iraq war, has been the major failure of this administration."

On social issues, most of them are not exactly singing from the hymnal of the highly educated coastal elites. "I believe marriage should only be between men and women," Ford declares on the stump. "I don't know any better; that's how I was brought up. We didn't have any choice. Where I grew up, when you awakened on Sunday, you went to church. ... I learned the faith thing the old-fashioned way."

On Iraq, most are leaning toward the Edwards position. Unlike Senator Clinton, Edwards has disavowed his earlier support for the war. He calls for an immediate withdrawal of 40,000 troops and complete withdrawal within a year or so. But several candidates are careful to show they are not in the pocket of the A.C.L.U. Both Sherrod Brown and Harold Ford voted with President Bush on the military tribunal bill.

In sum, their message is a long way from the globalized Third Way politics Bill Clinton and Tony Blair exemplified in the 1990's. It's also a long way from the secular, multicultural liberalism that has alienated religious voters in droves.

Will it work politically? There's some evidence that it can. Michael Barone of U.S. News & World Report has noticed that so far Democrats are doing surprisingly well in rural America, where this economically progressive, socially traditionalist populism goes down well. Moreover, if Brown's economic populism can't win in a factory-decimated state like Ohio in a political climate like the one we have now, then it can't win anywhere, ever.

And yet Democrats have reason to worry long term. This message is based on a sort of economic nostalgia, what The Economist called a "rose-tinted version of the 1950's and 1960's" — when the middle class prospered, families cohered, America dominated, unions thrived, Islam was invisible and immigrants were Irish and Italian.

This nostalgia is certainly common today. In their must-read book, "Applebee's America," Doug Sosnik, Matt Dowd and Ron Fournier quote an anxious Michigan voter: "This is going to sound silly, but I wish things were like they were when we were growing up. ... I wish I could go back in time. We had stable lives. Mom could stay home, and we could afford it. Life was slower."

But nationwide, and in the decades ahead, can a politics that evades the modern realities of Islamic extremism and the skill-based global economy really be the basis of a majority movement? I doubt it.

'08 Scrutiny Shines Unkind Light On Allen (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

It was always a tricky proposition for Sen. George Allen to balance his 2006 reelection campaign with his 2008 presidential ambitions, and now the increased scrutiny and criticism that came with his role on the national stage endanger both.

Allen's prominence in the Republican presidential contest is the main reason the controversies that have roiled his effort to win a second term to the Senate have emerged now, after a 23-year political career, according to campaign strategists.

"When people start mentioning you as a possible presidential candidate, everything is looked at," said Robert E. Denton Jr., a political communications professor at Virginia Tech and a close observer of Virginia politics. "This [scrutiny] is a whole different ballgame for Allen, and it's all about '08, not the Senate campaign."

It wasn't that many months ago that Allen was seen by political insiders as already in the top tier of prospective Republican presidential candidates. In April 2005, he finished first in a National Journal magazine survey of insiders asked to predict the 2008 GOP nominee. In May, Allen finished second behind Arizona Sen. John McCain.

But instead of laying the groundwork for a campaign in Des Moines and Charleston, S.C., Allen's renewed attention is on Winchester and Roanoke. His last trip to one of the early primary states was in July.

The tightening Senate race has even led him to showcase potential rival McCain in television ads aimed at veterans and the kinds of independent voters to whom the Arizona Republican appeals and who could be critical in Allen's race with Democrat James Webb.

Campaign manager Dick Wadhams, who was chosen to be Allen's Senate chief of staff specifically for his national political expertise, doesn't want to talk about anything but the present. "I'm concentrating on the Senate race in 2006," he said yesterday.

He said he doesn't know what role Allen's national profile has played in the campaign. "What I will say is the preponderance of scrutiny of Sen. Allen, as opposed to lack of scrutiny of Webb, suggests that one candidate is getting all the scrutiny, and the other is getting away with no scrutiny at all," Wadhams said.

He also said that Allen's leadership of Republican efforts to retain control of the Senate in 2004, when Democrats thought they had a chance for a takeover, "certainly made Sen. Allen a target."

The milestones in a campaign that recently turned on questions of Allen's character -- a New Republic story that mined Allen's longtime affection for the Confederacy, a piece in the Jewish newspaper the Forward that revealed the senator's unacknowledged Jewish heritage, the emergence of long-ago acquaintances who say Allen used racial epithets in the 1970s, a charge Allen vehemently denies -- have all come about, the participants say, because of his presidential ambitions.

Even the campaign-altering event for which Allen has taken responsibility and for which he has apologized -- his use of the word "macaca" to describe a dark-skinned volunteer for Webb's campaign and his "welcome to America and the real world of Virginia" remarks to the young Fairfax County native -- took flight nationally because of his prominence among Republican 2008 contenders.

Allen campaign officials and supporters have accused the national media, especially The Washington Post, of hyping the macaca story. So it was not a pleasant surprise last week when the influential conservative magazine the Weekly Standard illustrated its long story on Allen with a drawing of the senator with a monkey on his back. (Macaca is a genus of monkey.) The piece said Allen's campaign controversies "have almost eliminated him from the field of serious presidential candidates and even jeopardized his Senate seat."

Many GOP strategists believed that the combination of Allen's ideology and personality would make him one of the favorites among activist conservatives who play such a significant role in the nomination process. That view was not universally held, however. Some top strategists privately questioned whether Allen had the skills to make the long-distance run required of presidential candidates.

Today, in the wake of the problems Allen has encountered, the doubts have spread far more widely inside the party. More than anything, these strategists say, Allen must turn his reelection campaign around. Success, they say, is the best antidote to the reservations that his recent performance has engendered around the country.

"To use the football metaphors he is so fond of, he needs to quote [Oakland Raiders owner] Al Davis and 'Just win, baby,' " said Tom Rath, the New Hampshire Republican national committeeman who is leaving that position to help prepare Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney for a 2008 run.

Allen is trying to go on offense this week, using his vast financial advantage over Webb to flood the airwaves with an ad portraying as disrespectful an article that Webb wrote 27 years ago that criticized women in the Naval Academy and in combat roles. It is an issue that Allen advisers think will appeal especially in Northern Virginia, an area critical to both campaigns.

But those who are familiar with Allen campaigns of the past, such as Virginia Tech's Denton, say things feel different. For one thing, this is the first time that Allen has run statewide for reelection; his 1993 campaign for governor and his 2000 campaign against Sen. Charles S. Robb (D) were the kind of underdog campaigns he prefers. He has always liked to call his supporters "insurgents" and laments that the Iraq war has ruined the word for him.

"I've never seen an Allen campaign like this one, being so much on the defensive," Denton said. "It's like night and day from his previous campaigns."

Recent polls have shown the race to be a dead heat, with Webb still not terribly familiar to voters and Allen's negative ratings increasing. And according to a recent Mason-Dixon poll, a majority of Virginians say Allen should not run for president.

John Weaver, chief strategist for McCain, said it would be naive to suggest that Allen's national aspirations haven't also been damaged by what he has gone through the last few weeks. But, he added, "we've all been around to know that, if he comes back and wins the race after expectations are what they are today, stranger things have happened in politics. Perhaps he could come back. But that's the last thing they need to be thinking about at this time."

The fact that Allen is now tied down in Virginia puts him at a disadvantage to other prospective candidates who are rapidly assembling organizations in early primary and caucus states such as Iowa and New Hampshire.

"Allen's got to do two things that are very tough," said a GOP strategist outside Washington who spoke anonymously so he could talk more candidly about the senator's prospects. "Assuming he wins, he's got to get right in on the organizational side into four to eight states, he's got to raise money and he's got to put a team together."

Other strategists said fundraisers might be wary of helping Allen raise the tens of millions of dollars needed to compete for the GOP nomination. Contributors like to be with winners and often are risk-averse. Until Allen gets his Senate campaign on track, those fundraisers may stay on the fence.

In Iowa, assessments about the damage to Allen varied. Steve Scheffler, who heads the Iowa Christian Alliance, said few Iowa activists are paying attention to the Virginia Senate campaign. He said his organization hosted about 850 activists recently. "I don't remember even one person bringing it up." If that is the good news, the bad news is that Allen has no real profile in the state. A Republican strategist aligned with another candidate said, "I don't think he occupied enough space for it to make much difference."

Rath said he thinks Allen will defeat Webb in November.

"Then I think he's got a chance to say, 'I've dealt with this, and move on.' Whether he can or not will be up to not just him but others."

Allen's Run Of Problematic Press (WP)

By Deborah Howell

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

So is The Post out to get George Allen? That's what some folks have been angrily charging lately.

Suzanne Rosenberg of Manassas complained: "I want to cancel my subscription to your paper. I have absolutely had it. I don't know how many articles you had on the stupid macaca incident. And this big article in The Post . . . about his ancestry, it should not matter; it's ridiculous. It's obvious that your paper does not like George Allen, does not endorse him and you're doing everything . . . to make him look bad in the eyes of the public."

Several questions arise about the coverage of the Virginia Republican senator in his campaign against Democrat James Webb. Was the "macaca" incident worth reporting? Was it overreported? Is it news that he has some Jewish heritage? Was it fair to interview his mother? Why pick up a story from a liberal-leaning online magazine that said he used "the N-word"? And does the coverage hurt Allen's campaign?

First, let's go to the macaca tape. Watch it on washingtonpost.com. It was definitely a news story. Allen rightly apologized for a lapse in judgment.

DOJ_NMG_0072591

Did The Post overplay the incident? Not initially, but the coverage went on for too long after he apologized. The news stories, handled by the paper's Virginia political reporters, did not go overboard. An editorial was well done. Then the columnists weighed in, along with Style reporters and editorial cartoonist Tom Toles. No one piece was over the line. But when you put it all together, it looked like piling on.

Then the matter of Allen's Jewish roots emerged.

There are reasons to ask a candidate, especially one who has presidential ambitions, as Allen does, about religion and ethnicity. Remember the controversy over John F. Kennedy's Catholicism? Or Democratic Sen. John F. Kerry's support for abortion rights and whether that meant he could receive communion as a Catholic? Or the continuing importance of conservative evangelicals to the Republican Party?

Post reporters at an Allen-Webb debate did not ask Allen if he had Jewish roots and hadn't planned on asking. But a TV reporter did, based on a story in the Jewish Daily Forward that said Allen's mother, Henriette, was born into a Sephardic family in Tunisia. The question was not played up in The Post's story about the debate; it was dealt with in the last two paragraphs. But Dana Milbank focused on it in his Washington Sketch column.

Allen's sputtering response , in which he said the reporter was "making aspersions," made the story come alive. And his bad-joke comments a few days later about eating a ham sandwich and his mother making good pork chops added fuel. My talks with Post Virginia editors and reporter Michael D. Shear about campaign coverage, especially on the Jewish queries, make me think they gave Allen the benefit of the doubt.

The whole package of coverage prompted Dorothy Armistead of Sperryville, Va., to complain: "I'm not Jewish myself but believe you me, I think it is a repulsive way of handling this story. I just don't understand what is happening to the editorial policy of The Washington Post that they can allow that kind of thing to happen."

A number of readers, including Karin Mears of Centreville, were upset that Allen's mother was interviewed. "It was despicable of you to call George Allen's mother and grill her about her heritage. She's 83 years old and has a right to privacy, no matter what her reasons are. "

Shear's interview with Mrs. Allen -- which the senator's campaign staff did not want to take place -- told readers what happened from the point of view of Allen's mother. It was a needed and even sympathetic story. It was easy to empathize with her fear of revealing her Jewish background, especially because her father had been imprisoned by the Nazis during World War II. She said she told Allen about it only recently, asking him to keep it secret. Allen frequently mentioned that his grandfather was imprisoned by the Nazis; it would be logical to think his grandfather might have been Jewish.

This brings us to the story from Salon that said he used the N-word in his college days. Two people, including a college friend, made the accusation; others have said they never heard him say it. The Post couldn't ignore the story , but it should have noted that Salon is a liberal-oriented Web site.

John Burpo of Springfield asked: "Why did The Post violate its own guidelines and standards to allow anonymous sources to attack Senator Allen with unsubstantiated allegations?" Using quotes from two anonymous sources who said that Allen had used the racial epithet added nothing to the story.

Does all the coverage hurt Allen's reelection prospects? The stories -- six of them were on Page 1 -- don't help him, but there are five long weeks before Election Day. The Post has also reported stories that haven't helped Webb -- such as the front-page article about his remarks concerning women in the military and accusations that he also used the N-word and took part in racial harassment when he was young.

While this has nothing to do with news coverage, it has been noted that The Post's editorial board has never endorsed Allen. That is true, but it also did not endorse Webb in the Democratic primary.

I trust that Arlington reader David Tuma's wish will be fulfilled by Election Day. He wrote: "Frankly, I think more important (and responsible) reporting would be on what has shaped their views since then and what both have done to improve conditions for all people."

From 'Dull' Accountant To Determined Candidate (MINNST)

By Jay Weiner

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 1, 2006

Hailing from a family of public servants, he is self-deprecating and focused as he seeks to join the nation's most exclusive club.

Over dinner, on their first date, Mark Kennedy, the insurance salesman's son from Pequot Lakes, gazed into the eyes of Debbie Miller, the farm girl from Hawley.

DOJ_NMG_0072592

Both of them have forgotten his exact words. But she remembers that he stated his intentions clearly: "One day I'm going to run for office."

She believed him. History shows she had reason to.

It was the summer of 1979. He was 22, a young Republican sporting a bushy hairdo and bursting with ambition.

They had met four years earlier at the Minnesota State Fair as 4-H high school leaders. No sparks flew. Then they reconnected at a 4-H reunion in St. Paul. Kennedy had a St. John's University degree -- he was the first boy in his family to graduate from college -- and was working for what he calls "the Marine Corps of accounting," the Arthur Andersen firm.

Debbie, a North Dakota State senior, was the 4-H youth director in Walker, 190 miles northwest of the Twin Cities.

"If I can get gas, I can take you out," Kennedy told her at the reunion, referring to a gas shortage triggered by that era's Iranian revolution.

Kennedy drove his silver Toyota Celica the four hours to Walker, they went to dinner, and he revealed the desire that has propelled him to where he is now: in a nationally watched U.S. Senate race against Democrat Amy Klobuchar -- an election that's becoming more rough-and-tumble because it could decide who controls Congress.

"He talked about public service, of giving back," Debbie Kennedy said of the man she married in 1980; they have four children. "He had this inner feeling, this inner calling. He just knew."

Fifteen hours on message

Even at 5:29 a.m. on an August morning, Mark Kennedy is poised to be on message. For the next 15 hours.

A rented Winnebago RV awaits him outside his Watertown rambler. He plunks his lanky 6-foot-2 frame into the swiveling captain's seat of the RV's living room. Ahead are 547 miles, six campaign stops, hundreds of handshakes.

He's dressed in his standard campaign outfit: plaid shirt, neatly creased Eddie Bauer khakis and dark shoes. Members of Kennedy's campaign staff affectionately describe him as "dorky."

He stokes that image in self-deprecating jokes, in a campaign ad featuring family members (he has six siblings) making fun of his lack of charisma, even in interviews.

"Some people say they are what they're not," Kennedy said. "I know who I am. I'm a dull, boring accountant."

There's more than that on his résumé. First, his precocious climb through the corporate world -- he was senior vice president of a $7 billion company, Federated Department Stores, by the time he was 30. Then there's his six years in Congress, serving as a staunch ally of President Bush.

Now, undaunted by polls that show him trailing Klobuchar, Kennedy begins many of his campaign days by opening a blue three-ring binder. It's crammed with single-spaced briefing notes that he types on issues he plans to tackle in his speeches.

As he campaigns, Kennedy, 49, speaks knowledgeably about energy and the economy, education or the war in Iraq. But with notebook in hand on the summer day his RV rumbled to Winona, the one-time St. Cloud Community Theater actor kept studying lines he would repeat over and over to voters down the road.

A family legacy of politics

In a sense, Kennedy has been revving up for this political ride since he was knee-high to a lawn sign.

"It had just been assumed," said his brother Steven Kennedy, a Minneapolis lawyer.

Their great-grandfather was a county commissioner. Their grandfather? A mayor. Their father, Eugene, the insurance salesman, was on the school board for 27 years.

By 2000, back in Minnesota after working out of state for nearly a decade, Mark Kennedy ran for Congress against Democratic incumbent David Minge.

Beforehand, Kennedy spent months examining Minge's voting record. He hunkered down alone in his Watertown basement office, surrounded by ancestral photos, mementos of his corporate deals, and his collection of books on Democrat John F. Kennedy, his political hero. (He notes that JFK cut taxes.)

To campaign full time, he quit his $277,000-a-year job as vice president and chief financial officer of Department 56, the Eden Prairie holiday collectibles company.

He had already joined Toastmasters to spend more time with friends. But the speakers club also helped improve his sometimes robotic oratorical style. To build a political network, he helped form a local group of conservatives in business, a sort of alumni association of Young Republicans that became known as "The Rough Riders" in homage to Teddy Roosevelt.

After "shaking every hand in the Second District," Kennedy beat Minge by 155 votes. "I'm lucky enough to come from a large Irish family," is one of Kennedy's favored quips on the stump, "and I have 155 relatives."

On the campaign trail, Kennedy tirelessly tries to tell jokes. He waits like a vaudevillian for the crowd's laughs after he uncorks a line about growing up in Pequot Lakes -- a town "so small that a lot of folks visiting thought it was called 'Resume Speed.' "

DOJ_NMG_0072593

He also sticks relentlessly to his talking points and tosses an array of political jabs at prosecutor Klobuchar, asking, "Do we really need more lawyers in Washington?" and saying that she hails from the "liberal fringe."

And as he rushes from town to town, he is almost incapable of passing a Dairy Queen without stopping. He is an unrepentant DQ freak.

Mocha Chip Blizzards.

'Could be the decisive vote'

As the sun set in Willmar, Kennedy, a devout Catholic who strongly opposes abortion, talked about values.

A crowd of about 50 volunteers and supporters gathered at a picnic grove and listened to him as he let rip on subjects such as keeping "God" in the Pledge of Allegiance and questioning why judges should be ruling on "redefining marriage," thus potentially allowing gays and lesbians to wed.

The accountant-turned-pol was now jabbing his index finger at the crowd.

"The U.S. Supreme Court, we've got four folks that definitely think the Constitution was a pretty good thing and ought to be read," Kennedy said. "And four that have a different viewpoint. And one that just happens to have a name similar to mine [Justice Anthony Kennedy] ... "

He went on, "Our president may have an opportunity to nominate a justice. If we don't have a majority in the Senate to help him get it through, then shame on us."

Then Kennedy made a pitch for his supporters to make phone calls, to write letters to the editor, to get out the vote.

"This could be the decisive vote in the U.S. Senate," he said.

The crowd exploded in applause. Kennedy, smiling broadly, rocked his entire body.

He returned to the RV as buoyant at 9 p.m. as he'd been at 5:29 a.m. It had been a long, good day.

A hardball ally

Mingling with voters, Kennedy is polite and engaging. He says his sensibility is "Big Ten, not Ivy League," a subtle dig at Klobuchar's Yale pedigree.

Ford Bell, a former DFL Senate candidate who disagrees mightily with Kennedy on most issues, said that his rival was always cordial. "When I got out of the race, he said he enjoyed having me in it," Bell said.

So how does Kennedy reconcile that image with his decision to hire a hardball political consultant named Scott Howell to produce his campaign ads?

Howell is famous, or infamous, for producing attack ads against his clients' opponents. He helped orchestrate the "Swift Boat" ad campaign against John Kerry during the 2004 presidential race.

Kennedy's campaign began with rosy ads about his family life. But last week, still trailing in polls, he unveiled ads with a much different focus and tone.

One features images of guns and drugs, suggesting that Kloubuchar, Hennepin County's chief prosecutor, is soft on crime. Another ad suggests she is two-faced on issues.

Kennedy is unapologetic about the tactic. He says the ads about Klobuchar's record are "100 percent factual" and necessary because the media, including the Star Tribune, is not critiquing her and is imposing a "near blackout on anything positive" he has done.

"It's necessary to review each candidate's record," Kennedy said. "If one's record is viewed as negative, that's unfortunate."

'All Kennedys get along'

"What Would Paul Do?" reads the green Wellstone bumper sticker on the bulletin board.

This is Peg Kennedy's office at the Roseville Area Schools, where she manages youth development and bilingual services.

"I'm maybe not the biggest Bush fan in the world," she says. But she's going to vote for her brother anyway.

At 45, she's the sister closest in age to Mark Kennedy and, perhaps, the furthest away in politics.

On abortion and the amount of money needed for education, they agree to disagree.

But Peg Kennedy points out that Mark voted against Bush's signature education initiative, No Child Left Behind. He's also struck a relationship with parts of Minnesota's Somali community. That's close to her heart because she oversees the needs of students who speak 52 different languages.

"All Kennedys get along," said Mark when asked of Peg.

All Kennedys rib each other, too. She likes to tell him, "You know, for four of your first six years [in the Senate] you'll be working with a Democratic president."

That taunt presumes that in 2008 a Dem will succeed Bush and that her brother will win in November. But polls are projecting election-day gloom for Kennedy, who has felt few defeats.

"The polls do not reflect reality," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0072594

Still, Kennedy is seizing on hope where ever he finds it, as he did two Saturdays ago. Four of his favorite sports teams -- Michigan (his business school alma mater), Notre Dame (which two of his children have attended), St. John's (his college) and the Twins -- all were behind in their respective games.

But each fought back hard and won. A sign?

"I'm being providential," Kennedy said.

Cardin, Steele Share Views On Key Issues (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

Maryland's U.S. Senate candidates have more in common on key issues than either candidate is willing to admit.

Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the Democratic nominee, and Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, the Republican nominee, both demand an exit strategy for troops in Iraq. They also want to preserve Social Security benefits for current retirees, but give workers more choice in retirement planning, and they say government should help provide more affordable energy, health care, prescription drugs and college education.

However, on the stump the two men sound worlds apart and likely will continue to emphasize their differences in their first debate Tuesday night at the Greater Baltimore Urban League.

"There is a big difference in the agenda Ben Cardin and Michael Steele will take to the United States Senate," Mr. Cardin said last week at a campaign rally in College Park. "Michael Steele will not hold George Bush accountable for trying to privatize Social Security."

Mr. Steele, a Prince George's County native who formerly ran the state Republican Party, never took a position on President Bush's plan to partially privatize Social Security. The administration shelved the plan last year after it ran into opposition from retirees.

Mr. Cardin, 62, a 10-term congressman from Baltimore, wants workers to have an easier time putting money into private retirement accounts to supplement Social Security.

Mr. Steele, 47, supports giving workers "some ownership" of their retirement savings, perhaps putting a portion of Social Security withholdings into private accounts.

However, Mr. Cardin has supported Social Security privatization plans in the past. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, he helped draft plans in 2002 and in 1998 that would have diverted FICA taxes to private accounts or market investments.

Republicans are criticizing Mr. Cardin for reversing his stance.

"Maryland voters deserve leaders who tells them exactly where they stand on important issues like Social Security, not a lifetime politician who talks out of both sides of his mouth and does one thing while saying another," Maryland Republican Party Chairman John M. Kane said.

The Cardin campaign did not return a call seeking comment.

The candidates do have opposing political ideologies.

Mr. Cardin is a liberal who in the Senate can be expected to vote consistently with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat. Last year, he received a 95 percent rating from the liberal Americans for Democratic Action. Mr. Steele is a conservative, but with an independent streak that at times could put him at odds with his party.

The starkest contrast is on abortion. Mr. Steele is pro-life; Mr. Cardin is pro-choice.

Steele campaign spokesman Doug Heye thinks the candidates share no common policy views. "Their approaches are entirely different," he said. On health care, for example, Mr. Heye said Mr. Steele does not agree with Mr. Cardin's support of socialized medicine. Mr. Cardin has often called for universal health coverage.

"I support universal health coverage," Mr. Cardin said at the rally. "[Mr. Steele] does not. There's a big difference."

Still, Mr. Cardin never has advocated socialized medicine. He proposes "building on the current employer-based system of health care" and wants the government to help small businesses pay for employee health benefits.

Mr. Steele also wants the government to help expand access to health care.

The lieutenant governor notes his work with Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican seeking re-election, dedicating state grants to increase access to 12 community health centers.

In a recent TV ad, Mr. Steele says Mr. Cardin is part of the "Washington crowd" and that his vote is for sale to special interests.

"Congressman Cardin took money from drug companies and voted against cheaper medicine," Mr. Steele says. "Ben Cardin has taken money from special interests for 20 years. I want to ban gifts from special interests."

DOJ_NMG_0072595

Mr. Cardin has accepted campaign contributions from pharmaceutical companies and voted against allowing the reimportation of cheaper drugs from Canada. However, he has proposed several bills aimed at lowering drug prices, including one that would allow the government to haggle for lower prices by using the buying power of its 40 million Medicare recipients.

Mr. Cardin also has proposed ethics reforms, including a streamlined ethics-complaint process and tighter restriction of lobbyists' gifts.

Challenger Known For Zest And Freewheeling Style (SLPD)

By Virginia Young

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

Losing her lifelong dream of becoming Missouri's first woman governor didn't slow Claire McCaskill down.

Months after that 2004 defeat, she decided to challenge Republican Sen. Jim Talent. Such resiliency and zest for battle have marked her career as a legislator, prosecutor and auditor for nearly 24 years.

Some of McCaskill's friends say this race could be her "up-or-out" campaign.

"She knows if she loses, this is it for her," says her longtime friend, political consultant Steve Glorioso of Kansas City.

McCaskill, 53, doesn't dwell on the possibility of losing. She's too busy calling potential donors and canvassing the state in a bright blue RV. Polls show Talent and McCaskill in a dead heat.

The race is one of a handful nationwide that will determine whether Republicans will keep control of the Senate.

To win, McCaskill must woo rural voters, who sided with Republican Gov. Matt Blunt in 2004 and overpowered her margin in urban areas.

So she's spending time in places like Springfield and Joplin, Poplar Bluff and Caruthersville. That's where the radio airwaves are loaded with Republican spots painting her as anti-gun, pro-tax, close to environmentalists and soft on illegal aliens.

"They work very hard at making me Satan's sister," she quips.

Her theme is that Talent votes in lockstep with the president and listens to corporate America. She promises to be a senator "on our side."

People often stop her to express regret for not backing her for governor, she says. Many are upset about Blunt's cuts in Medicaid, the government health care program for the poor.

"There's a real sense the government has become more and more about the powerful and the wealthy," McCaskill says.

On a recent Saturday afternoon, McCaskill take her message to Poplar Bluff. She and her husband, developer Joseph Shepard, board the rented RV for the three-hour trek from St. Louis to the 41st Annual Truman Day Rally.

McCaskill says she is more relaxed during this campaign. She doesn't have to fight her own party, like she did in 2004 when she toppled Gov. Bob Holden for the Democratic nomination.

She enjoys taking the RV instead of the family-owned twin-engine aircraft. She can work at the table on her wireless laptop. Sometimes, her mother, sisters or children — Austin, 19, Maddie, 17 and Lily, 14 — tag along.

Wearing a pink suit and pearls, she settles in. She brought Thomas E. Ricks' book about the war, "Fiasco," that she saw President Bill Clinton carrying during his recent fundraiser for McCaskill in St. Louis. Foreign policy is not her forte so she crams to catch up.

She advocates a two-year phased pullout in Iraq, with American troops eventually replaced by a multinational force.

"This isn't about throwing in the towel," she says. "It's about being smarter."

She jokes about the trackers who slip into meetings and secretly record her. With her tendency for pithy lines, her words instantly find their way to the Internet's blogs.

Some have drawn heat, such as when she said President Bush let people die on rooftops in New Orleans or when she called state senators Neanderthals. But McCaskill says she won't drop her freewheeling style.

When the RV arrives in Poplar Bluff, she stands to stretch a bad knee that needs replacing as soon as the election is over. She tries not to limp.

Inside, the Elks hall is bustling. The Butler County Democratic Central Committee has sold 325 tickets for the steak-and-baked-potato feed. Some in the crowd wear stickers that proclaim: "Had enough? Vote Democrat."

McCaskill takes the podium after dinner, at 8:55 p.m. She says Republicans are calling the shots in both Washington and Jefferson City so they should be held accountable for everything from immigration problems to gas prices to pork barrel projects.

She promises to work to ease the "middle class squeeze" by pushing tax breaks for first-time home purchases, child care and college tuition.

"Let's take some of those tax breaks for multimillionaires and give them to the middle class," she says, drawing applause.

Voters such as Carol McManaman of Cape Girardeau like her pitch. "The current government is not supportive of everyday people," McManaman says.

DOJ_NMG_0072596

Politics in her veins

McCaskill's roots are in rural Missouri.

Her family lived in Houston in south-central Missouri when she was born. They moved to Lebanon and later Columbia when her father, the late Bill McCaskill, got a promotion in his insurance company.

Politics was the family pastime. In the early 1970s, her father oversaw insurance regulation for Gov. Warren Hearnes.

Her mother, Betty McCaskill, was the first woman elected to the Columbia City Council. She was known for her outspokenness, walking out of improper closed meetings and telling reporters what was going on.

Claire McCaskill says she reached a "fork in the road" when she failed to make cheerleader at Hickman High School her senior year. She was devastated until the assistant principal suggested she try the debate team.

She credits the experience with giving her the self-confidence and tools to go into politics. She learned to think on her feet. She says she never gives the same speech twice.

Her younger sister, Lisa Finn, says McCaskill has always dealt with setbacks by forging ahead.

"Claire just has always been able to see the big picture," Finn says. Disappointments are "not something she needs to carry around like baggage."

After she got her bachelor's and law degrees from the University of Missouri in Columbia, McCaskill split for Kansas City.

First, she worked as an assistant prosecutor, handling sexual abuse cases. Winning a House seat at age 29, she established a reputation as a straight-shooter.

"She will say what's on her mind," says Jan Marcason, who worked on McCaskill's first campaign. "She doesn't try to be all things to all people."

McCaskill helped found the Greater Kansas City Women's Political Caucus, which Marcason says began with 30 women in a church basement. It now draws 1,000 people to its annual awards dinner.

McCaskill left the House to become the first female Jackson County prosecutor. She set up a drug court and stepped up domestic violence prosecutions.

Subject of criticism

She won the auditor's job in 1998 on a promise to do "performance audits" that tracked whether programs were effective.

Her hard-hitting reports the past eight years have attacked hundreds of wasteful practices, even when her own party controlled the governor's office. Critics say she oversteps her authority and hypes findings to get media attention.

"It's fine to say 'This is bad,'" said Senate Majority Leader Charlie Shields, R-St. Joseph. "The next question is, 'What are you doing to fix it?'"

Shields says that unlike other statewide officeholders, McCaskill has never been in his office to push for any legislative action.

Talent contends McCaskill has a liberal record and is reinventing herself to gain votes in rural Missouri. He is hammering her on three volatile issues: guns, taxes and abortion.

Radio spots allege that McCaskill supports gun restrictions, the "death tax" and "abortion on demand at any time up to nine months." The Republican National Committee is paying for the spots, which are running everywhere in the state except St. Louis and Kansas City.

McCaskill calls the ad misleading. While she opposed bills allowing people to carry concealed weapons, "she's not taking anyone's gun," says her communications director, Adrianne Marsh.

The "death tax" refers to the estate tax, which McCaskill opposes repealing. But she favors exempting the first $10 million, which would help family farmers and small businesses.

As for abortion, McCaskill has supported a ban on partial-birth abortion, but only if it contains a provision to protect the life of the mother.

Mansion minus airs

Though she's running on her platform for the middle class, McCaskill is married to a multimillionaire.

She and Shepard, who wed in 2002, recently built a mansion in Kirkwood. It includes a swimming pool and an apartment for McCaskill's mother over the garage.

The sprawling complex dwarfs the modest houses in the neighborhood, some of which have been there for more than half a century.

But McCaskill has made friends on the block. She attends neighborhood meetings and hosted the Christmas potluck dinner. She loves to cook.

Samuel M. Taft, 90, owns a ranch house up the street, though he recently moved to a senior apartment complex. He says neighbors thought the mansion "was a little much, but they are accepting it because the people are genuine."

McCaskill has "a lot of charisma, a lot of ability and talent," Taft says.

DOJ_NMG_0072597

Historically, the party that's out of power gains congressional seats midway through a president's second term. Uneasiness with the war in Iraq could add to the Democrats' momentum.

"People have had enough," McCaskill declares. "They want a different voice. They want balance."

So is this her last race? She says no, because she's going to win and could seek re-election after a six-year term.

"It's my last campaign for six years," she says.

Incumbent Senator Is Intense And Restless (SLPD)

By Deirdre Shesgreen

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON

When Sen. Jim Talent decided to re-examine his position on stem cell research, he took a quiet, methodical approach to the politically explosive question.

He read scholarly journals and opinion pieces. He delved into the details of human biology. He met with scientists and had long debates with his staff. And he talked over the political implications with his wife.

The freshman senator took an entire year to come to his new conclusion: that he should withdraw his support for a human cloning ban that critics said would also outlaw stem cell research. Instead, Talent decided to back a still-developing alternative procedure.

To some, the decision seemed out of character, a politically motivated switch aimed at blunting his conservative edges for his re-election campaign.

But Talent's soul-searching was not unusual for the low-key lawmaker, who approaches nearly every issue with a zeal for detail. He doesn't rush into anything, taking a deliberative, careful tack. And although he is staunchly conservative, he is also deeply pragmatic.

"He's not a firebrand by any stretch," says Julie Dammann, ex-chief of staff to Sen. Christopher Bond, R-Mo., who has known Talent for nearly 15 years. "He's principled but pragmatic. His approach is, 'Let's see if there's a way to accommodate everyone'."

Staircase sleeper

Among his Senate colleagues, Talent is known as astute, affable, and intense. He is driven and ambitious, but not splashy or sharp-elbowed. He's a policy wonk who avoids the Sunday talk shows and is rarely found at the center of any Washington media throng.

"He's very steady, reliable, thoughtful and practical," said Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., who often runs into Talent in the evenings at the Capitol Hill gym, where they make plans to go out for buffalo chicken wings at a nearby pizza place. "He's a guy who understands the parameters of what you can accomplish."

Tall and lanky, Talent, who will turn 50 this month, even wins praise from some Democratic colleagues.

In politics, "you see a lot of ceremony and posturing and phony baloney," but there's none of that pomp with Talent, said Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., who teamed up with Talent on a transportation initiative. "He's just very easy to work with."

Although Talent's financial disclosure shows that his family's net worth is between $1.1 million and $3.9 million, he shares a one-bedroom apartment near the Supreme Court with Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kansas. He sleeps on a landing at the top of a staircase, where he has just enough room for a clothes rack and a bedside table.

He confesses to occasionally sleeping in his Senate office if he's working late. A big night out for Talent means going out for wings, or perhaps watching a baseball game with staff at a nearby restaurant.

Brownback said they don't get into a lot of deep policy debates most evenings, and not just because they agree on most issues. "There's a camaraderie of dads that miss being around their kids and husbands that miss being around their wives. That concentrates a lot of our discussion," Brownback said.

Back in Missouri, Talent rarely gets any down-time now that his campaign is in full swing. When he does, he says he often spends it playing foosball with his 10-year-old daughter, Chrissy, fishing with 16-year-old son, Michael, or taking the family's new Great Dane puppy for a walk near his home in Chesterfield.

Mixing it up

At a late-August campaign stop in Farmington, Mo., Talent checked his Blackberry and reviewed his talking points, written out on a crumpled business card stashed in his pocket, as he waited to give his pitch to the clutch of GOP voters.

In the warm morning sun, Talent's low-key delivery didn't rev the crowd into a frenzy. But his soft sell worked all the same, with voters cheering him on and vowing to rally their neighbors to the polls in November.

But behind Talent's pleasant persona lies a sharply conservative philosophy.

DOJ_NMG_0072598

He came to Congress in 1993 as part of a vanguard of hard-charging GOP conservatives who wrested control of the House from the Democrats the next year. In the Senate, he almost always lines up with his party's leaders, supporting the Republican agenda on everything from tax cuts to the Iraq war to gay marriage.

Talent's own legislative record is more mixed. Many of the top proposals he has pushed in the last four years were driven more by pragmatism than ideology—and most involved working with liberal Democrats:

He teamed up with Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., to pass a new anti-methamphetamine law that put cold remedies behind the pharmacy counter.

He worked with Wyden to win approval of $15 billion in federal bonding authority to build or rebuild highways and bridges.

He and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., pushed legislation creating 40 sickle-cell treatment and research centers around the country.

He joined several Democrats in pressing for a new national fuel requirement that doubles the use of ethanol over the next seven years.

Intense, relentless

His approach centers on being deliberate and quiet.

One example: his efforts on behalf of ethanol, a popular issue among Talent's base of supporters in rural Missouri.

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said Talent was direct and relentless in winning the panel's approval.

"He's a go-getter," Domenici said. "He isn't a hollering-and-screaming go-getter. He just gets his target set, comes to see you, tells you what he wants to do, and then he works like hell at it."

When the bill reached the House, Talent used his old contacts to keep the pressure on.

"He called me every single day, saying 'Can you talk to so-and-so'?" said Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, R-Cape Girardeau. Emerson was not on the House negotiating committee, but Talent wanted her to call her friends who were.

"He drove me crazy," she said. "He's very deliberate and gets very intense."

Talent has softened his conservative edges since coming to the Senate, and even more so since it became clear he would face a difficult election challenge from state Auditor Claire McCaskill. Democratic critics say voters should not be fooled. Rep. Lacy Clay Jr., D-St. Louis, who has known Talent for 20 years and counts him as a friend, says Talent is no moderate.

"There's no way around his voting record. The proof is in the pudding," Clay said. Of Talent's stem cell switch, Clay quipped, "That's just shrewd political calculation."

In 2004, Talent voted with his party 96 percent of the time and with the president 94 percent of the time. Last year, those figures dipped to 84 percent and 91 percent respectively. In 2004, he won a 96 percent rating from the American Conservative Union, based on 25 votes ranging from federal spending to gun control to judicial nominations. Last year, his rating fell to 84 percent.

Talent says he's always been driven by pragmatism and the desire to find consensus, even in the mid-1990s when he was among those leading the GOP charge to reform welfare. That effort, he notes, eventually resulted in a dramatic attitude shift, in both parties, toward the federal poverty program.

"What I often will do on issues that have provoked a lot of controversy is to try and understand them on a detailed level," he said. "If you do, you'll often find ways to either eliminate, or at least narrow, the differences."

Conservative roots

The day after Talent won the election in 2002, defeating Sen. Jean Carnahan, D-Mo., he said he hoped to be like Sen. John Danforth, the Missouri Republican known for his independent streak.

Danforth was one of his mother's favorite politicians, Talent recounted at the time, because she knew he was "calling each one as he sees them." Talent said he wanted to be seen as a senator who did that too.

It was a striking aspiration for someone then known as a rock-ribbed conservative.

In his first years in the House, Talent aligned himself closely with the GOP leadership, becoming a top lieutenant to House Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas, and even flirting briefly with a bid for House Speaker.

He took a leading role on welfare reform and argued for even tougher restrictions than GOP leaders had embraced, including a proposal to deny federal benefits to young unwed mothers.

His voting record was unabashedly conservative: he voted against a minimum wage increase, against campaign finance reform, and against the Family and Medical Leave Act. He voted in favor of school vouchers, repealing the assault weapons ban, and impeaching President Bill Clinton.

Steven Smith, a political science professor at Washington University, said Talent is among a group of Republican senators who entered politics at a time when conservatism was on the rise. "They all came in and first ran as fairly strong partisans, sometimes with a deliberate conservative edge," he said. "And they are all deserting it now. Senator Talent is, too."

DOJ_NMG_0072599

Smith and others say Talent is no Danforth.

"What's clearly true here is Talent has been a team player for the Republican Party and for the Bush administration since he was elected," Smith said.

"... Danforth stood out for being an independent voice ... and Talent really has not been a strong independent voice."

Talent says his guiding philosophy has never changed: that government should only do a few things, but it should do them very well.

His work, he says, has focused on both sides of that equation; he looks for ways to lighten government's "oppressive" hand when it comes to taxes and regulation, while strengthening government's abilities when it comes to infrastructure or justice.

That explains, he says, why he wants to abolish the estate tax and pushed for a big increase in transportation spending. Or why he wants to lift regulations on small business health plans and has called for a new unit in the Justice Department to investigate murders from the civil rights era.

"Some people look at that as my style changing," Talent said of his work with Democrats. But he sees it as simple pragmatism—and very consistent with his basic outlook of small and effective government.

"I approach things with that lens and I vote that way," he said.

Race Keys On Who's Missing (HC)

By Kristen Mack

Houston Chronicle, October 1, 2006

Republican is not on the ballot, and Dem never names GOP rival

Former U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay is as partisan as they come, and the Republican write-in candidate to succeed him is taking the same approach. The Democrat in the race, perhaps not surprisingly, is playing down his party ties in the Republican-leaning suburban Houston district.

City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs is invoking the name of U.S. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, a bogeywoman to Republicans, and raising the specter of Pelosi as speaker should the Democrats reclaim control of the House.

"This is ground zero for the Democrat Party," Sekula-Gibbs said at a recent Republican gathering, using a favorite GOP pejorative for its Democratic rival.

"They've been effective in getting rid of the most conservative member of the House," she said of DeLay, addressing the faithful at the Greater Houston Pachyderm Club.

She talks big: As the 22nd Congressional District goes, so go the midterm elections. Yet she acknowledges that the national Republican Party isn't sure about her chances as a write-in.

"We have support, attention and response from our national leaders," she said. "But Washington has to be convinced this is winnable."

Democrat Nick Lampson, by contrast, talks mostly about wanting to advance the district beyond partisan politics.

"I'm not running for this office to move it to the left or the right but to move it forward," Lampson likes to say at campaign events. "We need to concentrate on issues and not partisanship. I came into this race and decided I wasn't going to run against anyone."

As it turns out, the statement means more than he thought: His only ballot opponent is a Libertarian, and that party has had little success in Texas. DeLay resigned from Congress after winning nomination for a 12th term, and courts prohibited Republicans from replacing him on the Nov. 7 ballot.

With 17 months of campaigning under his belt and millions in the bank, Lampson has a head start over Sekula-Gibbs.

In fact, listening to him speak, you wouldn't know he has an opponent.

Instead he starts off sharing his personal background. He's the fifth of six children. His father died when he was 12, which is when he got his first job. His mother relied on government assistance to help them get by. She had a fifth-grade education but earned her GED on her 80th birthday.

Lampson isn't the most compelling speaker, but the story of hardscrabble upbringing often draws nods of empathy from crowds.

For Lampson, the race has a kind of political symmetry. He was ousted from the U.S. House in 2004 after his Southeast Texas district was redrawn to elect a Republican in the redistricting engineered by DeLay.

Move to StaffordDuring four terms in Congress, Lampson represented 20 percent of what is now the 22nd District, including the Johnson Space Center. He moved last year from Beaumont to Stafford, which is in the district.

He filed for the seat assuming his Republican opponent would be DeLay, who had been tainted by ethics reprimands and an indictment on charges relating to campaign finance.

As it turned out, no Republican is on the general election ballot for the 22nd.

DOJ_NMG_0072600

But Sekula-Gibbs' name will be on the ballot for the special election to complete the final weeks of DeLay's term. That will be the first thing voters in the district see on their ballots.

The Secretary of State's Office directed Harris County Clerk Beverly Kaufman to put the special election at the top of the ballot, ahead of the general election races, said Kaufman spokesman David Beirne.

That placement alone may give Sekula-Gibbs' write-in chances a boost, although no write-in candidate has ever won a House race in Texas.

Her campaign slogan, "Vote Twice for Shelley," reminds her supporters that marking the special election ballot alone isn't enough and that they need to write in her name later on the ballot to send her to Congress next year.

"You don't have to spell it right, just get it close and it should count," she said during a recent meeting of the Greater Houston Council of Federated Republican Women.

Explaining how to voteThe need to explain how to vote for her leaves her less time to convince voters that they should.

Sekula-Gibbs has several versions of her stump speech. The one-minute version goes something like this: "I support the global war on terror. I'm for taxes that are fair, life and traditional marriage. My opponent is not a moderate. He has the worst rating on taxes; he's for embryonic stem cell research."

She always mentions Lampson. He never talks about her. Acknowledging her in any way only builds her name identification in the district.

Sekula-Gibbs, who is a physician, has focused as a councilwoman on health issues, pushing for a citywide public smoking ban and for more federally qualified health clinics.

But her emphasis has moved to hot-button conservative issues since she began her congressional bid.

One of those, illegal immigration, came to the forefront in the last few weeks as the city mourned the shooting death of police officer Rodney Johnson. The suspect is an illegal immigrant.

Sekula-Gibbs pushed Mayor Bill White to repeal a police policy limiting inquiries about immigration status.

Late last year she accused then-Councilman Mark Ellis, who was running for a state Senate seat, of "political gamesmanship" when he made a similar request.

The national Republican Party has taken note of her candidacy, though not at the $3 million level state GOP leaders had mentioned when they voted to back Sekula-Gibbs' write-in candidacy.

The National Republican Congressional Committee has contributed nearly $100,000 to her campaign. And Vice President Dick Cheney is coming to Houston on Wednesday to host a fundraiser for her.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Majority Leader John Boehner joined Sekula-Gibbs for a fundraiser last month in Washington.

Lampson snagged 2004 Democratic vice-presidential nominee John Edwards to headline a fundraiser on his behalf a few weeks ago. And the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has reserved $850,000 worth of television advertising time for the last two weeks of the campaign on Lampson's behalf, said DCCC spokeswoman Sarah Feinberg.

Lampson's key issuesLampson didn't file in the special election, saying it would be confusing. Sekula-Gibbs says he didn't want to face a Republican in a head-to-head competition.

If that were true, Lampson says, he wouldn't have entered the race when DeLay was the likely opponent.

Lampson's key issues are homeland security, education and health care.

Among other things, he advocates tax deductions for all money spent on higher education and questions whether special-needs children — such as the ones his wife teaches — should be subject to standardized testing.

Libertarian Bob Smither is running in both the general and special elections.

He touts himself as the conservative on the general election ballot.

"I wouldn't say I'm aligning myself with the Republican Party," said Smither, an engineer who founded the Laura Recovery Center for missing and abducted children. "I'm aligning myself with conservative values."

Although Libertarians have appeared on the Texas ballot for years, none has been elected to a major office. Smither has no significant campaign funding and realizes he has a lot to overcome.

Meanwhile, Lampson realizes that even as the sole major-party candidate on the general election ballot, he will have to win votes from at least some residents who supported DeLay for years.

Robert Klein, a retired chemical-industry manager who attended a house party for Lampson, said he faces a battle even with the ballot advantage.

Still, Klein said, this is Lampson's best shot: "If Lampson can't win now, he can't win."

High-powered Allies Come Out To Back Murtha (PPG)

By Bill Toland

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 1, 2006

Congressman's opposition to Iraq War divides electorate

JOHNSTOWN -- If John Murtha is ceding a significant segment of the military voting block to Republican challenger Diana Irey, as she hopes and claims, there were few signs of it yesterday. A cavalcade of rank-and-file vets and Democratic military brass gathered in Johnstown's damp Central Park to support the representative from Pennsylvania's 12th Congressional District.

Former U.S. Sen. Max Cleland, a disabled Vietnam veteran, was the rally's master of ceremonies, and he was joined through the late morning and early afternoon by Vietnam veteran and former U.S. Sen. Bob Kerrey, former NATO commander Gen. Wesley Clark, state Auditor General Jack Wagner and finally Gov. Ed Rendell, himself seeking re-election this November.

They all hit on a common theme -- that Mr. Murtha, the top-ranking Democrat on the House committee that disburses defense appropriations -- is a great friend of the American soldier, not a foe, as his challengers are trying to paint him.

"We're tired of swift-boating in America," said Georgia's Cleland, who lost his own re-election bid in 2002 after his patriotism was questioned. "And it stops right here today, in Johnstown, Pennsylvania."

Mr. Murtha, who spent 37 years in the Marine Corps and its reserves, angered some veterans, and became a visible target for the GOP, when he began publicly campaigning for a military withdrawal from Iraq. He's drawn more partisan fire as he's continued to criticize the White House's handling of the war, as well as Marine involvement in the killing of 24 unarmed Iraqi civilians in the town of Haditha. (When Mr. Murtha went on the offensive following the Haditha revelations, Ms. Irey called on the congressman to apologize, saying he was aiding and comforting the enemy.)

Ms. Irey's name wasn't spoken once over the course of the 90-minute rally, which police officials say drew a crowd of 2,000, but the incendiary issues have put this race, and Ms. Irey's face and candidacy, into a national spotlight. The Washington County commissioner says she believes the military voting bloc is more divided than Mr. Murtha realizes. She hopes to capitalize on the split in Cambria County and the rest of the 12th District, which historically had been impenetrable to Republicans, but in recent presidential elections has been voting more conservatively. Ms. Irey won't attend today's "Boot Murtha" rally in Johnstown, organized by local vet Craig Minnick and a GOP group called "Vets for Truth."

Mr. Murtha's criticisms, said Mr. Kerrey, demonstrate that the congressman of three decades has the courage to oppose the White House, in a time when opposition of the president means you'll be branded a turncoat.

"Long before it was cool to wave a flag and support the men and women wearing the military [uniforms] of our Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Air Force and Coast Guard, Jack Murtha was waving the flag and supporting the men and women of our Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps and Coast Guard," Mr. Kerrey said. "Until Jack Murtha stood up and began to tell the American people what was going on, there were far too many people [unaware]."

The other speakers picked up where Mr. Kerrey left off. "Jack had the courage to stand up and tell the truth," said Gen. Clark. "This administration's leadership of the war has been incompetent, inept. We're not going to let any swift-boaters, shrimp-boaters or anybody else take out Jack Murtha."

Mr. Rendell, who flew in from Harrisburg yesterday afternoon, said Mr. Murtha has done more for American fighting men and women than "any American alive today ... How dare these outsiders come here to Pennsylvania and impugn the patriotism of one of the greatest sons in this commonwealth's history."

Mr. Murtha took the dais last, again criticizing the war effort but sympathizing with the soldiers who must fight it, as well as the nearly 3,000 killed and 20,000 injured. "You know what this war's doing? It's tearing the families apart," he said. "I don't appreciate these people sitting on their fat backsides in the White House, sending our young people to war, when they don't understand the circumstances."

In a recent interview, Ms. Irey said that Mr. Murtha has lost touch with his constituency. "Jack Murtha has been in office 32 years, and that's too long," she said.

She won't be attending today's anti-Murtha rally, she said, because she doesn't want it to appear that her campaign is coordinating with the "Vets for Truth" group.

Stay-the-course Republican Challenges Murtha For Congress (TLPA)

By Jennifer C. Yates

Times Leader (NE PA), October 1, 2006

TARENTUM, Pa. - Republican Diana Irey knew she was taking on a political giant when she decided to run against U.S. Rep. John Murtha, now best-known for his opposition to the Iraq war. But she is hoping her strong support for the war will make her stand out.

Murtha has represented southwestern Pennsylvania for 32 years, winning the last general election with 74 percent of the vote. He's one of the most powerful Democrats in Congress. And there's even an airport named after the 73-year-old Vietnam veteran - who stands over 6 feet tall - in his southwestern Pennsylvania district.

DOJ_NMG_0072602

Irey, who is just under 5 feet tall and nearly 30 years younger than Murtha, has been a Washington County commissioner for 11 years but is making her first bid for Congress.

"This is going to be the Diana and Goliath story," said Irey, 44.

Irey said she was spurred to run in part because of Murtha's high-profile criticism of the Iraq war, which has turned the once low-profile congressman into a nationally prominent figure.

At the least, Irey said, she is giving voters a clear choice.

Irey wants troops in Iraq to stay the course while Murtha has called for a withdrawal. She supports term limits; he is in his 16th term. She wants to make President Bush's tax cuts permanent; he voted against them.

But her No. 1 issue remains the war.

"My passion about the war comes from the many soldiers I've talked to who have been in Iraq and have told me about the progress we've been making," said Irey during a recent meet-and-greet at a Tarentum storefront.

Last year, Murtha drew a mix of criticism and praise when he called for the immediate withdrawal of troops from Iraq. In May, he raised eyebrows again when he said that Marine Corps officials told him that U.S. troops had killed innocent civilians in Haditha, Iraq, "in cold blood."

The comments have spurred outcries of both praise and criticism of Murtha, with competing groups holding spirited rallies in his hometown of Johnstown.

Larry Bailey, a North Carolina resident and U.S. Navy veteran who heads the group Veterans for the Truth, has been a vocal opponent of Murtha. He said politicians don't "have the right to bad-mouth the troops."

Michael L. Young, a retired public affairs professor from Penn State-Harrisburg who now runs an opinion research firm, said there's no indication Murtha will lose his seat. But the contest could be affected by people's perceptions of the war, Young said.

"It's the kind of volatile situation where challengers like her with not a lot of political experience or even resources can sometimes strike a lightning blow because of the myriad of national forces at play in the race," Young said.

Murtha, lauded for his success in attracting many lucrative defense contracts to western Pennsylvania, said he believes he has overwhelming support in the district.

"The mood in my district is the same that it is any place else in the country," said Murtha after a recent news conference in Washington. "Sixty percent of the people, 59 percent, think we need a change in direction and that's what I see in my district."

The 12th Congressional District, made up of parts of nine southwestern Pennsylvania counties, supported Democrat John Kerry with 51 percent of the vote in the last presidential election.

Irey has raised thousands of dollars online - noting she's received contributions from all 50 states and received more than one million hits on her Web site. But she had just $159,138 in cash compared with Murtha's $1.6 million at the end of June, according to their most recent Federal Election Commission filings.

"I've defeated 25 candidates in the past, but we're working every day," Murtha said. "We know you got to take care of yourself first in these elections."

Irey believes she would bring a fresh perspective to the job. She easily shifts gears during conversation, talking about her three teenage children and family pets - including two dogs, a cat and a horse. She said the decision to enter the race was a family one.

"It was just listening to what Mr. Murtha was saying. I was starting to get really concerned about the state of the district," Irey said.

In 1995, Irey became the first woman elected as a Washington County commissioner. She has worked to attract businesses to the mostly rural county and opposed allowing prison inmates access to cable TV.

Irey said Murtha spends too little time in his own district. He has toured the country raising funds for more than 40 other Democratic candidates, something Republicans have criticized as his "cut-and-run" tour.

"His views now are more like the liberal voters of San Francisco," said Irey, a native of West Virginia who has lived in Pennsylvania for 22 years. "I hear so often, 'He's not the Jack Murtha he used to be.'"

When people meet her, Irey said, "they usually say, 'I thought you'd be bigger.'"

Stumping in Tarentum recently, Irey and a legislative candidate knocked on doors at an apartment building. Though she's an hour north of her home county, Irey finds she's not a total stranger.

"Yes, there you are!" exclaims resident Gary Cunningham, 53, after Irey introduces herself. Cunningham, doing laundry in a first-floor common room, said he knew Irey from her appearance on a local conservative radio talk show.

"As soon as I see you I think of John Murtha, and I get a bad taste in my mouth," said Cunningham, who later admits he isn't registered to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0072603

She gives Cunningham voter registration information and they chat briefly about the war in Iraq. She continues going door to door, spreading her message with a wide smile and firm hand shake.

"Hi, I'm Diana Irey and I'm running for Congress."

Iraq Is Topic Non Grata In Hot Races (MJS)

By Steve Schultze And Craig Gilbert

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 1, 2006

Gard, Kagen among candidates treading carefully on war

When prompted, Republican congressional candidate John Gard offers a staunch defense of the current U.S. policy in Iraq.

"I believe victory (in Iraq) is our only alternative," says Gard, fighting a tough battle for Wisconsin's 8th District U.S. House seat against Democrat Steve Kagen.

"Iraq is an essential front in the war on terror," Gard says. "We must stabilize Iraq economically, militarily" before U.S. troops leave.

His words echo President Bush's determined line on the war, an issue that's dragged down Bush's popularity.

But suggest that Gard takes the "Bush" position on Iraq, and the candidate objects.

"I think it's an American position," says Gard, who cites Ronald Reagan rather than George W. Bush as his foreign policy model: "I believe in the Reagan strategy of peace through strength."

Such comments underscore the political dilemma Republicans in hot races this fall face over the war, as they strive to support the Iraq effort without being identified too closely with the way it has been handled.

"I think in most races they're trying to dance around the issue," political analyst Stuart Rothenberg says of GOP candidates. "The war has come to stand for the president's failures, or shortcomings." Political dilemmas

Of course, they're not entirely alone. Democrats face some dilemmas of their own, such as whether to support a pullout from Iraq and how to shield themselves from GOP charges of "retreat and defeat."

Democrat Kagen is blunt in declaring that "the way things are going right now, Iraq is gone." But he won't say when he thinks the troops should come home.

In other words, Democrats have to tread carefully, too, especially in moderate to conservative districts. The result is that in some congressional races, the Iraq debate has been surprisingly muted. Gard and Kagen have scarcely mentioned Iraq in their TV ads.

"They are staying away" from the war issues, seemingly hesitant about what tack to take, said David Littig, a retired University of Wisconsin-Green Bay political scientist.

"It's the elephant in the room," said one Democrat who has been involved in the House campaign and spoke on the condition his name not be used. "Everybody knows there's a problem (there). Nobody wants to talk about solutions, because they know they're all lousy."

The Gard-Kagen race isn't unique. In many of the country's contested congressional races, candidates are spending most of their TV dollars on other subjects, from domestic issues to personal attacks on their opponents.

This is especially true of Republicans, weighed down by the war's unpopularity and the Bush administration's poor approval ratings. Some GOP candidates have openly criticized the war and the administration, especially in "blue" states such as Connecticut and Pennsylvania.

But in most close races, Republicans are taking a different tack: sticking to local issues or steering the debate to the broader war on terror, where Bush enjoys more public support. 'No easy answers'

Amy Walter, who follows House races for the Cook Political Report, describes the tactic as, "Just change the subject."

Says Walter: "Republicans don't want to talk about it."

Gard has not pushed Iraq as an issue, and he deflects questions about Bush's stewardship of the war.

"It's not about supporting President Bush," Gard said last week, when asked whether he supports the president's handling of Iraq. "Too many people focus on the individual."

Gard says "mistakes have been made," including disbanding the Iraqi military after the U.S. invasion ended.

But the Assembly speaker from Peshtigo isn't doing a whole lot to distance himself from the war, either. He stands squarely with the Bush administration in opposition to a withdrawal plan.

"There are no easy answers here," Gard, 43, said in another recent interview. He added that Kagen "wants to abandon our allies, and I want to do what it takes to achieve victory."

DOJ_NMG_0072604

Democrats say criticisms of "cut and run" are losing their political teeth. And they've been armed by the release of a National Intelligence Estimate tying the war to the proliferation of terrorists, and even the new Bob Woodward book "State of Denial," with its grim portrait of wartime leadership. Unpopular war

"Any time the focus shifted back to national security and to terror or foreign policy, it used to be an advantage for Republicans. The big difference this time is that is simply not true," said Paul Maslin, who is Kagen's pollster. "If Gard wants to defend that policy (in Iraq) to the hilt, he is really limiting himself to the base Republicans."

Gard may be helped in the war debate by the district's Republican tilt. Bush carried it by 11 points in 2004. But both sides acknowledge that the political climate favors Democrats this year. And some polls suggest the war might be more unpopular in Wisconsin than it is nationally.

The GOP firm of Strategic Vision is polling independently each month in Wisconsin and six other states: Washington, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia, Florida and Michigan. In a recent round of September polls, likely voters in Wisconsin registered the lowest approval rating of any of those states for Bush's handling of Iraq: 25%.

The partisan breakdown in the Wisconsin poll is revealing: 59% of Republicans approved of the president's performance on Iraq. But just 4% of Democrats, and only 12% of independents, approved.

GOP officials say that despite such numbers, Iraq is not playing a major role in most contested races.

"It has to do with, first, a lack of Democratic credibility on the issue and the lack of any kind of a coherent Democratic alternative as to what they would do," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Campaign Committee. Difference in attack

Kagen, a wealthy allergist making his first run for Congress, is vague about when he would bring the troops home, saying it's a judgment better left to the generals. But his comments about the war suggest he sees Iraq as a lost cause.

"Are we going to invest in a foreign nation that once was called Iraq? Iraq has gone the way of Yugoslavia. It is not coming back. It's a mess," said Kagen at a Democratic "unity rally" in Green Bay on Sept. 16.

In an interview last week, the 56-year-old Kagen said a breakup of the country might bring more stability, as it did in Yugoslavia.

"The first mistake was getting involved in the first place," Kagen said. Now, the U.S. must work to convince Iraqis that "we are not going to stay . . . the path we are on is simply unacceptable."

Kagen has made health care the leading theme of his advertising.

Evan Tracey, who tracks campaign advertising, says that when Iraq is invoked by Republicans, it's usually to attack Democrats for not supporting the troops or being defeatist. When it's invoked by Democrats, it's part of a broader attack against Republicans as rubber-stamps for President Bush. 'Radio silence'

In that vein, Iraq could certainly work its way more dramatically into the Gard-Kagen race before election day.

But for now, "radio silence" is how one political observer in Green Bay, lawyer Tim Nixon, described the way Gard and Kagen are dealing with Iraq.

"It's almost a third-rail issue for both sides," said Nixon, who sits on the Green Bay Area Chamber of Commerce and says he doesn't see in northeastern Wisconsin the stark partisan fault lines on the issue that national polls have found. One reason, he says, is the number of local military units that have served.

The Strategic Vision poll lends some support to that view. In that Sept. 15 to 17 survey, 59% of likely Wisconsin voters favored withdrawal of U.S. troops "within six months." Both Republicans (43% favored withdrawal) and independents (55% favored withdrawal) were quite divided about what future course to take in Iraq.

"I've got people I know who never voted Democratic in their life, and this war thing is making them crazy," Nixon said. "And I know (non-Republicans) with kids over there, and they want to support it wholeheartedly. . . . It's amazing for a 'small' war how many people this has touched here." The Elephant In The Florida 22nd: Medicare Prescription Benefit (WP)

By Anushka Asthana

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

HOLLYWOOD, Fla. -- Betty Priscak has voted for veteran Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R-Fla.) in every election he has been in, but now she thinks it is time for a change. Priscak, a 74-year-old in increasingly poor health, plans to vote for Ron Klein, Shaw's Democratic challenger, in November.

Why? She is upset with the Medicare prescription drug program passed by the Republicans in 2003. She calls it "devastating."

DOJ_NMG_0072605

The initial uproar over the program's complexity died down once many seniors had signed up, but now Priscak and millions of other older Americans are confronting an interruption in their drug coverage that will require them to pay the full cost of their prescriptions -- or go without. Priscak came up against the coverage gap, known as the "doughnut hole," in May, and it was months before the drug coverage kicked back in.

If it had not been for financial assistance from her partner, she said, she would not have been able to meet the thousands of dollars of uncovered drug costs. "If you think I dare vote for a Republican, you have another thought coming," she said.

Priscak is not alone. According to the consulting firm Price Waterhouse Coopers LLC, 3.4 million seniors will fall into the doughnut hole this year.

The doughnut hole ends federal payments for a person's drug purchases once an annual spending limit is reached, resuming them only after the beneficiary has spent thousands of dollars out-of-pocket. It was one of the most contentious elements of the 2003 legislation that created the drug benefit, which was championed by the Bush administration and congressional Republicans.

Shaw's district, which stretches from West Palm Beach to Fort Lauderdale, has one of the highest concentrations of Medicare recipients in the country. Tens of thousands of residents have signed up for the prescription drug program, known as Part D. Democrats have long hoped to tap into voter dissatisfaction with the program, thinking it could affect some congressional races.

"When folks show up at the pharmacy and get hit with paying 100 percent of their drug costs, while continuing to pay 100 percent of their premiums, they become concerned," said Klein, a state senator. He said his main objection to the program is that it does not allow the federal government to negotiate drug prices to bring down costs -- a suggestion that pharmaceutical and insurance companies successfully fought.

But as the election draws closer, polls suggest that the GOP-backed program may not win as many votes for Democrats as they had thought. A Washington Post poll in April found that, among seniors, 50 percent said they approved of the drug program and 41 percent disapproved. Most respondents at that time said it would make no difference to them whether a candidate for Congress had voted for or against the drug program.

"Seniors are saving on average $1,100 a year in Florida; monthly premiums are $24," said Ed Patru, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "At the beginning of the year, the Democrats were politically invested in the failure of the program. Now there is overwhelming approval."

In one of Shaw's campaign offices, a converted diner in Fort Lauderdale, the congressman said seniors are better off under the program . "It's like the big lie. If you tell it enough, people begin to believe it," Shaw said of the criticism. "They are trying to convince people it was a windfall for the drug companies. It's not."

Shaw credits the plan with creating the competition that led Wal-Mart and Target to decide to discount their generic prescription drugs.

Don Monroe, 79, who has volunteered for Shaw's campaign, is one of many seniors not affected by the doughnut hole because of limited need for prescription drugs. Monroe said he is eager to see Shaw win reelection and become chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee.

Shaw, who has served in Congress since 1980, has sought to shift the focus of the campaign to other issues, including national security, terrorism, Social Security and the environment. Last week, he hosted Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne in Florida for a tour of the Everglades. Shaw "is one of the leaders on environmental issues," Kempthorne said in an interview.

Klein also is not focusing on Medicare; he has raised the subject in only one television ad. His main focus is trying to tap into anger at Bush and the Iraq war in a district that sided with Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.), the Democratic presidential nominee, in 2004. Shaw, Klein keeps telling voters, votes with Bush 90 percent of the time.

"The overall focus by Ron Klein is to make Clay Shaw look like a pawn of the Republican leadership," said Amy Walter, senior editor of Cook Political Report. "If it is Clay Shaw versus Ron Klein, then I think Clay Shaw can win. If it is a referendum on Washington or President Bush, then the advantage goes to Klein."

Klein trails Shaw in campaign fundraising, $2.8 million to $3.4 million, according to an August campaign-finance disclosure.

Bush and Vice President Cheney have visited to help Shaw raise money, and former president Bill Clinton is due at a fundraiser for Klein this month. Walter has classified the race as a tossup -- some polls have shown Shaw in the lead, others Klein -- but said she had seen no indication that the drug program is driving voters.

Some local commentators disagreed. The Medicare drug benefit "is still going to be a very, very, very viable election issue," said Edith Gooden-Thompson, a coordinator of Serving Health Insurance Needs of Elders.

Sitting in the Aging and Disability Resource Center of Broward County, Gooden-Thompson was surrounded by others who worked with seniors and agreed with her assessment. Nancy Ackerman said she had seen people cutting back on food so they could buy prescriptions.

Even so, though, it could be a tossup: "Clay Shaw has been very supportive to senior issues in all the years we have known him," said Edith Lederberg, the center's director, but she added that Klein had, too. "He has been a state senator for many years and is very popular. That is why it is going to be such a tough choice for people to make."

Perhaps playing in Klein's benefit: More seniors are finding themselves in the doughnut hole as the election approaches. The Institute for America's Future, a group calling for the closure of the gap, calculated that, on average, seniors who enrolled in the benefit at the beginning of the year would have fallen into the doughnut hole on Sept. 22.

On that morning, Klein was talking about the doughnut hole with seniors at a doughnut shop, Dandee Donut Factory in Pompano Beach. Jane Shaffer said she has been in the doughnut hole since March, and she and her husband Robert -- a registered Republican -- say they will back Klein.

For the first time, the Voters Coalition, which encourages voter participation, will not endorse Shaw, said Harold Ostrow, 78, former chairman of the group. "It's easy to get into the doughnut hole, but very hard to get out," Ostrow said.

The question is whether there are enough people like Ostrow, Priscak and the Shaffers to swing the vote -- and whether other issues will erode Shaw's longtime base.

Klein is hoping that by closely linking Shaw to Bush, he can overcome the incumbent late in the campaign. Shaw said that Klein's tack is misguided. "He is running against the president and not Clay Shaw," Shaw said. "I represent the 22nd Congressional District of Florida and not the Republican Party."

As Vote Nears, Schwarzenegger Surges Ahead (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Survey finds Republican governor leading Democratic challenger Angelides 50% to 33%. Most see the incumbent as a stronger leader.

Just over five weeks before election day, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger holds a commanding lead over his Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, who has built scant support beyond a core base of liberals, according to a new Los Angeles Times poll.

If the Nov. 7 election were held today, likely voters would favor the Republican governor over Angelides 50% to 33%.

The survey found an abundance of grim signs for Angelides, including a failure to match Schwarzenegger's success in rallying voters of his own party strongly behind his candidacy. Just 61% of Democrats support Angelides, while 88% of Republicans favor Schwarzenegger. And independents, a crucial swing vote, support Schwarzenegger over Angelides 49% to 31%.

The poll also showed that Angelides suffers from one of the main problems that plagued California's last Democratic governor, Gray Davis: a lack of public confidence in his leadership skills. Asked who has stronger leadership qualities, 60% of likely voters say Schwarzenegger and 20% say Angelides. Even a plurality of Democrats sees Schwarzenegger as a stronger leader.

The poll also found a new rise in the governor's popularity, further progress in his steady recovery from the debacle of his 2005 ballot initiatives, which voters resoundingly rejected.

In a nearly complete reversal, 56% of California voters now approve of Schwarzenegger's job performance and 41% disapprove. In October 2005, 37% approved and 59% disapproved.

"He seems to have become a little bit more the governor of the people, rather than the governor of the Republicans," poll respondent Jack Phillips, a Democrat who lives in the Sacramento suburb of Folsom, said in a follow-up interview.

"Maria must've got to him," added Phillips, 67, in a nod to the Kennedy family lineage of Maria Shriver, Schwarzenegger's wife. The retired railroad marketing man plans to vote for Schwarzenegger.

Overall, the poll affirmed the dominating force of Schwarzenegger's personality on California politics, showing his capacity — in a state that strongly favors Democrats — to break a national tide running against Republicans.

It also demonstrated his outsmarting of Angelides in seeking out the political center, where statewide elections are won in California. For months, Schwarzenegger has been piling up agreements with Democratic lawmakers that widen his electoral appeal, including laws to combat global warming, raise the minimum wage and cut prescription drug costs.

Still, the election dynamics could change in the campaign's final weeks. Both candidates and their allies are spending millions on advertisements, which could shift public opinion.

The survey, supervised by Times Poll director Susan Pinkus, interviewed 1,312 registered voters, including 989 deemed likely to vote. The survey was conducted by telephone from Sept. 23 to 28. The margin of sampling error for likely voters is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Schwarzenegger's political recovery coincides with a brightening mood among California voters: 42% say things in the state are generally going in the right direction, up from a paltry 27% last October. Still, 45% say things are seriously off on the wrong track.

As for what's on their minds, likely voters name illegal immigration as the most important problem facing the state, followed by education and the economy. Republicans are most concerned about illegal immigration, while Democrats rank education as most important.

In the race for governor, relatively few likely voters have yet to make up their minds: 9% are undecided.

Eight percent favor candidates other than Schwarzenegger or Angelides.

For Angelides, the strongest support comes from liberal Democrats: 70% support him. Latinos also heavily favor Angelides over Schwarzenegger, 57% to 22%.

But as a whole, the poll illustrates a bleak landscape for Angelides. He falls short of majority support in every region of the state, even in the Bay Area, where Democrats normally run up landslide margins against Republicans.

In Los Angeles County, another Democratic stronghold although a less solid one, the race is nearly even: 41% favor Angelides, 37% Schwarzenegger.

In the rest of Southern California, Schwarzenegger trounces Angelides by a 41-point margin. In the Central Valley, the governor runs 37 points ahead. Both areas lean Republican.

The geography also looks bad for Angelides along the coastal-inland divide that has increasingly defined California elections. In counties along the coastline, which normally tilt strongly toward Democrats, Schwarzenegger is ahead 45% to 37%.

In the Republican-leaning counties of inland California, the governor leads by more than 2 to 1.

On major issues, Angelides also faces trouble. Californians usually favor Democrats on education and the environment, but the survey found likely voters split on whether Angelides or Schwarzenegger would do a better job in those areas. And by wide margins, they say Schwarzenegger would do a better job on the state budget, the economy and immigration.

The poll also found problems for Angelides on taxes, a top concern cited by those with an unfavorable impression of him.

Schwarzenegger ads have highlighted billions of dollars in tax increases that Angelides has supported over the years. Diane Smith, a retired Trinity County child-care provider, said she knew virtually nothing about Angelides apart from what she had seen in those ads, which show the Democrat walking backward.

"It looks like he's floating away," said Smith, an independent who is leaning toward Schwarzenegger.

Phillips, the Folsom Democrat supporting Schwarzenegger, called Angelides a "big-spending liberal" who would "follow in Gray Davis' footsteps — spend, spend, spend and put us into debt like there's no end to spending money."

Angelides has proposed tax increases for corporations and Californians who make more than $250,000 a year, along with tax cuts for those making less than $100,000 a year and for small businesses. A majority of Democrats and liberals say his tax agenda makes them more likely to vote for Angelides.

"We should help people who have less money and tax those that have more," said retired teacher Donna Doyka of Manhattan Beach, a Democrat who supports Angelides.

But the Angelides tax agenda is unpopular with Republicans and conservatives. And a majority of them say Schwarzenegger's promise not to raise taxes makes them more likely to back his reelection.

Another challenge for Angelides is ethics, a central line of attack against him in the Democratic primary and one that he has tried to turn back on Schwarzenegger.

On the question of which candidate has more honesty and integrity to serve as governor, 43% say Schwarzenegger and 25% say Angelides.

Also problematic for the Democrat is his lukewarm support among union members, a key constituency of his party: They support him over Schwarzenegger, but only by 43% to 37%.

More than half of union members think Schwarzenegger has stronger leadership qualities. And 52% have a favorable impression of Schwarzenegger, while 47% view Angelides in a positive light. Organized labor has been the No. 1 source of campaign money for Angelides.

The poll also underlined Schwarzenegger's edge on personality and public image. It found that 60% of likely voters hold a favorable impression of him, while 38% see Angelides in a positive light.

Also unsettling for Angelides, who was virtually unknown to most Californians before the campaign: 43% of likely voters hold an unfavorable impression of him. That negative view was inspired in part by months of television attack ads run against Angelides by Schwarzenegger and the treasurer's spring primary rival, state Controller Steve Westly.

The survey also cast new doubt on the Angelides strategy of stressing Schwarzenegger's political ties to President Bush. Among those who view the governor unfavorably — 39% of likely voters — 2% named his support for Bush's reelection as the reason.

DOJ_NMG_0072608

Still, Bush remains unpopular in California: 40% of voters approve of his job performance and 58% disapprove. Though it is dismaying for an incumbent, that marks a rebound from the record low that he hit in an April Times poll, which found 31% approved and 66% disapproved.

As for the governor, the new poll found his support more solid than his challenger's: More than three quarters of those who favor Schwarzenegger say their vote is definite, but fewer than two-thirds of Angelides backers say the same.

Schwarzenegger's strongest blocs of support are men, Republicans, conservatives, whites, older voters and residents of California's inland counties.

Women are less enthusiastic: Though likely male voters favor Schwarzenegger over his rival by 57% to 30%, likely female voters prefer the governor 42% to 37%.

Times Poll results are also available at latimes.com/timespoll.

How the poll was conducted: The Times Poll contacted 1,868 adults in California by telephone Sept. 23 through 28. Among them were 1,312 registered voters, of whom 989 were deemed likely to vote in the Nov. 7 general election. Likely voters were determined by a screening process that included questions on intention to vote, certainty of vote, interest in the campaign and voting history. Telephone numbers were randomly selected from a list of all exchanges in the state, allowing calls to listed and unlisted numbers. Multiple attempts were made to call each number. Additional Latino voters were contacted in a separate random sample to allow more accurate analysis of their subgroup. Adults in the entire sample were weighted slightly to conform with census proportions for sex, ethnicity, age, education, region and the secretary of state's report of party registration. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus 3 percentage points. For certain subgroups, the error margin may be somewhat higher. Poll results may also be affected by such factors as question wording and the order in which questions were presented. Interviews in the Latino supplemental sample were conducted by Interviewing Service of America in Van Nuys. Interviews were conducted in English and Spanish.Mark Hafer Los Angeles Times

California's Model For The Middle (WP)

By David S. Broder
The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

SACRAMENTO -- The likely victory of Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in next month's election could change the dynamics of California government and the way both national parties think about this mega-state.

It has been a long time since a Republican presidential candidate won California: not since George H.W. Bush in 1988. And it had been almost as long since any Republican won major statewide office -- until Schwarzenegger won the special election of 2003.

But the circumstances of that race were so odd -- a referendum on the unpopular incumbent, Democrat Gray Davis, and a free-for-all among dozens of would-be successors running virtually without party support -- that Schwarzenegger's victory seemed almost happenstance.

Now he is running as the Republican nominee against a single legitimate Democratic contender, state Treasurer Phil Angelides, a former party chairman. And the double-digit lead that Schwarzenegger has fashioned cannot be put down to luck.

Rather, it reflects his rapid adaptation after a serious political miscalculation. In 2005 he declared war on the Democratic legislature and the public-employee unions and forced a special election on four initiatives designed to cripple the unions' influence and strengthen his hand as governor. Voters rejected all of them and drove his approval ratings into the basement.

After that repudiation, Schwarzenegger reopened negotiations with the legislature this year, passed a heap of big bills and won the applause of an independent electorate.

To be sure, there are still skeptics who argue that the governor has no convictions and therefore is totally unreliable. In his political biography, "The People's Machine: Arnold Schwarzenegger and the Rise of Blockbuster Democracy," author Joe Mathews quotes the judgment of bodybuilder Rick Wayne, a buddy of the governor. "I've never known Arnold to be a conservative," Wayne said, "I've known Arnold to be a chameleon."

Some Democratic lobbyists in Sacramento expect a reelected Schwarzenegger to go back to bashing unions and fighting with the legislature. But his aides and intimates think that is a misreading of the man and the state. Both, they say, are firmly rooted in the center of the political spectrum.

Indeed, key Republicans here -- including some of George W. Bush's former people imported for the Schwarzenegger campaign -- think the governor's example is one that could be emulated in 2008.

Their argument is that at least three possible Republican contenders -- Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York; John McCain, the senator from Arizona; and Mitt Romney, the governor of Massachusetts -- could compete effectively for California if they made the effort.

To have a chance, they would have to abandon the Republican habit of treating California as a piggy bank -- a place to fly in, pick up a bundle of cash and fly out.

The contenders would not have to go as far as Schwarzenegger has in embracing Democratic issues. The state might respond to a candidate who combines fiscal prudence and avoiding higher taxes with a progressive attitude on the environment and such social issues as immigration and civil rights.

Because Republicans have abandoned California politics for so long, Democrats have been allowed to dominate the state. If its rich hoard of 55 electoral votes became competitive for 2008, it would be a boon to both parties. Democrats would still have a substantial advantage, with their support for abortion rights and appeal to working families and minority groups. But moderate Republicans could also compete and challenge and thereby shift the focus of the entire national election toward the political center.

All that -- and more -- is implicit in Schwarzenegger's run this year, making it potentially the most significant Republican victory in what otherwise looks like a year of Democratic gains.

Topinka Faces Many Challenges In Illinois Governor Race (SLPD)

By Adam Jadhav

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 1, 2006

From the beginning, the Judy Baar Topinka gubernatorial campaign expected to be outgunned financially.

Gov. Rod Blagojevich, a Democrat, has used his prolific fundraising to run TV ads almost non-stop since the March primary, save for a brief hiatus midsummer. Topinka began her television attack in September.

For every $1 she has spent, he's burned $9.

Now, with just over five weeks left until the November election, Topinka, a three-term state treasurer, and her running mate on the Republican ticket, Joe Birkett, find themselves an average 10 points behind in most polls.

In an interview with the Post-Dispatch this week, Birkett gave a candid review of the campaign, expressing plenty of optimism, but acknowledging hurdles, too.

Blagojevich "hasn't gained, but he hasn't fallen either. What he has is an unlimited source of funds," Birkett said. "This is the first time in Illinois history that anybody's been on this early, as long, and on the attack like this.

"This has been six months — unprecedented — negative campaigning (from Blagojevich). And Judy is still in the hunt which, I think, speaks volumes about her reputation and how strong her numbers are."

Meanwhile, Blagojevich's campaign staff remain cheery about their position: a double-digit lead with less than 40 days to go.

The governor himself has shied away from public campaign stops, typically appearing around the state in his official duties. Along the way, however, he continues to announce programs and plans — a vision of a second term.

DOJ_NMG_0072611

"We just want to get the governor out talking about his record and his accomplishments," said Blagojevich spokeswoman Sheila Nix.

Birkett and other Republicans did say fundraising has been a hurdle. As of June 30, the last time candidates reported their finances under state law, Blagojevich led $12.2 million to $1.5 million.

"Obviously, we've got to raise more money," Birkett said matter-of-factly.

But that has led to Blagojevich's TV barrage: $8.4 million spent on ads around the state from the day after the primary until last week, according to estimates and an advertising analysis compiled for the Post-Dispatch. Topinka had paid $934,000 for advertising, and has run no ads in the St. Louis area.

Through all of it, statewide polls have consistently given Blagojevich a little below 50 percent of the vote. And he has maintained unfavorable ratings almost as high. In addition, he has faced continuing media revelations about a federal corruption probe of some of his associates and others involving state contracts and political contributions.

"Rod Blagojevich is one of the luckiest incumbents in the nation," said national pollster Scott Rasmussen. "Normally, those numbers would spell defeat."

Rassmussen attributed Blagojevich's continued lead to the media blitz, Illinois' leftward political slant and Topinka's similarly high "unfavorables."

And since the primary, Topinka's vote percentage has tracked slightly downward, at least in Rasmussen's own polling.

Though outmatched in TV advertising, Topinka and Birkett have been more active in barnstorming the state. Both have repeatedly visited the Metro East, announcing plans for jobs, education, court reform and more.

Their campaign has also waged a regular e-mail and fax war. And continually released "white papers" detailing her positions and plans if elected.

But some political scientists question whether Topinka's position is really being heard in the electorate, over Blagojevich's voluminous advertising.

"She's come out with policy positions. She's on the air a little," said Alan Gitelson, a political science professor at Loyola University in Chicago. "At the same time, Blagojevich continues to pump out his own negative advertising. This is still a race that is Blagojevich's to lose."

Though Topinka is a veteran campaigner and not one to be counted out, observers said unless news breaks in the criminal investigations of hiring and ethics that have dogged Blagojevich's administration, his lead may hold fast.

"That would completely shake up the dynamic," said John Jackson, a political scientist at Southern Illinois University Carbondale. "Otherwise, I don't see much closing that gap."

Republicans say Blagojevich's advertising will become white noise. Topinka's staff and Birkett say they will strike back more. Watch and see, Birkett added.

"Keep in mind that the voters haven't seen the full picture," Birkett said. "They've seen almost $10 million in negative campaign ads about Judy."

TV ads are likely from Topinka for the remainder of the campaign, her staff and other Republicans said. There's two planned debates, including one Monday in Decatur. And they will continue fundraising.

Specifically, the campaign is courting a visit from First Lady Laura Bush, Birkett said. Another stop by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman is possible, said state GOP executive director John Tsarpalas, along with other "celebrity politicians."

"People are now starting to pay attention now," Tsarpalas said. "She's on the air. We're already out of the gate and running."

Campaign Cash Mirrors A High Court's Rulings (NYT)

By Adam Liptak And Janet Roberts

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

COLUMBUS, Ohio — In the fall of 2004, Terrence O'Donnell, an affable judge with the placid good looks of a small-market news anchor, was running hard to keep his seat on the Ohio Supreme Court. He was also considering two important class-action lawsuits that had been argued many months before.

In the weeks before the election, Justice O'Donnell's campaign accepted thousands of dollars from the political action committees of three companies that were defendants in the suits. Two of the cases dealt with defective cars, and one involved a toxic substance. Weeks after winning his race, Justice O'Donnell joined majorities that handed the three companies significant victories.

Justice O'Donnell's conduct was unexceptional. In one of the cases, every justice in the 4-to-3 majority had taken money from affiliates of the companies. None of the dissenters had done so, but they had accepted contributions from lawyers for the plaintiffs.

Thirty-nine states elect judges, and 30 states are holding elections for seats on their highest courts this year. Spending in these races is skyrocketing, with some judges raising $2 million or more for a single campaign. As the amounts rise, questions about whether money is polluting the independence of the judiciary are being fiercely debated across the nation. And nowhere is the battle for judicial seats more ferocious than in Ohio.

An examination of the Ohio Supreme Court by The New York Times found that its justices routinely sat on cases after receiving campaign contributions from the parties involved or from groups that filed supporting briefs. On average, they voted in favor of contributors 70 percent of the time. Justice O'Donnell voted for his contributors 91 percent of the time, the highest rate of any justice on the court.

In the 12 years that were studied, the justices almost never disqualified themselves from hearing their contributors' cases. In the 215 cases with the most direct potential conflicts of interest, justices recused themselves just 9 times.

Even sitting justices have started to question the current system. "I never felt so much like a hooker down by the bus station in any race I've ever been in as I did in a judicial race," said Justice Paul E. Pfeifer, a Republican member of the Ohio Supreme Court. "Everyone interested in contributing has very specific interests."

"They mean to be buying a vote," Justice Pfeifer added. "Whether they succeed or not, it's hard to say."

Three recent cases, two in Illinois and one in West Virginia, have put the complaints in sharp focus. Elected justices there recently refused to disqualify themselves from hearing suits in which tens or hundreds of millions of dollars were at stake. The defendants were insurance, tobacco and coal companies whose supporters had spent millions of dollars to help elect the justices.

After a series of big-money judicial contests around the nation, the balance of power in several state high courts has tipped in recent years in favor of corporations and insurance companies.

In the 2002 Ohio judicial election, for example, two candidates won seats that year on the seven-member court after each raised more money than one of the candidates for governor that year.

Corporate Giving Increases

Judges are required by codes of judicial ethics to disqualify themselves whenever their impartiality might reasonably be questioned over financial or other conflicts. Even owning a few shares of stock in a defendant's company or seeing a relative's name on a brief generally requires automatic disqualification.

But there is an exception to this strict rule: campaign contributions. Very few judges in the states that elect the members of their highest court view contributions as a reason for disqualification when those contributors appear before them.

Many judges said contributions were so common that recusal would wreak havoc on the system. The standard in the Ohio Supreme Court, its chief justice, Thomas J. Moyer, said, is to recuse only if "sitting on the case is going to be perceived as just totally unfair."

Duane J. Adams, a plaintiff in one of the class-action suits heard by Justice O'Donnell, concerning defective cars, said he questioned the impartiality of the justices who ruled against him. Mr. Adams had sued DaimlerChrysler under the state's lemon law, and he grew angry when told that the company's political action committee had given money to justices in the majority.

"At the very least, it's a conflict of interest," Mr. Adams said. "These gentlemen, they should be prosecuted for what I consider is taking a bribe." He and the other plaintiffs did not contribute, but their lawyers gave to the campaigns of five of the justices.

Precisely what contributors want or get for their money is unclear. Some contributors say they have no agenda beyond ensuring that able and independent judges are elected. Others surely hope to influence the justices' votes in particular cases.

The middle ground, advanced by groups representing business, labor and plaintiffs' lawyers, is to support justices who hold views similar to their own. "Various interests see voting patterns," Chief Justice Moyer said. The alignment between contributions and votes, he said, is a matter of shared judicial philosophy.

If that is right, contributors are not trying to buy votes in particular cases. But they are trying to buy seats on the court.

And they are succeeding. Not long ago, the Ohio Supreme Court was controlled by liberal justices whose campaigns had been financed in large part by plaintiffs' lawyers and unions. Now that business groups are outspending their adversaries, the court has become dominated by more conservative justices. And the court's decisions are no longer markedly sympathetic to people claiming injuries.

Justice O'Donnell, a Republican, won his seat with the help of big contributions from the insurance, finance and medical industries. He is running for re-election this year, and his opponent, Judge William O'Neill, is making contributions an issue.

"We have to stop selling seats on the Ohio Supreme Court like we sell seats on the New York Stock Exchange," said Judge O'Neill, a Democrat on the 11th District Court of Appeals in Warren, in northeast Ohio. He says he will not accept contributions.

Justice O'Donnell, who has raised more than $3 million since 2000, refused to be interviewed for this article despite more than a half-dozen requests to his campaign, his chambers and the court. In a statement, he said, "Any effort to link judicial campaign contributions received by a judicial campaign committee for major media advertising to case outcomes is misleading and erodes public confidence in the judiciary."

"A judge," the statement said, "may fairly and impartially consider matters despite receipt of the campaign contribution by the campaign committee."

Interest groups play a powerful and generally accepted role in races for legislative and executive positions. But their increasing role in identifying and supporting judicial candidates is at odds with the traditional concept of what judges do.

"The role of the judge and the role of the legislator are completely different," said William K. Weisenberg, an Ohio State Bar Association official. "You want a legislator to vote the way you would vote. When you go into court, you want someone to listen to the facts and decide the case on the facts and the law. We don't want the umpire calling balls and strikes before the game has begun."

Influencing the Bench

Many judges concede that sitting on their contributors' cases creates the perception that their votes can be bought. But in public, at least, most insist the perception is wrong.

"All the surveys I've seen indicate that generally 75 percent of the people believe that contributions influence decisions," said Chief Justice Moyer, a Republican. But when asked if contributions played a role in courts' decisions, he said: "I don't believe they do. I know they don't for me."

That view is not universally held.

"It's pretty hard in big-money races not to take care of your friends," said Richard Neely, a retired chief justice of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals. "It's very hard not to dance with the one who brung you."

Indeed, according to a survey of 2,428 state court judges conducted in 2002 by Justice at Stake, a judicial reform organization, almost half said campaign contributions influenced decisions. And more than half agreed that "judges should be prohibited from presiding over and ruling in cases where one of the sides has given money to their campaign."

The Times study explored the influence of money on judicial decision-making by asking two basic questions about the Ohio Supreme Court. How often did it hear cases involving major contributors? And how did justices vote in those cases?

The study considered only cases that were both significant and difficult. It excluded procedural decisions, including whether to hear or reconsider a case. And only divided cases — those in which there was at least one dissent — were considered, because those presented the most contentious legal issues. In the 12 years ended this spring, there were about 1,500 such decisions.

The study looked at contributors who gave $1,000 or more in the six years preceding the decision, the term length for justices.

It also considered, for the most part, only the contributors most directly affected by a ruling: the parties themselves and groups that filed supporting briefs urging the court to rule a certain way.

Contributions from lawyers were excluded from the study's main findings. Lawyers are far more likely than other contributors to give to judges across the ideological spectrum, and — because their firms often handle a wide variety of cases — they generally do not have the intensely focused interest in the outcome of a particular case that their clients do. More than 200 times, moreover, justices sat on cases after receiving contributions from lawyers on both sides.

The court's decisions, the study found, were rife with potential conflicts. In more than 200 of the 1,500 cases, at least one justice cast a vote after receiving a significant campaign contribution. On scores of occasions, the justices' campaigns took contributions after a case involving the contributor was argued and before it was decided — just when conflicts are most visible and pointed.

Contributors did well with those whose campaigns they had financed. Of the 10 justices in the Times study, 6 sided with contributors more than 70 percent of the time. Justice O'Donnell, who has been on the court for only three years and has participated in fewer decisions than most of the justices studied, had the highest rate — 91 percent.

Lawyers who gave money were not nearly as successful. Five justices voted for the positions represented by these contributors half of the time, and the average rate was 55 percent. Recusals in cases involving contributors were all but unheard of.

Six of the seven sitting justices — all except Justice O'Donnell — agreed to interviews for this article, and all said contributions had not affected their decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0072614

"There is a lot more to the story than the cold numbers suggest," said Justice Maureen O'Connor, a Republican who voted for her contributors 74 percent of the time. Some cases are more significant than others, she said. Similarly, she and other justices criticized the decision to omit from the study the court's terse rulings on whether to hear a case at all. Many of these decisions are routine or trivial, however, and the rulings themselves do not contain sufficient information to be readily categorized.

In his statement, Justice O'Donnell said that "selectively screening a limited number of case decisions results in a skewed outcome." He did not elaborate.

But Justice Pfeifer, who voted for his contributors 69 percent of the time, backed the study's methodology. "I quite frankly can't think of another way," he said. "You're using the only yardstick that I'd know of that you can use."

Several justices said they found Ohio's money-fueled judicial elections distasteful and troubling. They pointed out, though, that Ohio law has mechanisms to limit contributions and to insulate justices from contributors, including a ban on personal solicitations by the justices. Some said they tried to avoid learning the identities of their many contributors, though they conceded it could sometimes be unavoidable. Justice Evelyn Lundberg Stratton, for instance, said she had attended 50 fund-raisers during her last campaign.

None of the justices interviewed suggested that more frequent recusals from contributors' cases would be a positive step rather than a recipe for havoc. Last year, though, five justices did recuse themselves from a case involving a Republican fund-raiser, Thomas W. Noe. They had taken $23,510 from Mr. Noe and his wife. Appeals court judges filled in for the justices.

"It is not necessary for a judge to recuse himself just because an attorney or party has contributed to his campaign," Chief Justice Moyer said in a statement at the time. "However, this is a high-profile case with political implications and with potential personal consequences for the campaign contributor in question."

Some legal experts say that recusal should be the rule and not the exception. Indeed, in 1999, the American Bar Association revised its Model Code of Judicial Conduct to require judges to disqualify themselves if they received campaign contributions of a certain amount from a party or its lawyer. But the bar association did not name an amount, leaving it to the states should they adopt the code. No state has adopted it.

Unlike campaign contributions, direct gifts to judges, even relatively small ones, almost always require disqualification.

In 2002, for instance, the Ohio Supreme Court reprimanded a lower-court judge for accepting football tickets from Stuart Banks, a lawyer who had appeared before the judge. Yet three of the justices who issued the reprimand had accepted at least $1,000 each in contributions from Mr. Banks in the previous 10 years. Those same justices also sat on several cases in which Mr. Banks appeared before them.

Ruling on a Lemon Law

From the day he leased it in 1996, when it leaked transmission fluid all over the garage, Duane J. Adams's Dodge Caravan was nothing but trouble.

"My wife went to start it at the grocery store, and the battery blew up," Mr. Adams said. "We didn't feel safe in it."

Mr. Adams invoked Ohio's tough lemon law, which calls for a refund for defective cars. DaimlerChrysler took the car back after an arbitration found the car defective but deducted a $6,000 "mileage fee."

Mr. Adams and other Ohio car buyers filed a class-action lawsuit against three car companies that routinely imposed such mileage fees in settlements and arbitrations. Drawing on a 1996 appeals court decision that banned the fees and the fact that the Ohio Legislature had rejected such fees when it enacted the law, an appeals court allowed the case to go forward in 2003.

In the first week of November 2004, while the case was pending in the Ohio Supreme Court, the political action committee of DaimlerChrysler, a defendant, gave $1,000 each to the election campaigns of Chief Justice Moyer and Justice O'Donnell. Two months earlier, the committee of a second defendant, Ford, gave those same justices $500 apiece. From 2000, when the suit was filed, to 2004, when it was decided, the affiliates of the three companies gave $15,000 to four of the justices on the case.

Still, all four of the justices continued to sit on the case, and all of them were in the majority in the 4-to-3 decision issued on Nov. 10, 2004, just days after the last set of DaimlerChrysler contributions.

The justices ruled that the plaintiffs had voluntarily accepted settlement offers or arbitration awards with the mileage fee deducted. The ban on the fees applied only to lawsuits filed in court and not disputes resolved less formally, the majority said.

The three dissenting justices said the majority's ruling gave the plaintiffs an impossible choice: to pursue a lawsuit that could cost more than the car itself or to accept the reduced sum.

Elaine Lutz, a spokeswoman for DaimlerChrysler, defended the company's actions. "The contributions that companies' PAC's make are driven by the campaign calendar, not the judicial calendar," Ms. Lutz said. Candidates for the court may accept contributions for about a year before an election and four months afterward.

Lawyers for Ford also said it complied with Ohio law. "By definition," said one of the lawyers, John Beisner, "if you have an elective system, the judges are going to go to those with the greatest interest in the system to get their contributions."

Car company lawyers said the contributions were merely an effort to level the field against big-spending plaintiffs' firms. In the lemon-law case, though, the overall contributions were tilted heavily in favor of the companies and their own lawyers.

Mr. Adams and the other named plaintiffs gave no money to the justices. While the case proceeded, their lawyers contributed about $12,000 to five of the seven justices in the case, dividing their money roughly evenly between a justice who voted for them and several who voted against them. The law firms representing the companies gave only to the justices in the majority, for a total of more than $115,000.

That was consistent with national trends. "The current wars are epic battles between businesses and trial lawyers," said Bert Brandenburg, the executive director of Justice at Stake. "Over the past half-decade, business groups are outraising and outspending trial lawyers."

A week after the lemon-law case was decided, the court announced another ruling in favor of a business. This one halted a class action to support the medical monitoring of workers who had been exposed to beryllium, a potentially toxic substance. The vote was 5 to 2. Employees and the political action committee of the parent company of the defendant, Brush Wellman, gave a total of $5,700 to four justices, more than $2,600 of it after the case was argued and before it was decided. All four were in the majority.

Patrick Carpenter, a spokesman for Brush Wellman, said its political action committee "contributes to deserving candidates in the interest of advancing good government" and noted that the workers' lawyers had also given to the justices. The lawyers gave about $20,000 to several justices, though most voted against the workers. Mr. Carpenter also said the company had lost a 2002 decision by a 4-to-3 vote, before the court's conservative wing took over.

Michael Fincher, a 48-year-old roofer who was a plaintiff in the beryllium suit, said the contributions meant he had not received impartial justice. "I don't think it's appropriate, period," Mr. Fincher said.

Screening the Candidates

Business groups have turned picking potential justices into an art.

"They study very carefully the field of potential candidates, really studying their backgrounds and what makes them tick, and picking a person who is liable to be leaning their way," said Justice Pfeifer, who has shown an independent streak in his 14 years on the court. He did not name names.

Justice O'Donnell's campaign materials say he is "rooted in law enforcement" as the son a Cleveland police officer. They also note that he served as a law clerk and taught elementary school students and paralegals. In 20 years on lower courts before his appointment to the Supreme Court in May 2003, he created a long paper trail of conservative decisions. On the Supreme Court, he has helped consolidate its transformation from a court that routinely ruled against corporations and insurance companies to one quite friendly to business interests.

In 2004, running to complete the six-year term to which he had been appointed, Justice O'Donnell had a million-dollar advantage over his opponent that led to an Election Day rout.

Now that same opponent, Judge O'Neill, is back for a rematch. His campaign slogan: "No money from nobody."

Contributing to candidates for states' highest courts can be money well spent in at least one sense: the courts are very powerful. They have the last word on most of the issues that come before them. The United States Supreme Court has no jurisdiction over cases that present pure questions of state law, and in any event it hears only about 80 cases a year.

The states use various methods to choose their judges. The approaches are often some combination of nominating commissions, governors' and legislative action, and popular voting, including partisan contests and retention elections. Political machines still play a role in some states. In the federal system, by contrast, judges are appointed by the president, confirmed by the Senate and awarded lifelong tenure.

"Although there may be no good method of selecting and retaining judges, there is a worst method, and Ohio is among the states to have found it," Paul D. Carrington and Adam R. Long wrote in a 2002 study of the Ohio Supreme Court in the law review of Capital University here in Columbus. "That worst method is one in which judges qualify for their jobs by raising very large sums of money from lawyers, litigants and special interest groups, and retain their offices only by continuing to raise such funds." The problem, the authors found, is not a new one, but one that grows with the sums involved.

Ohio started electing judges in 1851, and the system seems unlikely to change. Voters overwhelmingly rejected a proposed return to an appointive system in 1987. In the 1980's, a campaign for a seat on the Ohio Supreme Court cost $100,000, compared with the $2 million a candidate may raise and spend these days.

Much of the recent spending came from business groups furious with what they called a liberal "Gang of Four" on the court after a pair of 1999 decisions. One of the decisions struck down a law revising the treatment of injury cases. The other interpreted employers' insurance policies broadly to cover some off-the-job injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0072616

In 2000, business groups mounted a multimillion-dollar campaign to unseat Justice Alice Robie Resnick, a Democrat who wrote the first decision and joined the second. One advertisement showed a female judge switching her vote after someone dropped a bag of money on her desk.

Her opponent was Judge O'Donnell. He refused to denounce the attack advertisements, which seemed to backfire with voters. Justice Resnick won the election with 57 percent of the vote.

From that election on, "Ohio became a poster child for everything that was wrong with judicial elections," said Mr. Weisenberg, the Ohio State Bar Association official.

Money poured in, from political parties, from trial lawyers and especially from business interests. Contributions from people and entities affiliated with the finance and insurance industries totaled more than $800,000 in 2004. Doctors and the health care industry contributed more than $440,000.

The Balance of Power Shifts

Interest groups on the other side give, too, and the justices they support overwhelmingly vote their way. But Justice Pfeifer says the balance of financial power has shifted to business groups.

"I don't care how well a trial lawyer does or how big a pot a labor union has," he said, "they can't begin to match the business corporations. It's not a fair fight."

Justice Stratton, a Republican, said the recent contributions from business groups were a predictable consequence of a series of rulings "very strongly in favor of trial lawyers."

"You only have the big money coming out," she said, "when the court has swung too much to the left or to the right."

In 2002, Lt. Gov. Maureen O'Connor, a Republican, won a seat on the court, replacing a more liberal Republican justice and altering the balance. Her campaign took more than $330,000 from affiliates of insurance companies and medical groups. Not long after she joined the court, Justice O'Connor wrote the opinion that overruled the 1999 insurance decision. Only four years after the court ruled that employers' insurance policies covered many off-the-job injuries, it reversed course. "It serves no valid purpose to allow incorrect opinions to remain in the body of our law," Justice O'Connor wrote for the majority. The vote was 4 to 3.

The shift in personnel had a prompt impact on other cases, too. Since then, law firms that work mostly for plaintiffs have fared poorly in the court. A look at a sample of 14 big plaintiffs' firms showed that they won 64 percent of the cases in the study before 2003. In the next three years, after the rise of the court's conservative wing, their success rate dropped to 17 percent. Since 1995, Ohio has imposed campaign contribution limits. They are $3,000 from individuals and $5,500 from organizations for each judicial election. Primary and general elections are counted separately.

A Critic Takes On the System

But, depending on how donations from individuals and political action committees are counted, the limits do not stop some businesses from making very large aggregate contributions. Affiliates, employees, officers and directors of the Cincinnati Insurance Company, for instance, gave more than $200,000 to Ohio Supreme Court candidates from 1998 through 2004.

Joan Shevchik, a spokeswoman for the parent company of Cincinnati Insurance, Cincinnati Financial Corporation, cited the effort to overturn the 1999 decision as a reason for the contributions, but emphasized that the corporation itself gave nothing. "As insurance professionals," she said, "each of us sees up close the immediate impact that the Ohio Supreme Court has on the industry, our company and our policyholders."

There is a small printing press in the garage of Judge O'Neill. In the evenings, he and his children produce fliers for a long-shot no-money campaign for Justice O'Donnell's seat on the Ohio Supreme Court.

"We're going to do a million pieces for $4,000 from my pocket," Judge O'Neill said, explaining that he will not accept a penny in contributions. Even some of his supporters view his effort as quixotic, notwithstanding the higher ratings Judge O'Neill gets from many Ohio bar associations.

"They're out soliciting the next million dollars to beat me," he said. "The insurance industry, the manufacturers and now the doctors treat the Ohio Supreme Court as a personal piece of property."

Justice Resnick, the last Democrat on the court, is retiring this year, and her seat is also open, making an all-Republican court next year a distinct possibility.

Marc Dann, a Democratic state senator running for attorney general, said Judge O'Neill's strategy might have been driven by necessity as well as principle.

"Best case," Mr. Dann said, "maybe he goes to the plaintiff's bar and labor unions, and maybe he raises $300,000. To do a good week of TV in Ohio is $750,000."

Judge O'Neill's assertion that seats on the Supreme Court are for sale infuriates many in the legal establishment in Ohio, and in July 2004 the Disciplinary Counsel of the Ohio Supreme Court began an investigation into whether Judge O'Neill had violated judicial ethics by making similar statements in the last campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0072617

Judge O'Neill laughed when asked if the investigation worried him.

"I am a Vietnam veteran, and I lost my wife 10 years ago," he said. "I raised four kids by myself. When you talk about fear, I fear big things in life. Being hauled before a disciplinary counsel does not qualify."

For the time being, a federal judge has suspended the investigation on First Amendment grounds. If the Ohio Legislature is troubled by Judge O'Neill's conduct, the federal judge, Ann Aldrich wrote, "the proper solution is to stop electing judges and make state judgeships appointed offices."

Judge O'Neill disagreed. He likes elections, he said.

"We have more authority over people's lives than anyone else in elected office," he said. "We decide who goes to jail and who gets out of jail. We decide what happens to your life savings after you die. We decide whether or not you will be permitted to finish raising your child. I can't think of any other industry that has a more profound impact on people's lives. And it is arrogant at best that some committee should make this appointment."

But Chief Justice Moyer said the flaws in Ohio's approach were the product of elections.

"In a perfect world," he said, "you would have justices being selected not based on the amount of money their campaign committees can raise from various interests, but on their character and record — and somewhat on judicial philosophy, certainly, but in a more abstract way."

Mind The Children In Reshaping ER Care (WP)

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

The anniversaries of Sept. 11, 2001, and Hurricane Katrina were painful reminders that the United States needs to be better prepared for the unexpected. A three-part report by the Institute of Medicine released this summer underscores the need for major reordering of priorities in emergency medicine, but the portion of the report devoted to the needs of children has not received the attention it deserves.

Although children account for nearly 30 percent of all emergency department visits, only 6 percent of emergency departments are properly equipped to handle them. Reports have shown that emergency medical technicians, nurses and even doctors lack adequate pediatric training, that health-care facilities lack sufficient pediatric resources and that emergency department policies often overlook children.

As an emergency physician at Children's National Medical Center in Washington, I know firsthand that pediatric emergency departments differ immensely from adult facilities. For instance, each year overcrowded emergency rooms divert 500,000 ambulance patients to more distant facilities. Children's medical center, like many regional pediatric hospitals, does not have the option of diverting ambulances to other hospitals. In fact, we employ a "no-diversion" policy, requiring that all children transported to our emergency department be stabilized and treated.

Children are not mini-adults; their size is accompanied by fragility, fear and impatience. Caring for them is typically more labor-intensive, so we must recognize the need for health-care workers who are not only better trained but also more abundant. For instance, it may take a team of three or four to start an intravenous line in a frightened 3-year-old, as opposed to one person for an adult.

Pediatric-specific facilities must equip themselves to handle large influxes of people, including parents and caretakers, during mass-casualty emergencies. Pediatric hospitals must have a comprehensive approach to treating both children and accommodating those who come with them, because separating families may cause additional stress.

The Institute of Medicine recommends that emergency departments and emergency medical services ensure appropriate staff and equipment to treat children; that there be explicit pediatric-specific preparations in disaster planning; that research into medications and technologies for pediatrics be supported; and that funding be increased for the Emergency Medical Services for Children program, a national initiative designed to reduce child disability and death due to severe illness and injury.

The Institute of Medicine's recommendations to Congress should be considered and implemented immediately if we, as a society, want to properly address the emergency needs of children.

Bush Signs US Sanctions Bill Targeting Iran's Partners (AFP)

AFP, October 1, 2006

US President George W. Bush signed into law a new set of sanctions targeting foreign countries that continue nuclear cooperation with Iran and sell it advanced weaponry.

DOJ_NMG_0072618

"I applaud Congress for demonstrating its bipartisan commitment to confronting the Iranian regime's repressive and destabilizing activities by passing the Iran Freedom Support Act," Bush said in a statement.

Mindful of the situation in Iraq, lawmakers warned that nothing in this document should be "construed as authorizing the use of force against Iran."

Although it does not name any countries, the measure is seen as a clear warning to Russia and China, two permanent members of the UN Security Council that have resisted calls for new international sanctions against Tehran in response to its refusal to halt uranium enrichment.

Russia is involved in an 800-million-dollar project to help Iran build a nuclear power plant in Bushehr and sells it modern weaponry. China has been accused of supplying the Islamic republic with advanced missile technology.

"Enactment of this legislation ensures that ILSA (the Iran and Libya Sanctions Act) will continue to impede Iran's efforts to acquire nuclear weapons," said US Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

"This act also provides important new authority for the administration to block financial transactions related to Iran's weapons of mass destruction programs and encourages the administration to use all available leverage over Russia to gain Russian support for multilateral sanctions against Iran," Frist said in a statement.

In a separate statement, Senator Norm Coleman said: "For the sake of our national security, the US must ensure that the sensitive nuclear technology that we share with partner countries does not fall into the hands of the Iranians.

"The Iranians have demonstrated that they are deceitful, obstructionist and bent on destroying Israel and all of Western civilization. We know where this path is going to lead. Aiding Iran to become a nuclear power, even inadvertently, is unacceptable," he said.

The new sanctions, passed earlier Saturday by the Senate after clearing the House of Representatives a day earlier, came as the European Union engaged Iran in delicate negotiations designed to persuade the Islamic republic to halt its enrichment work and avoid a major international showdown.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was expected to confer with EU foreign policy coordinator Javier Solana and her counterparts from Britain, China, France, Germany and Russia over the weekend to take stock of progress reached in these talks.

Following the carrot-and-stick approach adopted by Washington, the Iran Freedom Support Act states that it should be the policy of the United States "not to bring into force an agreement for cooperation with the government of any country that is assisting the nuclear program of Iran or transferring advanced conventional weapons or missiles."

The measure calls for this policy to remain in effect until Iran has suspended all enrichment-related activities and committed to verifiably and permanently refrain from such nuclear work in the future, or until the targeted country has severed ties with its Iranian partners.

Under the measure, the US government may also award grants to pro-democracy radio and television stations that broadcast into Iran.

"We have to increase our capability to mine resources and intelligence about Iran," Rice told The Wall Street Journal in an interview published Saturday. "And one of the challenges is that we haven't been in the country for 26 years."

The White House said in a separate statement that Bush signed into law House bill 6198 "Iran Freedom Support Act."

President Signs Iran Sanctions Bill (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

President Bush on Saturday signed legislation that would impose mandatory sanctions on entities that provide goods or services for Iran's weapons programs.

The Senate passed the bill with no debate Saturday, two days after the House approved the measure following a debate over the wisdom of toughening unilateral sanctions on Tehran at the same time the United States was trying to work with its U.N. partners on a multinational approach to Iran's nuclear threat.

The measure sanctions any entity that contributes to Iran's ability to acquire chemical, biological or nuclear weapons.

In a statement, Bush said, "This legislation will codify U.S. sanctions on Iran while providing my administration with flexibility to tailor those sanctions in appropriate circumstances and impose sanctions upon entities that aid the Iranian regime's development of nuclear weapons."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said in a statement that the action "strengthened one of our most important tools in the fight to keep nuclear weapons out of the mullahs' hands."

He said it would encourage the administration to use all available leverage over Russia, a partner in Iranian energy projects, to gain Russian support for multilateral sanctions against Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0072619

Bush also signed legislation Saturday extending and amending higher education programs. One part of that bill would authorize cancellation of student loan indebetedness for certain people affected by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Iran Leader Rejects Even Brief Halt In Its Uranium Enrichment Efforts (NYT)

By Agence France-presse
The New York Times, October 1, 2006

TEHRAN, Sept. 30 (Agence France-Presse) — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Saturday that Iran would not halt uranium enrichment even for a short period.

"They want us to suspend for a short period, and then they will use this for propaganda and say Iran has suspended and it has caved in," Mr. Ahmadinejad said in a speech to students on the first day of the new university term, according to the student news agency ISNA.

"Nobody has the right to make Iran back down over its rights," he said. "With rationality and with logic, we will defend the rights of Iran."

The comments come just two days after talks between Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, and the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, ended in Berlin without agreement. European diplomats have said that Mr. Larijani offered a two-month suspension in talks recently. Some diplomats say there may be division within Iran's leadership over whether to allow a suspension.

European diplomats still hope Iran will agree to some kind of suspension under a deal offered by the five permanent United Nations Security Council members plus Germany that offers Tehran a package of diplomatic and economic incentives.

The United States, which has refused to hold direct talks with Iran unless it suspends uranium enrichment, has been pushing for more international pressure to halt Tehran's nuclear program over concerns that it is meant not to produce electricity, as Iran contends, but nuclear arms.

"They have been putting pressure on us to suspend enrichment," Mr. Ahmadinejad said Saturday. "At first they asked us to suspend for six months, then they asked us to suspend for three months, then for one month. We said no.

"Now they have proposed that we suspend for a short period, for one day, but we asked them, 'Why do you want us to suspend?'

"They said suspend for a few days and explain that you have technical problems. But we have no technical problems! Why should we lie to the people?"

White House Divided Over Iran (NSDY)

By Timothy M. Phelps
Long Island Newsday, October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Just as it was four years ago in the run-up to the war with Iraq, the Bush administration is said to be bitterly divided over how hard a line to take against Iran and whether a last-resort military option -- massive bombing of Iran's nuclear facilities -- is advisable.

The lineup, according to sources with good contacts inside the administration, is almost exactly what it was before, with the vice president and secretary of defense pushing for a tougher approach, and the secretary of state holding out for patient diplomacy.

The difference is that so far Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is prevailing, while Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and their conservative allies in the capital have been left sputtering. Rice, unlike her predecessor, Colin Powell, is extremely close to the president, even spending weekends with him and his wife at Camp David.

"Obviously Cheney and Rumsfeld have decided to go ahead and bomb the hell out of them, and everything else is an excuse to do that," said Jean-Francois Seznik, an expert on the Iranian economy who teaches at Columbia University. "And State wants to negotiate. The Iranians have caught on to the idea that the U.S. is very divided."

Conservatives angered

The United States has patiently gone along with its European allies on repeated postponements of deadlines set for Iran to agree to suspend uranium enrichment or else face a United Nations Security Council vote on economic sanctions. It has softened its Iran policy in other ways, including the recent announcement by President George W. Bush that the United States does not oppose the development by Iran of reactors to produce civilian nuclear power. And it has agreed to talk with Iran if that country verifiably suspends nuclear enrichment -- anathema to neoconservatives who not only want to stop Iran from getting nukes, but also to topple its government.

There also are reports that the Iraq Study Group set up is considering calling for a U.S. rapprochement with Iraqi neighbors Syria and Iran as a means of improving the situation in Iraq.

A number of conservative regional experts and columnists who are normally highly supportive of the Bush administration have been left very angry.

"No one in the international community and very few inside the State Department believe that it is important that we succeed in using diplomacy and economic means to try and contain Iran," said Danielle Pletka of the conservative American Enterprise Institute, which has been the Bush administration's favorite Washington think tank. "At least until now the Bush administration seems to think it's OK to just talk about it."

White House spokesman Tony Snow categorically denied there is a rift, saying it "sounds like one of those State Department leaks" and was "thoroughly baseless." He said, "This stuff is not done in a vacuum. Condi Rice is not a free agent."

But just because diplomacy is winning now does not mean it will prevail, most commentators believe, especially because it seems unlikely Russia and China would vote for high-impact economic sanctions right now that might force Iran to change.

The Pentagon appears to be gearing up for the possibility of a conflict.

Time magazine reported two weeks ago that extra ships were being sent to the Persian Gulf to block Iranian ports if necessary. And this year Rumsfeld created a Pentagon office to advise him on Iran, as he did for Iraq. The Iran Directorate bears some of the hallmarks of the old Office of Special Plans, which critics say funneled bogus intelligence from now-discredited Iraqi exiles directly to the White House.

Created in March, the directorate also represents the Pentagon at U.S. governmentwide meetings on Iran, said Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros, a Pentagon spokesman. He called any comparison between the offices "absolutely untrue" but confirmed that two people from the special-plans office now work in the directorate.

Bush continues to state that Iran will not be allowed a nuclear weapon. "It is time for Iran to make a choice," he said on Aug. 31. "We've made our choice: We will continue to work closely with our allies to find a diplomatic solution -- but there must be consequences for Iran's defiance, and we must not allow Iran to develop a nuclear weapon."

Military action inevitable?

Pletka believes the State Department's soft approach will lead to war. "One outcome we don't want is to have no options available to contain Iran other than military," Pletka said. "That's where I think we're headed."

While the military option is "very unattractive," Pletka said, "if I had to choose between the measured military might of the U.S. and an armed [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad regime, I think the choice is fairly obvious."

U.S. intelligence has estimated that Iran is five to 10 years from having a nuclear bomb, but House Republicans have charged that the intelligence community is being too cautious after its mistakes in Iraq.

Unlike the Iraq debate, there is little doubt in the intelligence community -- or, regional experts say, in the Middle East -- that Iran is working toward a nuclear weapon capability in order to dissuade the United States, Israel or Iraq from attacking it.

Some think the top leadership in Iran -- Ahmadinejad is outranked by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei -- eventually will make a deal with the United States.

But Kenneth Katzman, a respected congressional Middle East analyst, said that while the administration appears to want to avoid a military strike, Bush probably will be faced with a stark choice before he leaves office in 2009: "I would say he ultimately is going to be faced with a choice whether to take some dramatic action or acquiesce to Iran on the road to becoming a nuclear state on his watch."

Staff writer Craig Gordon contributed to this story.

Why Not Talk? (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

After a summer of protracted and mostly pointless bombing, the talking season is upon us. Unable or unwilling to halt Qassam rocket attacks on Israel and starved for funds, Hamas has begun discussing a national unity government with its rival Mahmoud Abbas. Tony Blair is rather bravely using his last months in office trying to get Abbas to sit down with the Israelis, who themselves have little to show for their campaign against Hezbollah. Iran, which spent the summer ignoring barely veiled bombing threats, seems poised to discuss its nuclear program with a coalition that includes China, Russia, Britain, France and Germany.

DOJ_NMG_0072621

Conspicuously absent from any of these negotiations is the United States. We approve of all of them, and our diplomats are doubtless in the loop. But officially speaking, silence is our policy. We do not speak with Hamas because of its terrorist activities and unwillingness to recognize Israel's right to exist. In the case of Iran, the trouble stretches all the way back to the 1979-81 hostage crisis, during which we refused to recognize the Islamic Republic. In the latest cycle of tensions over Iran's nuclear progress, the U.S. refuses to join any talks unless Iran first suspends uranium enrichment — which was also the position of our partners until they announced they would be willing to start talking anyway. President Bush put his position bluntly last month: "I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program. I meant what I said."

What's the point of not talking, especially when others are talking for us? If politics is the art of compromise, then surely conversation is one of its methods. Of course, some enemies — a Hitler or a Pol Pot — may be so repugnant that the mere prospect of reaching a compromise with them would violate our deepest moral principles. The only time it would be right to hear them out is when they are proposing to surrender. There are radical jihadists who see us in similar terms: they find us repellent and see little point in speaking unless it is to warn us of our downfall if we don't submit to their demands. Given their principled unwillingness to compromise, there is little point in talking with them.

And yet even intractable interlocutors may be worth engaging. Perhaps the conversation serves as a strategy of subterfuge and delay, maintaining a holding pattern or cease-fire until the time is ripe to restart hostilities. Talking can also reveal information about an adversary's leaders — their preconceptions, their blind spots, their fixed beliefs.

Ultimately, however, the most fruitful negotiations are based on a different premise: under certain conditions, the motives that drive people and regimes can be changed. Properly carried out, diplomacy creates new incentives that alter countries' underlying interests — and thus their behavior. Over 50 years, a slow and painstakingly negotiated process of economic integration has taught Western Europe's traditional enemies to look upon one another as allies, then friends and now almost as parts of one big country. If there is ever to be a meaningful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, it will involve something similar: putting both peoples in a position to gain more the closer they come together.

When we put our trust in diplomacy, it is not because it is an inspiring or uplifting discourse or because it helps us see the common humanity in others. The stylized circumlocutions of diplomats can make them seem ridiculous or irrelevant: they never seem to be talking about what is really going on. Moreover, talk between enemies may remind both parties of the depth of their mutual enmities and of all the reasons why they were tempted to use force against one another in the first place.

Nevertheless, diplomacy is essential as long as the use of direct force has limits. After 9/11, most Americans were in no mood to talk with our enemies in the Middle East, whatever those enemies' ideology, and the Bush administration's policies of invasion and pre-emption reflected that sentiment. Now, having relearned the lesson of our limitations, we find ourselves edging back to the table.

Our refusal to speak with Hamas since its election victory has had real costs. It has suggested to many that our commitment to Middle Eastern democracy is partial at best, and it may have enabled violence by implying that the United States doesn't care all that much about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Still, our policy may pay dividends in helping to establish a new Palestinian government, and we should continue to shun Hamas to make sure that such a result occurs. If the new government agrees to abide by previous Palestinian commitments to Israel, however, we should get back to the table quickly.

In the case of Iran, the problem is that we are at once desperate for its help in quieting the chaos of Iraq and determined to stop it from developing a nuclear weapon. We have been willing to speak with Iran's leaders about Iraq but not about the weapons — a distinction that Iran regards as arbitrary and has thus far yielded few gains in either realm. We would do better to sit down with Iran now, recalling that by the time we began negotiating with North Korea, its nuclear progress had become all but a fait accompli.

In short, we need a breakthrough, one that will help either the Israeli-Palestinian track, the Iraq situation or both. To get that, we will need the much-maligned diplomats. It could be a British prime minister on his way out, able to accomplish what Bill Clinton in his last days could not. It could be the first Muslim secretary general of the United Nations — Prince Zeid al-Hussein of Jordan is a leading candidate — who breaks the impasse. Or it could be the usual suspects, just muddling through and lowering the temperature. In an ideological age, diplomacy may seem weak and prosaic. But sometimes it is all we have.

The World Is J-Curved (WP)

By Ian Bremmer

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

U.S. officials threatening to isolate Iran from the international community may want to take their cue from the Iranian leadership, which is doing a fine job of purging the Islamic Republic of foreign influences all on its own. Last December, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad banned Western music from state-run television and radio. And in mid-May, his government announced plans to increase the number of stations capable of blocking foreign satellite broadcasts from 50 to 300 within two years. Just as its government was making the airwaves safe for theocracy, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice again threatened Iran with "isolation from the international community."

Similarly, the Bush administration insists that if Kim Jong Il's government would dismantle its nuclear program, the U.S. government would support North Korea's integration into the family of nations. If it refuses, Washington will "further deepen North Korea's isolation," Rice said.

What the United States seems not to recognize is that the world's most repressive regimes depend on isolation to survive; they are stable precisely because they are closed. Kim knows he must hide North Korea from the outside world, and the outside world from North Koreans. If half the people of North Korea watched 30 minutes of CNN (or al-Jazeera, for that matter) and fully understood the damage wrought by their government's catastrophic policies and brutality -- or the contrasting standards of living in Japan and South Korea -- Kim's regime might not survive. Threatening that regime with isolation is like threatening a drowning man with a lifeboat.

So, what is the best way to transform a stable but closed state into a stable and open one? Historically, such transformations have required countries to go through a dangerous period of turmoil. Some states, such as South Africa, survive the transition. Others, such as the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, do not.

In the Middle East, the Bush administration is seeking to spread democracy and free markets -- in essence, to transform closed states into open ones. But imposing such a transformation from the outside is likely to exacerbate the transitional turmoil, as U.S. troops in Iraq are discovering every day. It's easy to push a closed state into instability; it's much tougher to help its citizens build a new political stability based on openness.

Imagine a graph that charts a country's stability on the vertical axis and its openness (both within the country and to the world) on the horizontal one. If each nation appears as a point on the graph, the resulting pattern looks very much like the letter J. Nations higher on the graph are more stable; those lower are less stable. Nations to the right of the dip in the J are more open; those to the left are less open. This simple J curve captures many of the dilemmas inherent in global politics today.

A state's stability depends on its capacity to withstand shocks and avoid producing them. For instance, when the July presidential election in Mexico resulted in a close vote, recount demands and massive protests in Mexico City, local and foreign investors largely shrugged off the controversy. Why? Over the past several years, the country's political, financial and legal institutions have gained greater public confidence. The government is more competent, and the middle class is growing. Mexico experienced a political shock, but the election revealed the country's underlying political stability.

A country's openness, meanwhile, is the extent to which the state allows people, ideas, information and goods to flow freely across and within its borders. Are foreign books translated into the local language? Can citizens tap independent local, national and international media? Can they travel outside the country? Is foreign investment permitted? Can citizens communicate and conduct business freely?

Open and stable countries on the right side of the J curve have a collective interest in opening up the closed states on the left side. But the most powerful agents for change in any society are the people living in it. Democratizing North Korea from the outside is not a realistic short-term goal. Instead, the gradual infiltration into North Korea of communications technology -- such as cellphones, the Internet, satellite dishes and text-messaging equipment -- is more likely to undermine authoritarian rule from within over time. Consider the recent official reaction in North Korea when discarded VCRs and contraband tapes of South Korean soap operas made it across the border from China. The tapes reportedly became so popular that state-run television warned citizens not to imitate South Korean slang or hairstyles.

Unfortunately, U.S. policy too often helps authoritarian governments isolate their people. The French firm Alcatel recently upgraded Iran's telecom network and provided the country with its first high-speed DSL Internet connections. But when the company began merger talks with the U.S. firm Lucent, some lawmakers here criticized Alcatel's ties with Iran. Wiring the country allowed Iranians to better communicate with one another and the outside world. Instead of condemning the effort, Washington should find ways to imitate it.

Even limited trade ties between open and closed states improve communication between people within and across national boundaries. By inviting countries such as Iran, Russia and Saudi Arabia to join the World Trade Organization, open states can help reinforce the growth of middle classes and create rising expectations for further opening. It won't happen overnight; Cuba and Burma are already WTO members. But it's a first step in a long-term effort.

In the short term, however, it can also be a tremendously destabilizing effort. For a closed stable country to become an open stable one, it must pass through the dip in the J curve -- a transition of greater openness combined with dangerous instability. Is the world ready for open national elections in Pakistan, for example? In Egypt? If fair elections took place next month in China, would the country become more stable or less so?

The dip in the J curve is a frightening place. Sectarian violence and insurgent attacks kill hundreds of Iraqis each week. In such an environment, it is natural for the public to demand a quick return to stability, even if it means sacrificing openness. (Russia, for instance, responded to the chaos of the Boris Yeltsin years by embracing Vladimir Putin -- essentially voting its way back up the left side of the J curve, toward a more stable but authoritarian state.)

Moving right along the J curve is harder; it requires plenty of time and political capital, and neither is abundant in Iraq. Success will require years of troop support and financial assistance. The Bush administration has done little to prepare the American people or the international community for such commitments. And the Iraqi people may not have enough faith in their new government to make the sacrifices necessary to ensure its success. If violence intensifies further, Iraq could eventually generate a new authoritarian regime or collapse into chaos as locals increasingly rely on sectarian militias to defend their interests.

With such turmoil in mind, it's easy to see why the leaders of left-side states will do their best to resist any incremental opening or transition. Kim has no interest in allowing the Peace Corps to move freely around the North Korean countryside letting people know what life is like on the outside. Iran's clerics point their restive youth away from the temptations of Western culture and instead emphasize Western attempts to deny Iran its nuclear program.

Indeed, many authoritarian leaders know that if they provoke the United States, Washington will isolate their countries and thus strengthen their authority. Some of these provocations may seem a little crazy. (See Ahmadinejad on the Holocaust or Kim on, well, any number of things.) But when Venezuela's Hugo ChÃ¡vez and Burma's ruling military junta warn of a U.S. invasion, they are not out of touch with reality; they're merely stealing ideas from the playbook that has helped keep Cuban President Fidel Castro in power for 47 years.

In Iran, standing up to the United States is a winning issue. Indeed, many in Iran's government probably would welcome international sanctions as a useful tool with which to unify Iranians behind the regime, deprive domestic rivals of public support, and rewrite laws to ensure that would-be reformers cannot regain a foothold in government.

By contrast, China's experience with stability and openness is not as clear. The country's openness to trade, foreign investment and advanced communications seems to place it on the right side of the J curve. But in reality, its police-state politics consign it to the left side. In essence, Chinese leaders hope to beat the J curve -- they're gambling that by generating greater prosperity for China's people, they can bring the country into the international community without unleashing the turmoil that flows from opening up an authoritarian state.

Can the Chinese Communist Party survive China's dip in the J curve? Perhaps 11 percent growth will fend off public anger with the country's authoritarian system. Maybe it won't. About 50,000 Chinese police are now charged with monitoring the Internet, but each day, 100,000 Chinese log on for the very first time. And the dangers of a sudden economic slowdown -- which can emerge from a sustained oil price spike or from the imposition of severe travel restrictions following an avian flu outbreak -- could quickly derail China's longer-term political stability. The country could be closer to dangerous instability than many realize.

In one way or another, all states -- even open, stable ones -- are constantly moving along the J curve. Some states swing widely; others shift imperceptibly over time. However, history suggests that all closed states eventually wither or explode; their walls merely hide their potential instability from the world. Only an openness that links citizens within and across nations can help states build stability and social and economic dynamism. Only the free exchange of information, values and people can build global stability that enriches all who take part in it.

Troop Pullout From Lebanon Complete (WT/AP)

By Matti Friedman, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

MOSHAV ZARIT, Israel -- Israeli military officials said the army withdrew the last of its troops from Lebanon early today, fulfilling a key condition of the cease-fire that ended a monthlong war with Hezbollah guerrillas.

The pullout ended a nearly three-month troop presence and cleared the way for the full deployment of an international peacekeeping force that will police the border.

Israeli military officials said the last soldiers returned to Israel around 2:30 a.m., ahead of the onset of Yom Kippur, the holiest day on the Jewish calendar, which begins at sundown. The officials spoke on the condition of anonymity under military guidelines.

Israel had gradually reduced its troop presence since the Aug. 14 cease-fire from a peak of 30,000 during the fighting to several hundred in recent days. The final pullout was swift, taking just several hours to complete.

DOJ_NMG_0072624

Under the cover of darkness, the roar of Israeli tanks and armored vehicles could be heard moving across the Lebanese side of the border during the operation.

An armored column creaked across the border at the Israeli border community of Moshav Avivim, leaving tank tread marks in the soil and sending a large cloud of dust into the air that was visible in the vehicles' headlights. Later, the last group of soldiers was seen boarding a bus at nearby Moshav Zarit.

During the withdrawal, the military censor imposed a blackout on all details of the troop movements, citing security concerns. The army set up roadblocks to block reporters from reaching the border.

Israel sent the troops into Lebanon shortly after Hezbollah guerrillas abducted two soldiers and killed three others in a July 12 cross-border raid. More than 150 Israelis and 850 Lebanese were killed in 34 days of fighting.

Israeli officials had been reluctant to withdraw the last of the troops. They cited disagreements over the deployment of Lebanese and U.N. forces in southern Lebanon, which has long been a stronghold of the Shi'ite Muslim Hezbollah guerrillas. Israel is concerned about the force's ability to prevent Hezbollah, which launched 4,000 rockets into Israel during the fighting, from rearming.

The last troops had been scattered at four locations along the border, including Maroun el-Rass, where heavy fighting raged in July and August.

The U.N. peacekeepers deployed in southern Lebanon were expected to send patrols today to verify the Israeli withdrawal.

As in previous Israeli withdrawals since the cease-fire, U.N. peacekeepers would send patrols to the vacated areas after being informed by the Israelis to verify and in turn inform the Lebanese government.

The U.N. resolution calls for 15,000 peacekeepers to work with an equal number of Lebanese soldiers to prevent another outbreak of fighting.

Ruined Towns Look To Beirut, Mostly In Vain (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 30 — A ride through the south of Lebanon, across rutted and bombed-out roads, past a landscape of twisted metal and crumbled concrete, reveals little progress toward rebuilding tens of thousands of homes devastated by the 34 days of Israeli bombing that ended more than six weeks ago.

Money has begun flowing in, from foreign governments and nongovernmental organizations. But nearly $900 million in international pledges remains untapped by the Lebanese government, whose presence is barely visible in the south. In contrast, Hezbollah, with money from Iran, continues to give cash payments to individual Lebanese for damaged homes. And the central government has allowed, and indeed encouraged, some foreign countries to begin giving similar grants.

Those villages lucky enough to have been adopted by foreign donors are preparing to rebuild. In those less fortunate, villagers sit staring into ruins, and waiting.

“There is nothing from the government, not even a phone call,” said Muhammad Azzam, mayor of Siddiqin, a small village that has reported 449 homes destroyed by Israel’s military. Such comments are repeated, nearly verbatim, across the south, although an arm of the Lebanese government has cleared rubble from many towns.

The government defends its performance, saying that it has gotten vital services such as water and electricity back, opened roads and kept the economy functioning. It says that it is nearly done putting in place the trustworthy financial system needed to tap into the international pledges, one that will provide a level of accountability and transparency unprecedented for Lebanon.

“It has only been one month, and a lot has been accomplished,” said the country’s finance minister, Jihad B. Azour. “But people only see what wasn’t done.”

However, when it comes to homes, the government has been slow to respond. Government officials said they would pay $40,000 cash for each destroyed house, but they have not been able to say when. And winter is approaching.

The United Nations resolution that ended the war was designed in part to give Lebanon’s central government its first chance since Israel withdrew in 2000 to extend its authority over the southern part of the country. The peace deal required the government to dispatch the internationally bolstered Lebanese Army there to push out Hezbollah, long the de facto authority in the area. The agreement also offered the central government a chance to sweep in and begin to rebuild, which could have helped it win the peace among a population that it had long ignored.

But while the army is there, it has yet to really engage the international force, not yet allowing it to set up checkpoints or conduct searches. The central government has made no better showing at winning over the people of the south with help.

"It is not good enough to send the army," said Timur Goksel, a former longtime United Nations spokesman in Lebanon who teaches public administration at the American University in Beirut. "Someone has to fix the roads in the south. Someone has to get the hospitals going. Where is the state?"

The central government's stumbles started early. Even before the conflict between Israel and Hezbollah ended, it was encouraged to create financial mechanisms to guarantee that international aid would not be squandered; they remain incomplete. Foreign donors who pledged millions at a conference in Stockholm last month have proved so skittish that, instead of funds, they have sent delegations to Beirut to work out exactly how their money will be spent, according to people in the government and others affiliated with nongovernmental agencies and a gulf-area donor country.

Officials in Beirut, determined to get projects moving, have simply encouraged donors to bypass the central government. "We are trying to make ourselves flexible," said Dr. Azour, the finance minister.

So far, foreign countries have agreed to adopt 99 out of 251 damaged villages, and will likely spend about $640 million on the work, officials said. The United States has agreed to spend $20 million to help repair the Mudarrij Bridge in partnership with the Italians, for example. In total, the United States has pledged $230 million in humanitarian assistance and what are known as early recovery systems.

Lebanon's people largely rallied together after Hezbollah's capture of two Israeli soldiers on July 12 prompted Israel to rain bombs on their country, shattering bridges, airports, homes, roads and businesses. But Lebanese unity is as fleeting as the raw emotions aroused by crisis.

Now the scars of this war have exposed, and in some cases deepened, many of the nation's fault lines. Some Christian villagers in the Shuf Mountains, for example, ask why Shiites in the south will receive compensation for lost homes after just a month, when many of those Christian villagers have received nothing for homes they lost during the civil war of the 1980's, officials said.

The animosity has only grown between Hezbollah and the coalition that controls the government — named for March 14, the day in 2005 that huge numbers of people demonstrated to call for an end to Syria's military presence. Their verbal sparring has raised fears of possible civil conflict, in a country miserably familiar with such fighting, and has distracted attention from rebuilding, officials said.

"We have a responsibility to stop political bickering and work on not turning Lebanon into a battleground for external conflicts, and at the same time build a strong, democratic and capable country," Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said in a televised speech on Friday night. "Our country needs reconstruction of the people's houses, their lives, their businesses, their sources of income, reconstruction of infrastructure, reconstruction of economy, rebuilding our future potentials."

That point is not in dispute; the debates are over how to get there. And so the March 14th side accuses the Hezbollah side of carrying water for Syria and Iran. The Hezbollah side accuses the March 14th side of doing the United States' bidding.

Terms like flattened, crumbled and collapsed barely describe what happened to Aita al Shaab, a Hezbollah stronghold in the south, and neighboring villages. The landscape is a canvas of destruction, 750 homes destroyed, 400 damaged. Communities have been uprooted, families forced to crowd in with relatives, schools shattered. Many residents worried that reconstruction would be uneven, with little planning, and villages forced to take what they can get.

Animosity toward Beirut has hardened.

"The government prefers to get the money directly so they can decide how much money to take for themselves and how much to give to us," said Afif Bassi, who heads a newly formed local reconstruction committee in the shattered village of Bint Jbail, another Hezbollah stronghold a few miles north of the border, which had some of the most bitter fighting when Israel sent in ground forces. "We drafted a plan for reconstruction that includes electric, roads, water, gardens, sidewalks."

Fadhl Chalak, the former president of Lebanon's Council for Development and Reconstruction (which is what war had already turned the Ministry of Planning into, back in 1977), charges that the government has intentionally stalled the reconstruction effort. Mr. Chalak, who was instrumental in completing the reconstruction of Beirut after the civil war, says he believes that the government calculated that Shiites in the south would turn against Hezbollah if reconstruction dragged on — a charge the government dismisses as unworthy of response.

He quit the development council, he said, after Arab countries pledged hundreds of millions of dollars in aid before the war ended and the government was slow to accept it — which the government also denies.

"By delaying funding, they think they can turn Shias against their leaders," Mr. Chalak said.

The minister of finance said Mr. Chalak quit because he had a personal conflict with the prime minister.

The government has guaranteed that every village will be rebuilt, but the current patchwork of aid has raised concerns about the fate of villages that are not adopted. And if there are few, if any, signs of confidence in the central government, there is growing anxiety about the willingness to turn planning and decision making for individual villages over to foreign governments.

DOJ_NMG_0072626

Qatar's offer of up to $100 million to help rebuild Bint Jbail — where village officials say 700 homes were destroyed, 300 heavily damaged and 1,500 moderately damaged — was based on a plan to distribute money to individual homeowners. The village officials said they were pressing Qatar to adjust the plan.

"What we are asking for from the Qataris is to rebuild the whole village themselves in a modern way which also preserves its historical aspect," said the mayor, Ali Bazzi. "But they are insisting on paying the people directly. This would be a disaster to the city and to the country too because people will take the $40,000 or $50,000 and leave the country."

Qatari officials said they have no interest in overseeing the reconstruction itself; they are already overseeing the restoration of 11 damaged schools. In Bint Jbail, they intend to give grants in three stages, with residents having to meet deadlines and show progress to receive each succeeding payment.

"If they do take the first payment and leave, then there is really nothing that we can do, can we?" said Khaled al-Hitmi, an engineer working with the Qatar delegation.

The mayor of Siddiqin, Mr. Azzam, was in a more frustrating position. He said that many people in his village were not supporters of Hezbollah, and so did not receive any of its beneficence. Nor had he received any contact from the government, he said.

But he had met with a delegation from Syria, which promised to rebuild. He said he had not heard back from the Syrians, and so was unsure if they would follow through, or if he would have to wait for the government to get around to his village. Pessimism has taken hold.

"We do not believe people will be compensated," he said, flatly. "We do not believe their houses will be rebuilt."

Hope Fades For Fatah, Hamas Deal (BOS)

By Anne Barnard

The Boston Globe, October 1, 2006

Frustration rising for Palestinians

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas has spent the past two weeks struggling to reach a power-sharing deal with the Hamas government -- a government that hasn't paid salaries in six months and that hobbles along with thousands of workers on strike and four Cabinet members in Israeli jails.

In the places where the Palestinian Authority tries to do its work, many dejected officials say it is absurd to expect such a deal against the current backdrop of chaos.

Ministry offices stand half- deserted in the West Bank city of Ramallah. In the Gaza Strip, rival security officials from Hamas and Abbas's Fatah party accuse each other's followers of murder. And the newest ``martyr'' commemorated on posters plastered across West Bank villages is a young man who was killed not by Israeli soldiers but by Palestinian police officers who opened fire last month on stone-throwing demonstrators after short tempers flared into a riot over a stolen motorcycle.

With the daily work of government hamstrung by political infighting and financial crisis, neither the Hamas government nor the president's Fatah movement is in a position to make a bold compromise or sell one to its people, officials from both sides said in interviews last week.

The disarray in the West Bank and Gaza and the political stalemate suggests there's little hope any time soon for advancing the Middle East peace process or for ending Palestinians' crippling economic isolation. When the Hamas-led government took office in March, Israel began withholding more than $50 million in monthly tax revenues it collects for the Palestinians, and the international community cut off aid.

Hamas refuses to meet the conditions set by Israel, the United States, Russia, the European Union, and the United Nations to lift the aid boycott: recognize Israel, renounce violence, and honor previous peace agreements. Abbas is trying to persuade Hamas to give up some of its Cabinet seats and join his faction and others in a unity government that would accept the conditions.

But as Palestinians' quality of life falls dramatically and both Fatah and Hamas lose credibility, the two parties seem more viscerally opposed than ever. Fatah officials say openly that they believe Hamas will never compromise and that Abbas's current strategy is to incite street protests to bring down the government.

``How can we deal with these people?'' said Ahmed Abd al- Rahman, a media adviser to Abbas, complaining that Hamas at first agreed to a unity government, then pulled back. He called Hamas leaders ``so-called politicians,'' ``amateurs,'' and, referring to their goal of establishing an Islamic state, ``ideological people with beards.''

Sameer Abu Aisheh, minister of planning in the Hamas-led government, said pushing Hamas into a corner would only harden its stance. ``We submit to no one but God.''

The stalemate is taking its toll on Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0072627

Since March, according to Palestinian Authority statistics, the gross national product has fallen 49 percent and imports are down 41 percent. Robbery and theft have risen 40 percent.

``How long will the security chaos last?'' says the poster that commemorates Ehab Al-Qinneh, 22, killed Sept. 3 when police fired on a crowd that stormed the police station in Bir Zeit, a village outside Ramallah, after officers confiscated a stolen motorbike.

Qais Abdelkarim, head of a small opposition bloc in the Palestinian parliament that printed the posters, said the feud between Hamas and Fatah is adding to a ``spreading anarchy.'' Rival Hamas and Fatah militias have undermined the already shaky public respect for law enforcement and left security forces ``in a state of chaos,'' he said. ``There is no political will to deal with this.''

At a time when delicate negotiations were said to be underway on the unity government, Hamas and Fatah officials in Gaza last week blamed one another's allies for the assassination of a top intelligence official.

In this atmosphere of chaos, Abbas aims to do the near-impossible: win a compromise on gut-level issues that divide Hamas and Fatah. But that means gaining concessions from a Hamas government that considers itself unfairly under siege.

Abu Aisheh presided Wednesday over a near-empty Ministry of Finance building. He said 70 percent of his employees are on strike. Originally named planning minister, he was forced to take a second job when Israel arrested the finance minister, along with more than two dozen other Hamas officials, after Hamas militants kidnapped an Israeli soldier in June.

Abu Aisheh, a university professor with a doctorate in transportation planning from Pennsylvania State University, took office in March with dreams of introducing American-style efficiency to notoriously disorganized ministries. Instead, he's watched the work of his two ministries grind almost to a halt.

One of his jobs is tracking the Palestinian Authority's six-month arrears in operating expenses -- $120 million in rent, utilities, and other bills.

But Hamas won't bend under duress, said Abu Aisheh, an independent who supports Hamas's Islamist agenda.

The central issue is recognition of Israel. This year, Hamas and Fatah agreed on a common goal of a Palestinian state on the lands that Israel occupied in 1967. Fatah says that wording is an implicit recognition of Israel. Hamas says it is not.

Abu Aisheh says the words speak for themselves, and that going further would be humiliating.

``Let's be realistic. Having a state within the 1967 borders, that means there is another state in the rest of historical Palestine,'' he said. ``But in our tradition, in our belief, in our society, we do not submit to those who say'' -- he snapped his fingers three times -- ``One, two, three, do this.''

That kind of talk infuriates Rahman, Abbas's adviser, who spent decades in exile with Yasser Arafat when Fatah -- the largest organization in the Palestine Liberation Organization -- was just as militant toward Israel as Hamas. He displayed the secular nationalist bent of his party by chain-smoking through an interview Thursday afternoon, when traditional Muslims were fasting and avoiding cigarettes in honor of the holy month of Ramadan.

Recognizing Israel, he said, is how Fatah won international support for founding the Palestinian Authority and, someday, a Palestinian state.

``It's not for the Israelis!'' he said, raising his voice in exasperation. ``It is a precondition for the rest of the world to recognize me. I need it for myself.''

Frustrations in the streets are directed not just at Hamas, but also at the Palestinian Authority bureaucracy and security forces, dominated by Fatah.

No one in the village of Qibliyeh Farm disputed that the motorbike police confiscated Sept. 3 was stolen. But economic stress had frayed tempers, and rumors circulated that the police had beaten the man who was riding the bike.

A crowd of villagers rushed to nearby Bir Zeit and stoned the police station. Qinneh was killed there in what Palestinian officials ruled was excessive use of force.

The altercation, for police and villagers alike, sums up feelings of abandonment by their leaders. A police sergeant who no longer has enough gas for his car, yet is still so loyal to Fatah that his cellphone ring is a recording of Arafat reading a Koranic verse, said that people have lost respect for the law and that Hamas and Fatah would rather keep their respective political fiefdoms than strike a deal.

``Hamas is happy, and Abu Mazen [Abbas] is happy, and we are stuck in the middle,'' said the officer, who asked not to be identified because of the political tension.

Meanwhile, the dead man's father, Abdelfattah al-Qinneh, said officials sent him a $10,000 payment for his son's death -- not through a court of law but through a traditional practice used to resolve clan feuding. To Qinneh, it was as if the Palestinian Authority were just another tribe.

``There is no law and order,'' he said. ``The killers should be identified.''

Thousands In Gaza Protest Salary Delays (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, October 1, 2006

Thousands of government employees and security officials burned tires, blocked roads and fired shots in the air on Gaza streets Saturday to protest delays in receiving long-awaited salaries.

Palestinian Interior Minister Said Siyam ordered security forces to deploy in the streets Sunday to prevent similar protests. The order authorized the use of "all means of force," said ministry spokesman Khaled Abu Hilal.

"Those who protested today ... do not represent security institutions. They are violating law and order, so they are illegal," he said.

The protesters closed the main road between Gaza City and Khan Younis, affecting movement between Gaza City and the southern Gaza Strip.

The Palestinian government on Thursday began paying partial salaries to 165,000 civil servants who haven't received their full wages in months due to an economic embargo on the Palestinian Authority. The individual payments of $350 come from money donated to the government by Qatar and Saudi Arabia.

But government employees complained that in some cases, the money hadn't arrived, and in others they were left with nothing after Palestinian banks had deducted commissions and interest and paid off existing loans.

Outside Rafah City, protesters threw stones at the vehicle of Attalah Abu Sabh, Hamas' minister of culture, breaking the windows of the car. Abu Sabh was unharmed, Hamas officials said. The protesters also tried to enter a number of schools and disrupt studies, witnesses said.

Israel and the West froze economic ties with the Palestinian Authority after the militant Islamic group Hamas took power in March. Hamas has refused international demands that it recognize Israel, accept signed peace agreements and renounce violence.

With the aid cut off, the government has been unable for six months to pay the full salaries to its workers, a major part of the Palestinian workforce. Government workers, including teachers, doctors and security officers, have repeatedly staged strikes demanding the salaries and calling for the resignation of the Hamas government.

Presto, Palestinians, You Are All One (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

JERUSALEM

THE Palestinians may soon have a new government of national unity — or may not.

More than two weeks ago, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, announced he had reached agreement with the radical Islamic group Hamas on the political platform for such a government as a way to induce the West to resume financial aid to the desperate Palestinians.

The idea was immediately endorsed by the European Union at a meeting of foreign ministers on Sept. 15.

But the Europeans were embracing a chimera — praising a new government that didn't yet exist. In fact, Hamas repudiated the political program almost as soon as Mr. Abbas announced it.

In the muddle since then, what has become clearest is the danger of diplomacy when reality confronts language intended to disguise it. The whole exercise has had an element of prestidigitation about it — a magician wooing an audience desperately hoping to suspend disbelief.

The major obstacle is that any new government would represent a defeat for Hamas — an admission that it cannot govern alone, with no ideological modifications. That is apparently too big a concession for its political director, Khaled Meshal, who lives in exile in Damascus.

For Hamas leaders in the territories, like Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, a unity government could be an exit from a terrible problem. Hamas, considered a terrorist group by the United States and European Union, has proven unable to circumvent the Israeli and American determination to force it to change by denying it recognition and money.

But even a unity government would not automatically mean a restoration of financing. The Israelis and Americans make three demands: that Hamas recognize the right of Israel to exist; that it forswear violence; and that it accept all previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Mr. Abbas's magic plan has been to seek language that would allow Hamas to accept some conditions as part of a unity government, without making them the movement's own.

DOJ_NMG_0072629

The draft political plan, for example, would not explicitly recognize Israel's right to exist. Instead, it accepted as a goal an old Arab League peace proposal, which Israel has rejected, and in language that didn't mention Israel at all.

The program also tried to dodge the government's role in international relations by confirming the primacy of the Palestine Liberation Organization, headed by Mr. Abbas, as the sole negotiating authority. The P.L.O. accepts previous agreements that it negotiated, so Mr. Abbas argues that Hamas's refusal to do the same hardly matters. But if he should reach agreement with Israel, the deal's fate would be at the mercy of the Palestinian legislature, which Hamas controls.

And while the program promised that Palestinians would "struggle to liberate their lands and end the occupation using all legitimate means," the document negotiated with Hamas confirmed a "right" to resist Israeli occupation, including inside Israel proper. This is not "forswearing violence."

As Mr. Abbas has labored, European diplomats talked about amending the three demands and starting with a cease-fire that would bring some cash support. The United States and Israel oppose any softening, however — particularly on Israel's right to exist.

So the vision of a unified Palestinian government may wither quickly. With the Egyptians frustrated, Qatar on Thursday stepped in to try to mediate between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Meshal. But in interviews last week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice talked as if a national-unity government were dead, and her government was said to be pushing Mr. Abbas to confront Hamas and fire Mr. Haniya.

The mirage of national unity may, on closer inspection, presage intensified conflict. Or it may not.

Building Nowhereland (WP)

By Gershom Gorenberg

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Out on Highway 60, the bulldozers are at work.

Next to the road that leads south from Jerusalem to Israeli settlements in the West Bank, the big yellow machines are scraping the earth, carving a flat, white, dusty shoulder. Along that strip, a high concrete wall is already being built, part of the newest segment of Israel's "separation fence." The planned route loops around the cluster of settlements known as the Etzion Bloc, putting them on the Israeli side of the de facto border.

Israeli-Palestinian diplomacy is stalled. The bulldozers are not. Once again they are changing the face of the land in a way that makes life far more difficult for Palestinians while damaging Israel's own long-term interests.

As described by Israel's Defense Ministry, the fence is purely a security measure intended to protect Israelis from Palestinian terrorists. Instead of running along the Green Line, the Israel-West Bank border, the route has been drawn to place major "settlement blocs" on the Israeli side -- supposedly only to defend them as well.

Yet Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has publicly stated that the settlement blocs will remain part of Israel after a unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank. He reiterated that point in February while on a working tour of the fence route in the Etzion area. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni has said, a bit coyly, that the fence "will have implications for the future border." The Defense Ministry official in charge of planning the fence told me much the same three years ago. Cut past obfuscations, and the fence is the government's assertion, drawn in concrete and barbed wire, of what land it seeks to keep.

The 10 settlements in the Etzion enclave are home to more than 44,000 Israelis. The number keeps rising, boosted by government efforts. In early September the Housing Ministry asked for bids to build more than 340 new units in Beitar Elit, the largest settlement in the enclave. The settlers enjoy the full rights of Israeli citizens. They drive into Israel, or to scattered settlements deeper in the West Bank, without interference, and they will continue doing so.

But note this: Six Palestinian communities are also inside the planned enclave. Twenty thousand people live in them. To travel back and forth to Bethlehem, the nearest urban center, most will have to pass through a single terminal being built along the fence and undergo a security check. That includes women in labor trying to reach the nearest hospital. It includes those who commute to work in the Bethlehem area, along with farmers who work the area's rich land and want to get their produce to market. Teachers from Bethlehem trying to reach their classrooms inside the enclave will need to pass the other way. This is a very partial list of how the fence will tear the fabric of life.

Yet for Palestinian residents the enclave will not be annexed to Israel. No one so much as suggests that they be given citizenship -- or even legal residency and the right to travel and work freely within Israel. Indeed, another stretch of fence is planned along the Green Line, to prevent potential terrorists from crossing into Israel. The six villages will be in Nowhereland, neither part of Israel nor part of the West Bank.

To pursue this project today makes no sense. Olmert's vision of unilateral withdrawal was intended to end rule over the Palestinians and guarantee Israel's Jewish majority, yet allow Israel to keep major settlements. But the conditions created inside enclaves such as the Etzion area are an affront to Israel's democracy and a guarantee of continuing conflict with the Palestinians.

What's more, the summer's battles in Gaza and Lebanon have shattered support in Israel for unilateralism. Without peace, a fence is not enough to protect the country. It is now clear that Israel can pull back safely only if it does so as part of a negotiated agreement. And there is no chance of an accord that will leave large settlement blocs in Israel's hands.

The Israeli Supreme Court is expected to rule soon on lawsuits by Palestinians against the Etzion area fence. Yet the slim chance of judicial salvation does nothing to explain why Olmert's government continues to invest in the failed project of the settlements, which for nearly 40 years has drained Israel's energies, subverted its democracy and harmed its security.

Nor is there any reasonable explanation for why Israel's strategic ally, the United States, virtually ignores what is happening in the Etzion area. The Bush administration has recently shown some inconsistent interest in restarting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Yet, following a long, mistaken tradition in American diplomacy, it pays more attention to negotiating stances than to the shifting reality in the region.

Meanwhile, out on Highway 60, the bulldozers are preparing a monument to a doomed policy.

Palestinians: Israeli Airstrike Kills 2 (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

An Israeli airstrike in the southern Gaza Strip killed two Palestinian militants and wounded three people, medical officials said.

The airstrike took place in Rafah, which borders Egypt. Medical officials said two members of the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades — a violent group linked to President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party — were killed. Two people were seriously wounded, and a 6-year-old boy was wounded in the legs.

The army said it had targeted a vehicle carrying a group of militants involved in attacks on Israel. But witnesses said the missile struck a group of pedestrians.

The airstrike occurred shortly after Israeli ground troops attacked a target along the Israeli border in northern Gaza. Witnesses said there were no injuries.

The Israeli army said it had targeted a militant who had tried to fire a homemade rocket into Israel. Earlier Saturday, a homemade rocket struck a house in the Israeli border town of Sderot, lightly wounding one person.

Jordan's King Risks Shah's Fate, Critics Warn (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Abdullah II, who has closely allied himself with the U.S., is accused by reformers and traditionalists alike of alienating his people.

AMMAN, Jordan — A politically inexperienced king takes control of a Middle Eastern monarchy from his powerful father, surrounds himself with U.S. military hardware and spies, loses touch with his people and is finally ejected in a popular uprising.

That was the tale of Mohammed Reza Shah Pahlavi, the pro-American ruler of Iran whose ouster ushered in the reign of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini and three decades of Islamic rule.

Now many in this Arab country of more than 5 million people fear that a similar fate could befall King Abdullah II, the Jordanian monarch who assumed power after his charismatic father died in 1999.

"Until now in Amman we don't have a Khomeini," said one mid-ranking official serving the Jordanian Cabinet. "If there was a Khomeini, then this family would be in trouble."

The king's father, Hussein, deftly balanced his country's contradictory pressures. He paid respects to the conservative East Bank tribes' demands for stability while also attending to calls from the nation's more cosmopolitan majority Palestinians for democratic change.

But critics on both sides of the Jordanian divide say the 44-year-old king has failed to garner popular support. Descendants of the tribes that are the monarchy's base criticize the king for failing to abide by tribal customs and losing touch with his supporters. They whisper the name of Abdullah's popular younger brother, Hamzeh. Palestinian groups and activists fear that the government in Amman has gotten too close to Washington, has adopted the Bush administration's with-us-or-against-us worldview too thoroughly and is sliding on human rights and democracy.

"King Hussein was an artist," said Ivan Eland, for 17 years a staff member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and now an analyst at the Oakland-based Independent Institute, a think tank. "He was roundly criticized for supporting Saddam [Hussein] in the first Gulf War. But in retrospect, he looked pretty smart.

DOJ_NMG_0072631

"The son has gotten more in bed with the United States," he added. "He hasn't been distancing himself from American policy. That has put him in a hole he hasn't been able" to get out of.

Numerous parallels exist between the shah's rule and that of Abdullah. Like the shah's SAVAK security and intelligence service, Jordan's General Intelligence Department, now in a new hilltop complex in an Amman suburb, operates as a "subdivision" of the CIA, said Alexis Debat, a former French Defense Ministry official who is a counter-terrorism consultant and a senior fellow at the Nixon Center in Washington.

By Debat's estimates, the Jordanian intelligence agency receives at least $20 million a year in U.S. funding for operations and liaison work. "They're doing all the legwork for the CIA," he said.

The Jordanians have become one of Washington's closest allies in the intelligence-gathering business, second only to Britain's MI6, counter-intelligence experts say. They are closer to the CIA than the Mossad, Israel's much-touted intelligence agency, which is considered to have too much of an agenda of its own to be completely reliable, Debat said.

Like the Iran of the 1970s, Jordan has become a receptacle of U.S. interests and trade. American aid to the kingdom has totaled $3.59 billion over the last five years, compared with $1.36 billion during the previous five years, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Like the shah's regime, the Jordanian monarchy has surrounded itself with American hardware. Just before Hussein's death, Amman took delivery of 16 advanced F-16 fighter jets. "That was a sort of threshold that Jordan crossed," said Michael R. Fischbach, a professor of history at Randolph-Macon College in Virginia. "They got truly advanced weaponry. It made Jordan have aircraft on par with Israel."

U.S.-made military hardware abounds on Jordan's streets. Jordanian soldiers carrying American-made M-16 assault rifles and riding in olive-green U.S.-made Humvees watch over sensitive military and political sites in Amman, the capital. Convoys of U.S. military transport trucks move in and out of the country.

Perhaps most controversially, say Amnesty International and other human rights groups, Jordan has become an important nexus in U.S. intelligence's subterranean "renditions" network, in which terrorism suspects are secretly detained and interrogated in countries with blemished human rights records. Jordanian officials deny participation in the program.

Many worry that bolstering Jordanian security forces amid widespread reports of abuses against detainees has hampered the country's baby steps toward democratization.

"The security forces are improving at the cost of democracy," said Hamzeh Mansur, a leader of the Islamic Action Front, the main Islamist parliamentary bloc.

Jordanian officials say the security apparatus has been ramped up and civil liberties laws tightened out of fear the country will become a staging ground for secretive cells plotting violent operations in Iraq, Israel and the Palestinian territories. Jordan has also been victimized by terrorism, including the Nov. 9, 2005, bombings of three Amman hotels that killed dozens.

"You have to combat terrorism while it's in its planning stage," said Nasser Joudeh, a government spokesman. "We will not allow Jordan to be used as a scene for any activity relating to non-Jordanian problems. We will not allow anyone to bring militant or extremist ideas into Jordan or export them elsewhere."

But the Hashemite kingdom's evident close ties with Washington and its leap into the U.S.-declared war on terrorism threaten to put the government on what some call a collision course with many of its people, especially in light of a sharp increase in anti-American sentiment after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003 and Israel's recent bombing of Lebanon in the Jewish state's war against Shiite Muslim militants.

"Being darlings of the U.S. is considered bad, bad, bad," said a Western analyst based in Jordan who requested anonymity.

Jordanian government officials say the security forces have become less heavy-handed in their approach. "I am liberal-minded," said Maj. Gen. Mohammed Dahabi, the chief of Jordanian intelligence, who says he was appointed in December with a mandate to clean up the service's reputation as well as confront the growing threat of Islamic militants in neighboring Iraq and the West Bank.

However, confronted by the recent allegations of torture, the officials acknowledge that the past casts a long shadow on the country.

"Old habits die hard," said Dahabi, who represents a segment of the tribal-dominated security forces that strongly supports the king.

Few publicly speak out against the king because of a law that can be used to prosecute those who do. "Criticisms of the king and the intelligence forces are strictly taboo and carry serious penalties," says a January 2006 Human Rights Watch report. "Articles of the penal code criminalize speech slandering public officials, criticizing the king and his family, and harming relations with other states."

DOJ_NMG_0072632

But Abdullah has emboldened a legion of critics among the country's tradition-minded tribes that are the backbone of the monarchy.

"He talks about information technology and foreign investment, but he doesn't really know his own people," said the government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of his sensitive position within the Cabinet.

"The tribes are very upset with him," said the Western analyst in Amman.

"The impression is that he's too Westernized."

Many critics say the monarch has been too busy pursuing a Western agenda instead of forging ahead with a vision for uniting the country, which remains divided between the powerful tribes and the numerous Jordanian nationals of Palestinian descent.

"He has ambitions to make Jordan a modern country," said Jean-Robert Leguey-Feilleux, a scholar of Middle East politics, diplomacy and terrorism at St. Louis University. "You can't do that without the support of the people."

India's Police Say Pakistan Helped Plot July Train Bombings (NYT)

By Anand Giridharadas

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

MUMBAI, India, Sept. 30 — In a declaration likely to increase tensions on this subcontinent, the Indian police on Saturday accused Pakistan's intelligence agency of being behind the July 11 train bombings that killed more than 180 people in Mumbai.

Officials in Islamabad swiftly rejected the allegation, which comes at an awkward moment for Pakistan.

On stormy visits to Washington and London this week, the nation's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, was dogged by accusations that Pakistan was not doing enough to curb Islamic militancy, or, worse, might even be aiding it.

Now the Indian police are adding their voice to those claims. They have already blamed Lashkar-e-Taiba, a Pakistan-based militant group fighting to expel India from the disputed Kashmir region, for the blasts.

But on Saturday, for the first time in this investigation, they directly accused the Directorate for Inter-Services Intelligence in Islamabad of plotting the bombings.

"We have solved the July 11 bombings case," Anami Narayan Roy, the police chief of Mumbai, said during a televised news conference. "The whole attack was planned by Pakistan's I.S.I. and carried out by Lashkar-e-Taiba and their operatives in India."

Within hours, the Pakistani Foreign Office issued a statement calling Mr. Roy's comments irresponsible and baseless.

"This statement, like those made immediately after the Mumbai bomb blasts, contains unsubstantiated allegations, which the Indian officials and media keep making for propaganda purposes," the Pakistani statement said.

India almost always blames Pakistan for terrorist attacks on its soil, and Pakistan almost always denies the allegations, expressing frustration with India's refusal to share hard evidence dealing with the attacks.

The latest accusation complicates a recent initiative to rescue the India-Pakistan peace process, which stalled in mutual recriminations after the blasts. Relations improved earlier this month when the two countries agreed in Havana to resume talks and to create a joint mechanism for combating terrorism in the region.

"The antiterror mechanism is obviously not going to take off, especially now that this Mumbai statement has come out," said Kanchan Lakshman, a terrorism analyst at the Institute for Conflict Management in New Delhi. "I think they'll go back to how it was pre-Havana."

Terrorism remains a major stumbling block between the nuclear-armed rivals, which have fought three wars and stood at the cusp of a fourth in 2002. India accuses Pakistan of fomenting terrorism. Pakistan has long said that it provides moral support to those fighting for an Indian withdrawal from Kashmir but that it rejects violence.

Navtej Sarna, the Indian Foreign Ministry spokesman, said in a telephone interview from South Africa that it was too early to judge the fallout of the police statement.

Parvinder Singh Pasricha, the police chief of Maharashtra State, which contains Mumbai, formerly Bombay, said in a telephone interview late Saturday that the accusations by the police had been cleared with and corroborated by India's national intelligence agencies.

The charge comes days after President Bush used a White House dinner to try to make peace between General Musharraf and President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan, who accuses Pakistani intelligence of letting the Taliban resurface in Afghanistan.

Moreover, this past week, the BBC reported on a document, said to have been written by a military research institute sponsored by Britain, accusing Pakistan's security services of playing a dual role by fighting and abetting militants.

Indian Official Accuses Pakistan In July Attacks (WP/AP)

By Ramola Talwar Badam, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Spy Agency Seen Behind Mumbai Blasts

MUMBAI, Sept. 30 -- The police officer leading the investigation into train bombings that killed more than 200 people in the Indian city of Mumbai in July accused Pakistan's spy agency on Saturday of engineering the attack.

Tariq Azim, Pakistan's minister of state for information, denied the claim, calling it "sad and unfortunate."

"We reject this allegation, and demand that India should provide us any evidence, if they have," Azim said.

Mumbai Police Commissioner A.N. Roy said an intensive investigation that included using truth serum on suspects revealed that Pakistan's top spy agency had "masterminded" the bombings.

Roy said Pakistan's Directorate for Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI, began planning the attacks in March and later provided training in Bahawalpur, Pakistan, to those who carried out the bombings.

"The terror plot was ISI-sponsored and executed by Lashkar-e-Taiba operatives with help from the Students Islamic Movement of India," Roy said at a news conference in Mumbai, formerly known as Bombay, to announce the completion of the investigation.

Lashkar is a Pakistan-based Islamic militant group; the Students Islamic Movement of India, or SIMI, is a banned group.

So far 15 people have been arrested, including 11 Pakistanis, Roy said, adding that three Indians were still on the run and another Pakistani was killed in one of the blasts.

The July 11 attacks involved seven bombs that ripped through suburban trains in Mumbai, India's financial and entertainment capital, killing at least 207 people and injuring 700.

Pakistan has in the past denied involvement in the attacks, and it was not immediately clear how Roy's remarks would affect the fragile peace process between the nuclear-armed neighbors.

The Indian allegations came days after the BBC reported that a document prepared for Britain's Defense Ministry accused the ISI of indirectly supporting terrorist groups including al-Qaeda.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, strongly rejected the accusation, while the British Defense Ministry clarified that the leaked document was academic research and did not represent the government's view.

Roy gave a detailed description of how the explosives were transported into India and by whom. He also described how the bombs were packed into pressure cookers and placed on the trains.

Roy said some of the Pakistanis slipped into India by going over the two countries' shared border, while others went through neighboring Nepal and Bangladesh. There they were met by Indians who brought them to Mumbai and housed them in rented apartments, he said.

Police cracked the case after tracking down a suspicious call from Mumbai to the Nepali border region, Roy said. There they picked up one of the suspects, who led them to others.

Roy said many of the suspects had been trained to resist interrogation and only the use of truth serum helped tie up loose ends.

Karzai, Musharraf To Lead Tribal Talks (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, October 1, 2006

President Hamid Karzai said on Saturday that he and the Pakistani president will jointly lead a series of tribal gatherings along their countries' shared border to quell attacks on Afghanistan by Pakistan-based Taliban rebels.

Karzai said he wants an end to the Taliban incursions from Pakistan. The number of attacks in the Afghan border regions has tripled following a peace agreement between the Pakistani government and pro-Taliban tribesmen in its territory, according to U.S. officials.

"We're waiting to see how this peace deal works out. So far it hasn't been fruitful for Afghanistan," Karzai said.

Karzai appears to have been unable to secure Pakistan's immediate cooperation in shutting down radical religious schools or arresting Taliban leaders living in Pakistan.

Radical elements in some Islamic schools, also known as madrassas, have been blamed for indoctrinating suicide bombers and anti-government fighters who have stepped up attacks in Afghanistan in recent months. Hours before Karzai spoke Saturday, a suicide bomber blew himself up in a crowd near Afghanistan's Interior Ministry, killing at least 12 people.

"Unless we target the madrassas and their preaching of hatred against Islam and humanity, we won't be successful," Karzai said.

DOJ_NMG_0072634

A U.S. military officer said on Wednesday that the cease-fire that began June 25, cemented by the signing of a peace accord Sept. 5, allowed the Taliban to use the North Waziristan border area to plan and carrying out attacks in Afghanistan.

Pakistani tribal elders brokered the truce between Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf's government and militants, ending years of unrest in the tribal region.

Karzai played down suggestions that relations between Pakistan and Afghanistan had cooled because of his bickering with Musharraf. The pair, who met with President Bush on Wednesday, conspicuously refused to shake hands in front of the press on the White House lawn.

"Relations with my brother Musharraf are never cool," Karzai said. "Afghanistan wants stability and brotherly relations between both countries."

Karzai said he and Musharraf would attend a series of jirgas, or consultative councils, with tribal elders and governors focused on the Afghan border provinces of Nangahar and Paktika and Pakistan's autonomous tribal region, North Waziristan.

The two presidents will seek ways to employ armed tribesmen on both sides of the border to stabilize the region and cut down on insurgent raids, Karzai said.

Cease-Fire Called By Group Of Kurdish Guerrillas In Turkey (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

ANKARA, Turkey, Sept. 30 (AP) — A Kurdish guerrilla group declared a new unilateral cease-fire in its war for autonomy in Turkey's southeast on Saturday, heeding a call from its imprisoned leader, a pro-Kurdish news agency said.

The Kurdistan Workers Party, or P.K.K., said the cease-fire would take effect on Sunday "in the hopes of starting a democratic process for the solution of the Kurdish problem," the pro-Kurdish Firat news agency said on its Web site.

The group said its fighters would not use arms unless attacked by the Turkish Army, Firat said.

The Turkish government has ignored previous cease-fires by the group, saying it does not negotiate with terrorists. Military commanders have vowed to fight until all rebels are killed or surrender.

The cease-fire announcement was made three days after the rebels' imprisoned leader, Abdullah Ocalan, appealed for a new cease-fire after guerrilla attacks against civilians and foreign tourists had drawn global criticism.

On Saturday, a Turkish soldier was killed and another was injured when they stepped on a mine believed to have been planted by Kurdish guerrillas in southeastern Turkey, the Dogan news agency reported. The incident occurred in the Hakkari province, bordering Iran and Iraq, it said.

A surge of rebel violence has killed more than a dozen soldiers and policemen in recent weeks. Militants believed to be linked to the rebels also have bombed tourist resorts, killing three tourists and wounding more than a dozen.

Mr. Ocalan's appeal followed American pledges of support in cracking down on the P.K.K., which is listed as a terrorist organization by the United States and the European Union.

The rebel conflict has claimed the lives of 37,000 people since the guerrillas took up arms in 1984.

Last year, the guerrilla group declared a cease-fire, but the truce lasted little more than a month. The rebels said the government failed to recognize their group and was maintaining its military drive against its members.

The P.K.K.'s longest unilateral cease-fire was declared after Mr. Ocalan's capture in 1999 and lasted five years.

Uneasy Lies The Severed Head (NYT)

By Christopher Caldwell

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

IT takes a lot to shock a vanguard theater audience in Berlin. The Deutsche Oper production of Mozart's "Idomeneo" adds a scene in which the decapitated heads of Poseidon, Jesus, Buddha and Muhammad are pulled from a bloody sack and propped on chairs — and it is meant to provoke.

When the director, Hans Neuenfels, staged the opera in 2003, though, the outrage was muted. That was before last winter's "cartoon affair," in which caricatures of Muhammad in a Danish newspaper led to several days of rioting and arson in the Muslim world, and protests in Europe.

Mr. Neuenfels's production was scheduled to reopen at the Deutsche Oper next month. But acting on an anonymous call from a worried operagoer, the Berlin police made an assessment that staging the opera would constitute a "risk with incalculable consequences." In German as in English, incalculable can mean two things. It can mean too high to reckon, or it can mean your guess is as good as mine. The Deutsche Oper's artistic director, Kirsten Harms, took it in the former sense. On Monday, she announced that "Idomeneo" would be struck from the fall schedule.

DOJ_NMG_0072635

The condemnation was immediate and widespread. The leader of the parliamentary caucus of the Christian Social Union, the conservative Bavarian party, described Ms. Harms's decision as "nothing but pure cowardice." On the left, the Green Party's culture spokeswoman accused her of a pre-emptive "capitulation." Wolfgang Schäuble, the Christian Democratic interior minister who has spent recent months working with Muslim leaders to create an assimilable "German Islam," promised to ask Ms. Harms "whether she had gone crazy."

At a conference on Islam that Mr. Schäuble held on Wednesday, many of the country's top Muslim personalities called for the opera to be performed as planned. As the week ended, the clamor to reinstate the opera looked as if it would soon be irresistible.

What is it that Germans are rallying around so single-mindedly? If it is free speech, then that would imply a national shift. Germans value free speech, of course, and nowhere more so than in the artistic realm. They deploy sex (think of Fassbinder's movies) and gore (think of Joseph Beuys's performance-art pieces with dead animals) in ways bound to strike many Americans as gratuitous. But for understandable historical reasons, they are also unusually sensitive about hate speech.

This is not Denmark, for instance, where Louis-Ferdinand Céline was allowed to spout his fascism after World War II and where, in our own time, intolerant ranting tends to be ignored more than repressed. Germany is a country where you cannot, by law, glorify the Nazis or deny the Holocaust. Expression that tramples on the sensibilities of vulnerable minorities usually gives Germans, at the very least, pause.

The absence of any such pause is one of the distinctive features of the opera affair. Those who urged that people put themselves in Ms. Harms's shoes did so on the grounds of risk analysis, not on the grounds that demeaning religious symbols might be a bad idea. And this seems part of an emerging pattern.

After Pope Benedict XVI said he regretted any offense given by his lecture at the University of Regensburg in Germany — in which he cited the claims of a medieval text that Islam had brought little new besides conquest by the sword — many in the German press, including Michael Naumann, a former culture minister who publishes Die Zeit, argued that he had been too quick to apologize. Monika Griefahn, cultural spokeswoman for the Social Democratic Party, said of the opera cancellation: "If we're weighing security questions against artistic freedom, I have to ask myself if the fundamentalists haven't already won." Jörg Königsdorf, opera critic for the center-left newspaper Süddeutsche Zeitung, noted that the scene with the four severed heads would have constituted "an ideal litmus test for the different potential for aggression among the world's religions."

The clamor cannot simply be chalked up to constitutional vigilance about free speech, because the threat to free speech was not a constitutional one. The state was willing to provide protection if threats proved credible. What it could not do, though, is supply artists and cultural institutions with a sense of steely purpose. In some quarters, inside and outside Germany, there was a mood of having been let down by the German cultural establishment, which is heavily subsidized and seen as pampered, particularly in the opera world. (Among them, the three Berlin opera houses receive roughly as much government financing — just over $125 million — as the National Endowment for the Arts in the United States.)

The British political commentator and opera enthusiast Martin Kettle, not an admirer of Mr. Neuenfels's school of interpretation, wrote in a Guardian blog that it would be a shame if "Idomeneo" were "to acquire a controversial reputation merely because of a 21st-century director's misdirected ego." And in the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, Eleonore Büning wrote that it would be irresponsible to cancel the opera out of fear, "even if the production were stupid, silly, unoriginal, ignorant or, indeed, offensive."

The "opera affair" suggests that fear of Islam has lodged itself deeply in the minds of a lot of Westerners. Ms. Harms and the investigators she listened to are among them. This fear is not always irrational but not always based on real things, either. People often talk about the "specter" of Islamic violence. It was just that — a specter, rather than violence itself or any specific threat — that led to last week's cancellation. What made the German media and the broader public turn so suddenly on Ms. Harms was a kind of collective embarrassment. Germany has as much reason as other Western countries to worry about Islamist excesses. But the last half century has given it more experience in policing the fears inside its national subconscious.

US In Final Stages Of Installing Missile Defense System In Japan (AFP)

AFP, October 1, 2006

The US military has entered the final stage of installing an advanced surface-to-air missile defense system in southern Japan, amid mounting concern over North Korea's missile launches.

The first batch of equipment for the Patriot Advanced Capability-3 (PAC-3) system was unloaded Saturday at a military port on Okinawa island, amid protests from a handful of anti-war activists, press reports said.

The operation was part of a move to relocate an air defense battalion with some 600 soldiers to the Kadena US air force base in Okinawa from Fort Bliss in Texas. The battalion is equipped with 24 (PAC-3) missiles.

DOJ_NMG_0072636

Under an agreement reached with Tokyo last July on realigning US forces in Japan, the US will deploy PAC-3 missile interceptors at its bases in Japan and make them operational as soon as possible.

Television footage Saturday showed trucks and containers being unloaded from a US-chartered freighter which anchored at the port late Friday.

The Kyodo news agency, quoting US military sources, reported that the PAC-3 system itself was scheduled to arrive in Okinawa within two weeks.

The US plans to begin partial operation of the PAC-3 system by the end of December and become fully operational by the end of next March, Kyodo said.

At the US forces headquarters in Tokyo and at the Kadena base, noone was available to confirm the reports.

The land-based PAC-3, together with the projected sea-based Standard Missile 3 (SM-3), will make up a two-phased advanced anti-missile shield.

The SM-3 intercepts ballistic missiles when they reach their highest point outside of the atmosphere, while the PAC-3 is used to destroy missiles that evade SM-3 interceptions. The accuracy of these systems is still being debated.

SM-3s, jointly developed by the two countries, will be based on destroyers equipped with the state-of-the-art Aegis air-defence system.

The missile-defence project has been a pillar of the strengthened Japan-US military alliance in recent years.

Japan was prompted to boost its missile defenses in cooperation with the United States in 1998 when North Korea lobbed a suspected long-range missile over its main island and into the Pacific.

North Korea's July 5 firing of seven missiles into the Sea of Japan (East Sea) also fueled the drive for the joint missile scheme.

On Tuesday, the US military activated a powerful new missile defense radar at Camp Shariki in the north of the main Japanese island of Honshu.

The so-called X-Band Radar Transportable (FBX-T) is part of a network of forward deployed missile defense sensors that also includes US Aegis destroyers.

U.S. Defense Gear Said To Arrive In Asia (AP)

AP, October 1, 2006

Heavy vehicles and other equipment related to the upcoming deployment of advanced Patriot interceptor missiles at American bases on southern Okinawa island arrived in Japan on Saturday, news reports said.

The equipment arrived amid lingering concerns about North Korea's missile program. Pyongyang test-fired seven missiles in early July that fell harmlessly into the Sea of Japan. The tests prompted Japan to impose sanctions on North Korea and brought international condemnation.

Japan and the U.S. later that month announced a plan to deploy Patriot Advanced Capability-3 interceptor missiles on Okinawa. The U.S. government will have the missiles operational by the end of the year, and will station more than 600 troops on the island to support them, according to Japan's Foreign Ministry.

Equipment related to the Patriots' deployment arrived at a military port in Naha, Okinawa, Saturday morning, public broadcaster NHK and the Kyodo News agency reported.

The equipment includes vehicles that will be used to transport the Patriot missiles, which are expected to arrive in the next two weeks, Kyodo said, citing U.S. military officials.

U.S. military officials did not immediately respond to phone messages and an e-mail Saturday. Japanese military officials were not immediately available to comment.

The missile deployment will be the latest in a series of steps undertaken by the U.S. and Japan to beef up regional missile defense.

Earlier this week, the U.S. military activated a high-powered "X-Band" radar outpost in northern Japan that is a key part of a joint missile defense shield and meant to track ballistic missiles in the region.

The U.S. in late August replaced a guided missile cruiser stationed at Yokosuka near Tokyo with the USS Shiloh, a cruiser equipped with Aegis technology geared toward tracking and shooting down enemy missiles.

In Thailand, A New Model For Militants? (LAT)

By John M. Glionna, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Muslim separatists' relentless low-level attacks on civilians are taking a heavy toll, but the campaign is largely unnoticed by the West.

DOJ_NMG_0072637

HAT YAI, Thailand — The bomb that exploded outside New Cherry Ancient Massage was among the most sinister kinds — a lethal sucker punch timed to detonate moments after two other blasts had lured onlookers into the streets of this tourist town.

The homemade device, hidden in a motorcycle parked outside the busy parlor, killed five people, including a Canadian teacher and three masseuses.

All 30 surviving massage workers quit on the spot. Within days, the parents of the three dead women came to take their daughters' bodies home.

"One father asked, 'Why my child? She was a good girl,' " said New Cherry owner Boonchai Sangmankung. "And I couldn't answer him. I don't know myself. Why do the attacks continue? Why are more innocent people killed every day?"

Since 2004, militants in Thailand's predominantly Muslim south have waged a bloody separatist insurgency against the cultural elite of this largely Buddhist nation, targeting teachers, monks, community leaders and government officials. So far, 1,700 people have been killed, yet the campaign of almost-daily bombings, arson attacks, kidnappings and assassinations has gone largely unnoticed in a Western world fixated on higher-profile Islamic terrorism campaigns in Iraq and elsewhere.

"The violence in southern Thailand is quite significant compared to many other world conflicts today," said Panitan Wattanayagorn, a political scientist at Chulalongkorn University in Bangkok. "The U.S. lost 3,000 soldiers in three years in Iraq. This death toll is not far behind."

International terrorism experts are keeping a close eye on southern Thailand's guerrilla war, believing that the attacks could become a blueprint for small insurgencies in the post9/11 world. The strategy of incessant low-level attacks against civilians could be imitated by other regional militants, they say.

Experts also fear that the insurgents could soon be joined by international terrorists slipping across Thailand's porous borders, bringing money, expertise and manpower.

"It's important that this regional war not escalate," said John Brandon, director of the Asia Foundation's international relations program. "The world cannot afford this war to become ripe for outside terror influences to take advantage of it."

A recent State Department report concluded that there was no evidence of any connection between the militants and global terrorist groups such as Al Qaeda or Jemaah Islamiah, based in Southeast Asia.

"There is concern, however, that these groups may attempt to capitalize on an increasingly violent situation for their own purposes," the report stated.

Under Thai rule since 1902, Pattani, Narathiwat and Yala, the three Muslim-dominated provinces at the heart of the violence, are distinct from the rest of Thailand. The people speak a different language — a Malay dialect — and observe a strict Muslim lifestyle not far from the jet-set crowd sprawled on the sandy beaches of Phuket, a draw for U.S. and European tourists.

Many Muslim residents still chafe over what they consider a century of abusive rule. But experts differ over the roots of the insurgency. Some say it's a battle over religious freedom, others say it's a fight for territory and self-rule. Still others say it's both.

But the tensions have filled daily life in Thailand's south with newfound risks — walking children to school, shopping in an outdoor market, driving at night.

In the first six months of 2006, two people died every day, on average: A Buddhist teacher was gunned down in front of his fourth-grade class by men dressed as students. A salesman was beheaded outside a crowded teashop. The owner of an elephant troupe was shot seven times by assailants who had lined up with children to buy tickets for a show.

In August, 22 small bombs exploded nearly simultaneously in banks throughout southern Yala province, killing one person and bringing commerce to a standstill. Two months earlier, 50 bombs went off in a single day at government offices and police stations.

Last year, 15 militants stormed a Buddhist temple and hacked two monks to death before setting fire to their bodies. Thai officials believe that 30,000 Buddhists have fled the south since the attack. Insurgents also have targeted fellow Muslims suspected of conspiring with a military known for its brutality in dealing with the Islamic militants.

For their part, Thai officials claim to be fighting a ghost insurgency: The killers don't issue claims of responsibility for their acts. Officials have little clue about the identity of the attackers. About 20,000 troops in the region have yet to arrest any insurgency leaders.

"The nation's best military intelligence concedes we are waging a war on ghosts," said Srisompob Jitpiromsri, a political scientist at Prince of Songkla University. "We don't have a clue as to who their leaders are or what they want."

Terrorism experts believe that the insurgency is led by a coalition of regional groups, including the National Revolutionary Front Coordinate and the Pattani United Liberation Organization, or PULO, which are vying for control of the region.

The two groups have developed cells in most southern villages and have their pick of disenfranchised youths eager to take part in the violence. But neither claims to control all of the region's militants, saying that religious splinter groups, warlords and business and political rivalries also play a role in the attacks.

"People on the street may know who is responsible, they may even know them, but everyone is too afraid to say anything aloud, or even speak in private about the attacks," Srisompob said. "That, to me, is the mark of a successful insurgency."

Mahkota Kasturi, a PULO foreign affairs spokesman in exile in Sweden, said Thai officials "know who we are and where we are, but they are reluctant to come to the table. Perhaps they do not feel they need to negotiate with so-called terrorists."

Experts say the militants eventually want to create an autonomous Muslim state in southern Thailand, where residents have long complained of being treated as second-class citizens, enduring the erosion of their language and culture. None of the three southern provinces, where Muslims make up 80% of the 1.8 million residents, has ever had a Muslim governor, they point out.

Mahkota said separatists seek to disrupt Thai society as a way to win freedom. "The killings and the violence will continue until we reach our goal — and that is independence," he said.

Former Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra, deposed last month in a coup, had recently struck hard against the insurgents, imposing martial law that brought allegations of torture and counter-assassinations.

In 2004, nearly 200 Muslims were killed by security forces. First, 32 militants died during the storming of a mosque in April. Six months later, a military crackdown on a demonstration against martial law at a regional police station killed scores. Seventy-eight men suffocated after being stacked five-deep into sweltering army trucks.

Thaksin has been replaced by Gen. Sondhi Boonyaratkalin, a Muslim who has pushed for a more conciliatory stance toward the insurgents. But within a week of the coup, attacks had killed four people and injured more than a dozen.

Experts doubt that the regime change will bring peace.

"If anything, they may step up attacks in an attempt to provoke a heavy-handed government response," said Zachary Abuza, a terrorism expert who has written a soon-to-be published book on the Thai insurgency. "The secessionist agenda operates on a time frame that you and I don't understand. For them, 30 years is not a long time."

The scope of the violence has widened since 2004. At first targeting civil servants, soldiers and police officers, militants soon included restaurants and businesses serving the military. Then monks and teachers came under fire; the death toll now stands at 49 teachers and six monks. Many attacks have been staged by men using motorcycles for quick escape. Bombs are usually detonated by cellphone.

Insurgents have made teaching the most dangerous job in southern Thailand.

In July, while his fourth-graders looked on, Prasarn Martchu was shot in the back as he stood at his blackboard instructing a morning class at a rural school in Narathiwat province.

Principal Adul Jekyeng said Prasarn had taught for 25 years and was a leader in the local teachers union. He said four men rode up on motorcycles and passed several classrooms before they found Prasarn.

"He never saw his killers," Adul said. "They shot an unarmed teacher in the back. He had no gun, no weapon, only a piece of chalk."

Educators say teachers are seen by insurgents as authority figures and targeted because they are easy to find. Many, such as Phairat Saengthong, are fighting back.

The regional school director recently flew to Bangkok to buy a 9-millimeter pistol.

"This is the model the U.S. soldiers carry," he said proudly, pointing the weapon around the room.

"Today, 90% of male teachers carry guns such as this, and even 30% of the women, which shows how fearful we have become. I may be a Buddhist, but now I too carry a gun. And I am not afraid to use it."

Sitting cross-legged on the floor of her home in a rural village in Pattani province, Chitra Ngen-Moon said she felt trapped in the crossfire between rebels and soldiers.

Her 29-year-old son, Anek, was killed last year. Friends found his beheaded body soon after he disappeared while on his rounds as the local tax collector. He is one of 10 men who have been killed in the village of 400 residents.

Holding a photo of her son, the 70-year-old woman vowed that one day she would know who was responsible.

"When all of this violence is over, I want to know who cut off the head of my son," she said. "I want to see these barbaric people with my own eyes. But I am an old woman. Now I am too afraid to ask questions."

Nearby, at the Krue Se mosque in Pattani, site of the deadly 2004 storming by the military, Haji Niseng Nilaeh said he did not approve of the violence being waged by either side.

"Every day, people die — it makes me unhappy," said the 77-year-old Muslim elder, dressed in a traditional tunic and sarong. "But the insurgents are not only killing Buddhists, they are killing fellow Muslims now as well. No one is safe."

Russia Puts Base Closures On Ice (LAT)

By David Holley

DOJ_NMG_0072639

The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

MOSCOW — The Russian military Saturday suspended the closure of its two military bases in the former Soviet republic of Georgia, saying it was acting to protect its citizens there as relations between the two countries spiraled downward in the midst of a spy scandal.

Russia reacted angrily to the arrest Wednesday of five Russian military officers. Four of the Russians have been ordered held for two months while investigations continue; the fifth was released Thursday for lack of evidence. Ten Georgian citizens also were detained.

Georgian authorities have demanded the hand-over of a sixth officer, believed to have taken refuge in Russia's military headquarters in Tbilisi, the Georgian capital. Police have cordoned off the compound, saying they will neither storm the headquarters, which is protected by diplomatic immunity, nor allow the officer to escape. The Russian military has denied that Lt. Col. Konstantin Pichugin is at the compound.

Meanwhile, Russia has been evacuating nonessential diplomats and their families. Ivan Volynkin, a top official at the Russian Embassy in Tbilisi, told Russian news agency RIA Novosti on Saturday that only two diplomats and several security guards would remain.

Alexander Baranov, commander of Russian forces in a southern region that borders Georgia, said Saturday at a news conference in Rostov-on-Don that the base closures were being suspended because Georgia's actions meant the safety of Russian personnel there could not be guaranteed.

Baranov also said that Russia would prevent Georgian authorities from entering any Russian military facility to apprehend suspected spies.

"The order has been given that any attempts by strangers to enter the garrisons' territories be prevented, if necessary, by force," Baranov said. "There is no question of handing over any alleged spies. These are Russian citizens, and any problem should be resolved through dialogue rather than through police escapades."

Russia and Georgia issued a joint statement in May 2005 in which Russia promised to close the two Soviet-era bases by 2008. One of the facilities is in the Black Sea region of Adzharia; the other is in southern Georgia near the border with Armenia.

Salome Zourabichvili, who was Georgia's foreign minister when the accord was reached, said at the time that the statement was not legally binding but that it was "politically binding." The Russian parliament has not ratified a separate protocol implementing the agreement.

Russia also has bases for peacekeeping forces in two breakaway regions of Georgia: Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which border Russia. Tbilisi accuses those units of siding with separatist leaders ruling the two regions, and it wants them gone.

Since his election in 2004 after a nonviolent people's revolt dubbed the Rose Revolution, Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili has sought to reassert the country's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Using military threats and encouraged by local protests, he quickly won back control of Adzharia. In recent months, he has stepped up pressure on the other two regions.

Moscow has charged that Georgia wants Russian troops gone so it can retake the breakaway areas by force before applying for NATO membership.

Under Saakashvili, Georgia has made joining the North Atlantic Treaty Organization a top priority. It says it wants to achieve reunification peacefully.

Many observers believe that the long-term goal of the separatists in Abkhazia and South Ossetia is to merge with Russia. Russian officials deny having any designs on Georgian territory.

The Russian ambassador to Georgia, Vyacheslav Kovalenko, was recalled to Moscow in protest of the arrests, and he told reporters upon his arrival here Friday that the spying charges had "no solid basis at all."

Kovalenko dismissed the significance of videotape that allegedly shows the Russian and Georgian detainees conspiring.

Georgian Interior Minister Vano Merabishvili released the video Thursday. It also shows an exchange of money.

Chirac Urges Turks To Recognize Genocide (NYT)

By Agence France-presse

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

YEREVAN, Armenia, Sept. 30 (Agence France-Presse) — French President Jacques Chirac on Saturday urged Turkey to recognize World War I-era massacres of Armenians as genocide if it wants to join the European Union.

Mr. Chirac spoke at a news conference during a visit to Yerevan, the Armenian capital. His remarks are likely to irritate Turkey and further strain its relations with France.

DOJ_NMG_0072640

Until now, France had refused to make a direct link between the genocide and Turkey's bid for membership in the European Union. The bloc has not made it a condition of entry.

Asked if he thought Turkey should recognize the 1915 massacres as genocide before it joins the European Union, the French president replied, "Honestly, I believe so."

Armenia's president, Robert Kocharian, spoke respectfully about Turkey's aspirations to join the European Union.

"We don't see any danger in this process, but we would like that our interests would be discussed in the process too," he said.

Armenians: EU Wrong On Turkey (WT)

By Andrew Borowiec

The Washington Times, October 1, 2006

NICOSIA, Cyprus -- The Armenian quest for Turkey's admission that it massacred ethnic Armenians nearly a century ago has suffered a setback with an EU decision to drop the historic "guilt clause" as a requirement for EU membership.

The European Parliament's action last week was merely consultative, but nonetheless was seen as a considerable blow to Armenian hopes.

A member of the Armenian diaspora in Cyprus said the community would never give up its struggle to obtain international recognition of "genocide" applying to the World War I deaths of more than 1 million Turkish Armenians, starved, shot or bayoneted during a forced "resettlement" march across the desert to Syria.

Some Armenians feel that the dropping of the proposed precondition paragraph by the EU parliamentarians was influenced by governments pushing for Muslim Turkey's EU membership.

Canada's reference to the Armenian "genocide" and the French plan to penalize those who deny it caused a crisis earlier this year in relations between the two countries and Turkey.

The issue appeared to have been shelved after Turkey threatened "irreparable damage," particularly in its relations with France, Turkey's major economic partner but also home to an influential Armenian diaspora of more than 200,000.

Turkey has systematically rejected efforts to blame it for the massacres perpetrated by the collapsing Ottoman regime that preceded modern Turkey.

Ankara's official version is that some 300,000 Armenians died in 1915-17 because of war, disease, famine and ethnic conflict rather than as a result of any policy of ethnic extermination.

Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has described efforts to add the admission of Turkish guilt into official membership requirements as a violation of EU rules.

"We do not ask for privileges from the EU, but putting forward new criteria is unacceptable to us," Mr. Erdogan said recently.

Ottoman Turkey, at war with Russia during World War I, accused its Armenian community of pro-Russian sympathies and of acting as the enemy's "fifth column."

The international campaign for admission of Turkey's guilt is spearheaded by the Armenian diaspora of some 2 million rather than by the former Soviet republic of Armenia with a population of more than 3 million.

Serbian Parliament OKs New Constitution (AP)

By Jovana Gec

AP, October 1, 2006

Serbia's parliament approved a new constitution Saturday declaring U.N.-run Kosovo part of the Balkan state despite ongoing negotiations on the breakaway province's future.

The hastily drafted constitution — agreed after a few weeks of consultation — is designed to underscore Serbia's opposition to possible independence for Kosovo as the result of the U.N.-brokered talks on the province's future.

Kosovo formally is a province of Serbia. But Belgrade has had no authority over the separatist region since a 1999 NATO bombing forced it to end a crackdown against the ethnic Albanian rebels and pull out its forces.

The 242 lawmakers at the session unanimously voted in favor of the constitution that will replace the current one drafted in 1990 by the autocratic leader at the time, Slobodan Milosevic.

The new constitution also needs a "yes" vote in a national referendum before it becomes valid. The parliament later voted to hold the referendum Oct. 28-29.

"This is a historic day," declared Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica. He said the new constitution will "cement the truth that Kosovo always has been and always will be an integral part of Serbia."

DOJ_NMG_0072641

The constitution also will define Serbia as an independent state for the first time since the breakup of Yugoslavia in the early 1990s.

Pro-Western President Boris Tadic said the constitution will define Serbia as a "modern, European state."

Several hundred government critics rallied in front of the parliament building during the session to protest against the new constitution, saying that it will jeopardize Serbia's future by declaring Kosovo its own. The protesters, led by the opposition Liberal Democratic Party, announced a campaign for a referendum boycott.

International negotiators have said they want to conclude the talks by the end of the year on Kosovo's future, and there have been increasing signs that Kosovo will be granted some form of independence.

Inclusion of Kosovo in the new Serbian constitution will effectively rule out Belgrade's consent to Kosovo's secession as demanded by its ethnic Albanian majority.

The urgency in bringing the constitution is widely seen as a face-saving effort by Kostunica, who is facing a government crisis and a possible walkout of a key coalition member.

The liberal G17 Party has threatened to leave the Cabinet by Sunday over Serbia's failure to arrest top war crimes suspect Ratko Mladic and resume pre-entry talks with the European Union.

The new constitution defines Serbia as the country of the Serb people and its other citizens, grants protection of human and minority rights, and gives a form of self-rule to the northern province of Vojvodina.

Chavez: Assassination Attempt Foiled (AP)

By Natalie Obiko Pearson

AP, October 1, 2006

President Hugo Chavez, who has repeatedly spoken of various plots on his life, said Saturday a sniper with a long-range gun and a motorcycle to escape on had planned to shoot him as he exited a helicopter on a recent trip to western Venezuela.

The incident allegedly occurred when Chavez visited the western oil-producing region of Zulia in June to inaugurate a refurbished fertilizer plant. Chavez appeared to link the plot to his main rival in upcoming presidential elections, Gov. Manuel Rosales of Zulia state, claiming that he is in constant danger from opponents seeking to get rid of him.

"The plan didn't work out for them — God is always present over there. But those responsible left for Colombia, and by the way, they were from the Zulia police," he said.

He did not elaborate further on the alleged plot.

Chavez has made other claims of assassination plots in the past, including a case involving 27 Colombians and three former Venezuelan military officers who were convicted last October by a military court for allegedly plotting to kill him.

His government also demanded that Bogota investigate allegations that surfaced in an influential Colombian magazine in April saying the country's secret police plotted to assassinate Chavez and other top Venezuelan officials. Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has denied the allegations.

Chavez has also accused the U.S. government of secretly backing his opponents in the Dec. 3 elections and recently claimed that President Bush may be seeking to kill him after he called the U.S. leader "the devil" at the United Nations General Assembly.

"For sure, one walks around risking one's life ... We're being threatened with death by the (U.S.) empire," he said.

U.S.-Venezuela ties sharply deteriorated after the Bush administration swiftly recognized leaders who ousted Chavez in a 2002 coup before the Venezuelan returned to power amid a popular uprising.

Chavez has claimed before that the U.S. government is out to kill him and invade his country. U.S. officials deny that but criticize Chavez as a destabilizing force in Latin America.

Brazil Heads To Polls In Shadow Of Yet Another Scandal (NYT)

By Larry Rohter

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, Sept. 30 — With yet another ethics and corruption scandal lapping at President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva's door, Brazilians will be asked to decide Sunday whether he is worthy of a second term.

A 60-year-old former factory worker and labor union leader, Mr. da Silva has been leading in polls and seems assured of finishing first by a comfortable margin in the initial round of balloting.

The drama surrounding Sunday's vote stems from uncertainty as to whether the president, made vulnerable by an unpleasant "September Surprise" involving some of his closest aides, will obtain the majority he needs to avoid a runoff.

A distant second in the polls is Geraldo Alckmin of the Brazilian Social Democratic Party, a 53-year-old doctor and former governor of Brazil's largest state, São Paulo.

DOJ_NMG_0072642

Two other candidates — former allies of Mr. da Silva — are now positioned to his left: Heloísa Helena de Moraes of the Party of Socialism and Liberty and Cristovam Buarque of the Democratic Labor Party. A range of polls have consistently shown them with a total of about 10 percent of the vote.

At a news conference for foreign correspondents here on Tuesday, Mr. Alckmin acknowledged his underdog status but argued that a runoff would be inevitable because of growing voter disgust with the new scandal and what he called "the corrosion of the president's credibility."

"The second round is another election altogether," he said, in which Mr. da Silva's high "rejection index" will be a factor. "In the first round I vote for who I want, while in the second round I vote against who I don't want."

Elected four years ago on a clean government platform, Mr. da Silva has instead presided over corruption scandals from buying votes in Congress to kickbacks on ambulances and postal contracts. The scandals have prompted resignations of his chief of staff and finance minister and the Workers' Party president, treasurer and secretary general.

Still, until mid-September, Mr. da Silva seemed likely to cruise to a first-round victory.

But then operatives of the Workers' Party, which Mr. da Silva founded in 1980 and still leads, were caught trying to pay $792,000 in cash for a dossier they apparently thought would incriminate Mr. Alckmin's party in a corruption scandal. Up to now, that scandal, at the Health Ministry, has mainly involved Mr. da Silva's party. As a result, Mr. da Silva's campaign manager stepped down.

Mr. da Silva has been a presidential candidate in every popular election since a right-wing military dictatorship ended in 1985. Running initially on the hard left, he lost in 1989, 1994 and 1998, but then shifted toward the Social Democratic views of his opponents and won a landslide victory in a runoff in 2002, with more than 60 percent of the vote.

Nearly 126 million people are registered to vote here, the world's fourth-largest democracy. Voting is obligatory for all citizens between the ages of 18 and 70, but disillusionment and anger, especially among idealistic young voters, over corruption have led to concerns that some voters will cast blank or spoiled ballots — or even stay home, at the cost of a small fine.

Political analysts are unanimous in agreeing that Mr. da Silva wants at all costs to avoid a runoff, which would be held Oct. 29.

Each day the Brazilian press is full of new reports that incriminate his closest associates and let his rivals raise the question of the president's knowledge of or involvement in skullduggery that Marco Aurélio de Mello, the chief justice of the Electoral Tribunal, calls "worse than Watergate."

Mr. da Silva has responded by simultaneously accusing the opposition of seeking to achieve through undemocratic means what it cannot achieve at the ballot box and vaguely acknowledging that some of those around him are responsible for what he calls an "insane" act of "barbarism."

At a campaign rally this week, Mr. da Silva even compared himself to Jesus Christ, saying that he too has been betrayed by disciples.

The campaign highlight was to be a debate by the four candidates here on Thursday night. Hours beforehand, however, Mr. da Silva announced he would not participate, complaining to organizers in a letter that "some adversaries" intended to transform the discussion "into an arena of insults and aggressions, in a game with cards that are marked" against him, the incumbent.

But Mr. da Silva's absence did not prevent his rivals from addressing a chair with his name next to it. "If the accusations are proven, will you resign?" asked Mr. Buarque, the president's first minister of education. "Are your supporters voting for you or for your vice president?"

Brazil Leader Slips In Polls Before Vote (AP)

By Alan Clendenning

AP, October 1, 2006

Brazil's first working-class president slipped in the polls on the eve of elections Sunday, indicating he may not win a convincing first-round victory but will instead be forced to campaign for another month amid spiraling corruption allegations against his party.

President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva, a poor farmer's son who became a radical union leader and has governed as a centrist, was considered a shoo-in earlier this week. But fresh polls on Saturday night showed him in danger of failing to win 50 percent of the vote, which would trigger a second round of voting on Oct. 29. Silva, known to all as Lula, is still favored to win in the second round.

Silva stunned the world by stabilizing the economy and bringing millions out of poverty without raising taxes as Brazil's first elected leftist leader. But the latest polls suggested a corruption scandal surrounding his party, which has erupted in the last few weeks, may be taking its toll on his popularity.

But Both the Ibope and the Datafolha polling institutes said Saturday night that Silva's lead decreased enough in recent days to raise the possibility of a runoff. Silva would get 49 percent of the valid votes, according to Ibope, while Datafolha said Silva would get 50 percent. Earlier this week, another poll showed Silva with 59 percent.

Ibope interviewed nearly 3,000 people in 200 cities Friday and Saturday. Datafolha surveyed more than 14,500 people in nearly 400 cities on the same days. Both polls had a margin of error of 2 percentage points.

The results came after Silva skipped a presidential debate Thursday that opened him up to criticism from his opponents.

Six members of Silva's Workers' Party, including an old friend who ran his personal security detail, face federal arrest warrants for their alleged roles in an effort to buy damaging information about political opponents.

Silva has not been directly implicated, but allegations are swirling that the Workers' Party tried to pay $770,000 for a dossier linking Sao Paulo gubernatorial candidate Jose Serra to graft when he was health minister between 1998 and 2002.

Accusations of political dirty tricks and illegal campaign spending forced Silva to fire his campaign manager days before the election.

Silva had no weekend campaign events planned before he votes Sunday in the Sao Paulo suburb where he gained fame leading strikes against Brazil's dictatorship in the 1970s and 1980s.

Media coverage, meanwhile, shifted to fears that all 155 people may have died aboard a passenger jet that crashed Friday in the Amazon jungle. Rescuers reached the remote site Saturday.

For the United States, Silva's re-election would be a mixed blessing.

He proclaims himself a friend of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and helped sink the U.S.-sponsored Free Trade Area of the Americas in a protest over lavish U.S. farm subsidies. At the U.N. General Assembly last month, Silva blasted the U.S.-led Iraq war, saying the money should be used to alleviate global poverty.

But unlike Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez, who used the assembly podium to call President Bush "the devil," Silva refrained from mentioning the United States or Bush by name.

Washington also wouldn't mind another four years of Silva because he is widely seen as a soothing influence on a continent where far-left sentiment is on the rise, said Michael Shifter, an analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue think tank.

"If Lula is a leftist, he is a leftist Washington can happily live with and even bolster," Shifter said.

On his first full day in office in January 2003, Silva had breakfast with Chavez and dinner with Castro, creating what Chavez termed the "axis of good" — a play on Bush's reference to North Korea, Iran and prewar Iraq as the "axis of evil."

But Silva has managed to distance himself sufficiently from the two to allay fears of radical change. His campaign has positioned him in the center against Geraldo Alckmin on his right — a business-friendly former Sao Paulo governor with poll numbers in the low 30s — and far-left candidate Sen. Heloisa Helena, who is expected to get less than 10 percent.

Alckmin attacked Silva over the corruption scandal in a last-minute Rio de Janeiro campaign stop Saturday, saying voters should choose him to rid Brazil of "this plague of corruption, and to have a government that works."

Despite the scandal, Silva remains popular because in the four years since he was elected in a landslide, life has certainly improved for the majority — more jobs, lower inflation and bigger benefits for the poor.

Silva's campaign theme — that he has proven he can reduce poverty — resonates from the urban slums of Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro to Brazil's impoverished northeast, where Silva was born.

"Zero Hunger," his expanded food stamp-like program, guarantees about $30 a month to virtually all poor families provided they vaccinate their children and keep them in school. It distributes $325 million a month to about a quarter of Brazil's 187 million people.

"He has done an excellent job in controlling inflation and improving the lives of the poor," said Anselmo de Souza, a 63-year-old retired metal worker in the Sao Paulo suburb where Silva rose through the union ranks. "I think the accusations that he is corrupt are lies made up by his enemies."

Alckmin says Silva has stifled growth with the high interest rates he deployed against inflation, and he uses the scandal to taunt the president's Workers' Party for having claimed to be the most ethical in Brazilian history.

Marisela dos Santos voted for Silva four years ago and feels betrayed.

"He may have improved the lives of the poor and stabilized the economy but his government is as infected with corruption as all the others," said the 32-year-old dental assistant. But she doubted anyone else would do better and remained undecided about her vote.

Silva's second-term priorities include reforming the tax and labor rules. But he'll likely be in defensive mode for months as election authorities investigate whether he had a role in the dirty tricks scandal and a center-right coalition led by Alckmin's party could end up controlling the Senate, where 27 of 81 seats are being contested.

Brazilians also are electing all 513 deputies in the House and all of their state governors.

Support From Brazil's Poor Gives Lula Edge In Election (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

SAO PAULO, Brazil, Sept. 30 -- The dividing lines that will determine Brazil's presidential election on Sunday are extraordinarily clear, as plainly visible as the swinging doors that separate a restaurant's dining room from its kitchen.

At a buffet lunch in a middle-class neighborhood, almost all of the cooks who ride buses for hours every day to toil in a steamy kitchen said they will vote to reelect President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva. On the other side of the doors, almost all of the diners said they planned to vote against him.

Lula is expected to coast to victory for this reason: In Latin America's largest democracy, a lot more people live like the cooks than live like the customers.

Although Lula always has portrayed himself as a champion of the downtrodden, the nature of his electoral support this year is different from what it was four years ago. Then, backing among more than 50 percent of middle-class voters was the key that allowed the longtime labor union leader to become president. That support has plummeted to about 35 percent this year, while backing among those earning less than $340 per month -- a minority of whom voted for Lula the first time around -- has soared to almost 60 percent.

Lula won in 2002 during a second-round runoff. He could avoid a late-October runoff this time by getting a majority of the vote Sunday. This week's opinion polls showed Lula favored by just over 50 percent, and his closest challenger -- former Sao Paulo state governor Geraldo Alckmin -- with around 30 percent.

Thanks in large part to minimum-wage hikes and an increase in social programs providing cash to poor families who agree to keep their children in school, the poor have seen their spending power rise by about 28 percent. The Brazilian currency, the real, has gained 60 percent on the dollar since Lula has been president, which has helped keep prices down. The proportion of the population living in poverty has fallen from about 24 percent to about 18.5 percent over the past four years.

"For 12 years, my husband and I have been trying to rebuild our house, and this month we were able to finish because now we can afford cement," said Marlene Silva, 34, who scrubbed chrome counter tops in the kitchen. Helio Helene, a 53-year-old man sweeping the floor nearby, added: "My family used to eat the cheap brands of rice because a package of the good quality rice used to cost 18 reals [about $8.60]. Now the same rice costs 10 reals, so we eat the good brands."

The middle and upper classes don't have stories that are rooted so strongly in everyday life. They talk about double-digit interest rates and a reluctance by Lula to tackle overdue reforms in the banking sector and the social security system. If the economy doesn't grow faster than its current annual pace of about 3.5 percent, they argue, social programs will collapse and leave everyone -- including the poor -- worse off than before.

"Lula is a good agitator, but he's not a good administrator," said Marcelo Naumann Boufleur, 28, one of the restaurant's diners, who works for a video production company. "Interest rates are so high that people are starting to lose jobs -- there's no investment because of that."

When Lula was elected, some financial analysts feared he might promote populist economic policies that would destabilize financial markets, but he earned early praise for reducing foreign borrowing, amassing foreign reserves and retaining a relatively strict fiscal policy. Now some economists say he hasn't done enough.

"Brazil's economic growth is not as much as the world average, and as a developing country it needs to be much higher," said Aloisio Pessoa de AraÃºjo, an economist with the Getulio Vargas Foundation in Rio de Janeiro. "We need to do more to diminish the informal sector of the economy, to regulate less and lighten the tax burden on key sectors."

The middle and upper classes -- as well as the newspapers and magazines that they read -- have paid close attention to a series of corruption scandals that have implicated Lula's administration in recent months. On Saturday, the front pages of the country's largest newspapers featured photos of stacks of cash allegedly paid by a Lula campaign aide for a dossier containing damaging information about Lula's political rivals. It follows allegations of vote-buying in the National Congress last year among members of Lula's party, which prompted some of the president's closest advisers to resign or be fired.

Lula's campaign on Saturday said the publication of the photos was another example of foul play by the media. Throughout the campaign, Lula has declined interviews, contending that most journalists are biased against him. Pundits and those who listen to them might disdain the president, one campaign aide said, but Lula doesn't need them to win.

"You don't know what a burden it is to govern a country with a small group -- the elite -- that is so full of prejudice as the one here," Lula told his supporters during a campaign-closing rally Thursday in a suburb of Sao Paulo.

But the polls suggest the criticisms haven't stuck to him, particularly among those who have benefited from his social programs. For the 70 percent of the population with less than eight years of schooling, the social programs speak louder than the media, according to political analysts.

"Being a government considered more daring in the social field seems to have built a barrier that protects Lula from the corruption allegations," said Francisco Fonseco, a Sao Paulo-based political scientist who published a book last year criticizing the Brazilian media for advancing a non-representative political viewpoint. "Whoever reads only the mainstream media, especially the large newspapers and magazines, tends to have a relatively distorted vision of the political process."

But Claudia Ramos said that from her viewpoint -- that of a 41-year-old secretary with two daughters and a husband who is a lawyer -- the country under Lula has entered a crisis of conscience because of the corruption that has touched the president's party.

"Economically, everything is the same for us, but the country has changed morally," she said, preparing for lunch at the restaurant with her family, who live in the wealthy neighborhood of Campo Belo in Sao Paulo. "I am ashamed of the political situation here."

She added that her daughters' school held a mock election in which Alckmin won handily. But her 6-year-old daughter interrupted to say she had met someone at the school who supported Lula.

"The cleaning lady," she said.

Not So Welcome In South Africa (WP)

Somali Shopkeepers' Lives Shattered by Violent Attacks

MASIPHUMELELE, South Africa -- The mob announced itself the night of Aug. 28 with a terrifying clatter of stones against the tin walls of Hadith Haji Adam Osman's tiny shop. As he cowered inside, watching one window and then the other shatter from the onslaught, Osman recalled, the young men waved machetes in the air and shouted: "Baraka hamba! Baraka hamba!"

In the slang of this township on the rocky, ragged foothills of Cape Town, "Baraka" is the word for Somali shopkeepers such as Osman, 26, who have traveled thousands of miles from their war-ravaged homeland in search of peace and prosperity in South Africa. And "hamba," a word from the dominant Xhosa language here, means "Go away!"

Looking back on that night, when dozens of Somali shopkeepers lost their homes, jobs and dreams for better futures, Osman counts himself fortunate just to be alive. In the past three months, community leaders say, 32 Somalis have been killed in attacks in townships as South African businessmen have violently defended their turf against the newcomers. The most recent death came Saturday in the township of Delft, also near Cape Town.

"When I see my fellow Somalians being killed, I also understand I am lucky to have survived," said Osman, a slender and short man with a wisp of hair on his chin and the thoughtful manner of a patient older brother.

The attacks on Somali immigrants have drawn attention to a vicious strain of xenophobia lurking in South Africa, a nation determined to portray itself as a model of harmonious diversity but tormented by some of the world's highest rates of violent crime.

The attacks are also a chilling reminder, South Africans say, of the violence that marked the final years of apartheid. Clashes in squalid townships such as this forced the government to abandon a decades-old racial order in 1994 but left the nation with a glut of cheap weapons and a legacy of brutality that lingers in the epidemic of rapes, murders and robberies.

Somalis say the recent attacks have convinced them that South Africa's townships are no safer than Mogadishu, the violent capital of a country so riven by power struggles that no government has controlled all of it since 1991.

"People are going back to Somalia now, no matter what's happening there," said Abdi Hakim, 35, whose grocery store in a township near Cape Town has been robbed twice this year. "If we're going to die, we're going to die there in our homeland."

Mohammed Abdullahi, 35, fled Somalia in 2003, leaving behind a wife and three children in Mogadishu. He eventually found his way to South Africa and opened a shop in Khayelitsha, among the largest and most dangerous of the townships near Cape Town.

On Monday, he said, six young men came to his shop shortly after dark. Without saying a word, one of the men shot Abdullahi in the right temple, leaving him for dead in a pool of his own blood but stealing nothing.

From his Cape Town hospital bed, where Abdullahi is recovering but is unlikely to see again, he struggled for breath in recounting the attack. As he raised his right hand in the shape of a pistol, he whispered, "I've been shot because I'm Somali."

The Somalis began arriving in Masiphumelele in 2002 with the opening of Baraka Cash Store, a modest grocery. "Baraka" means "blessing from God" in the guttural mother tongue of the Somalis, and as their numbers swelled the township's residents began calling them "Barakas."

The Somali shops did not look different from the ramshackle collection of hair salons, bars and vegetable stands that already lined the streets of Masiphumelele. But customers here, struggling for every penny despite being nestled in the mountains just a few miles away from South Africa's glitziest tourist spots, soon noticed that the Barakas sold their goods for less than the stores owned by South Africans. The Barakas also offered a warmer, more responsive brand of customer service, residents said.

The Somalis, mostly unmarried men in their twenties and thirties, worked all day, every day, then slept on cots in their shops at night. They also lent one another money, hired other Somalis as employees and developed strong ties with the region's distributors.

Rivals were not happy, and as more and more Barakas moved to Masiphumelele and opened shops -- the total reached 27 in a community of about 20,000 residents -- the township grew tense. There was a string of robberies. Some shops had their windows broken. One Somali shopkeeper said that every few weeks, a young tough would walk into his shop and say, "Tomorrow I am going to kill you."

On the night of Aug. 24, a group of the township's South African businessmen gathered in a community hall to vent their frustrations. By the end of the meeting, they had agreed that rather than compete against the Somalis, they instead would chase them away, giving them three days to leave.

One of the men at the meeting later told police, "We should not be surprised if one of the Somali businessmen is killed," according to a police report. Another was quoted as saying that if the Somalis did not leave, "we are going to send our dogs."

The three days passed without incident. Then shortly after 8 p.m. on Aug. 28, a mob of more than 200 men and women formed as Somalis across Masiphumelele were closing their shops.

Throughout that night, the crowd moved from Somali-owned shop to Somali-owned shop, bashing in doors, ripping holes in walls, tearing off roofs. Inside, the shopkeepers grabbed machetes and prepared to die protecting their property, they said. But when they saw the sheer numbers of the approaching mob, most fled in terror instead. Some, like Osman, prayed that steel-gated doors would hold as they furiously punched the number of the police on their cellphones.

By the time a group of 10 officers arrived, the situation was out of control, said Capt. Roy Matthee, head of detectives at nearby Ocean View police station. The officers frantically tried to rescue the Somalis and fired rubber bullets to disperse the crowd.

Over the course of that night, 400 rubber rounds were expended, but the shops were thoroughly damaged and emptied out -- in some cases, only the concrete floors were left. But not a single Somali was killed.

Police arrested two men for the attacks of that night, and charges of intimidation were filed against seven of the businessmen who attended the meeting of Aug. 24. All are now free on bail, awaiting trial.

Most of the shopkeepers spent the next several weeks in churches, community halls and mosques. Many are now planning their return to Somalia, they say, ready to leave South Africa as soon as they can raise the money.

The businessman who led the meeting, Khaya Aubrey Cwayi, 32, said he was sorry about the attacks, which he blamed on others. He said the business community of Masiphumelele would not object to having some Somalis return as long as they did not drain too much of the profits of other stores.

"It would be fine if we could have five or seven shops of the Somalians. Not more," he said. "If they are all over the place, those existing businesses will never make any money."

Osman visited his old shop last week. The landlord had repaired the windows, and the hole in the wall where the mob had forced its way inside was closed up as well. As Osman looked at the gutted store, which was empty save for some broken eggs and plastic milk crates, several old customers begged him to return to Masiphumelele.

They missed his low prices, they said, and his smile.

"Please come back," said Matilda Badla, 23, who lived across the street from Osman's old shop. "This week."

Osman sadly shook his head. He had no money to restock. And where he once felt hope, he said, now there was only fear.

"They want me to be here," he said. "I also like them. But circumstances will not allow it."

Zambia: Unofficial Results Give Opposition The Lead (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

The tallying of Zambia's presidential election was held up after a ballot shortage delayed voting in some provinces, but the state-owned newspaper The Zambia Daily Mail, citing a survey of voters leaving polls, reported that Michael Sata, a populist former cabinet minister, held a commanding lead over the incumbent, Levy Mwanawasa. Mr. Sata was reported to have healthy leads in both Lusaka and the northern Copperbelt Province, the two most populous regions.

In China, Churches Challenge The Rules (WP)

By Maureen Fan

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

Bold Congregations Risk Official Wrath

WENZHOU, China -- A new breed of churches in this region of China has demonstrated a boldness and independence unmatched elsewhere in the country, despite strict government guidelines for places of worship.

Here in Wenzhou and the surrounding province of Zhejiang, just south of Shanghai, a growing number of congregations that began life as house churches -- unauthorized places of worship set up in private, often dilapidated homes -- have recently registered with the government, while continuing to spurn the rules of the official Protestant church in China. Like so many institutions in China, these churches now hover in a sort of legal netherworld.

The official church, known as the Three-Self Patriotic Movement, was founded in the 1950s to free religious Chinese from foreign funds and influence. Its name is derived from the principles of self-governance, self-support and self-propagation of the Gospel.

The fact that many Christians in this region have turned away from the official church's beliefs, analysts say, is a result of history and prosperity.

"Wenzhou's Christians have a lot of social connections, a lot of friends, they're very capable," said Chen Cun-fu, director of the Institute of Christianity and Cross-Cultural Studies at Zhejiang University in Hangzhou. "They're smart, they know how to do things. They're young, they have money, they have their own cars and cellphones."

Meanwhile, a growing number of college students, lawyers, businessmen and preachers educated abroad are also joining illegal house churches.

According to the rules of China's official church, midweek services are forbidden, as is proselytizing outside of church. But the rules are often bent, depending on the relationship between local officials and church leaders, and some independent-minded churches refuse to attend official meetings or pay official fees.

The well-worn Bailouxia church, tucked away down a small lane in this prosperous city, began as an illegal house church. But the church registered with the local religious authorities, and now displays a cross outside the building.

On a recent day, four elderly parishioners stretched out in varnished wooden pews, napping under ceiling fans. In a back row, a toddler fussed as a woman plucked the eyebrows of another worshiper using a thread.

"God's temple is desolate," sang a preacher at an electric keyboard, leading about 60 people in a hymn. "Where is the watchman? The wall is collapsed and everybody is only taking care of themselves."Clash Over a Building

Nothing illustrated the boldness of Zhejiang's Christians more clearly than the hasty building of an illegal house church this summer in a suburb of Hangzhou, the provincial capital. When local officials demolished the church, a massive riot ensued, with 3,000 protesters facing off against thousands of uniformed riot police, security guards and plainclothes police.

It was the most dramatic example in a series of arrests, raids and demolitions of churches considered illegal by the authorities. Some observers said the riot was only the latest chapter in a long-running battle between authorities and the more outspoken of China's growing population of 45 million to 65 million Christians. Other activists said it represented a stepped-up persecution of unregistered congregations.

The 85-year-old church, in the suburban district of Xiaoshan, had its own building before government officials turned it into a hospital many years ago. Since then, members had haggled with officials for compensation and a new location, most recently rejecting a government-approved spot beside a noisy highway.

"Xiaoshan people have the tradition of family or house gatherings and they're rich, so they want more freedom," said Chen. "It's hard for the government to regulate them and tell them where to build their church."

Tired of delays, church members decided in July they couldn't wait any longer. Hundreds gathered in Xiaoshan's Cheluwan village to build the church by hand. They began on a Monday, one group encircling the site to serve as protection with a second group working in rotation through the night. Some volunteers cooked while others stood above one another on metal scaffolding, handing up bricks, sand, cement, shovels and rope.

By Saturday morning they needed only to lay the roof. But on the afternoon of July 29, authorities sent several hundred trucks, four bulldozers, and thousands of riot police, security officers and non-uniformed guards to the scene. Police used bullhorns to order everyone to disperse.

"Stop all illegal activity," the police demanded, as bystanders used their cellphones to photograph their arrival. "Nobody should obstruct state officials who are executing their public function. Nobody should make up facts, spread rumors or disturb social order."

A riot broke out as church members tried to stop the demolition. More than 50 people were detained and many were beaten, said an attorney for the detained, who interviewed and photographed the injured. Six church leaders remain under arrest for instigating violence and interfering with the law. Prosecutors will decide whether to formally charge them this month.

The head of the village, who said his surname was Wang, insisted there had been no injuries and complained that the church was unregistered and illegal.

DOJ_NMG_0072648

"They're absolutely lawless. They consider God to be the most powerful authority and ignore the law," Wang said in a telephone interview.

Official state media reported only that an illegal building had been dismantled, but news of the riot, arrests and beatings spread quickly among Christians.

"This would only happen in Zhejiang. In other provinces, Christians wouldn't dare to build a church this way," said a preacher in a registered Three-Self church in Hangzhou that has several thousand worshipers. He asked not to be named because religion is such a sensitive topic.

"The authorities pay no attention to what you preach, so long as you don't talk about political issues," the preacher said. "The law in China is very fluid. They can regulate but people sometimes do what they want."

In Xiaoshan, however, residents now live in fear. There is an ongoing investigation into who leaked news of the riot to foreign media. One villager said police have been waiting outside the homes of active Christians and posing as journalists.

"You can't speak loudly or talk to outsiders or strangers. There are plainclothes police paying close attention to the houses where Christians live," he said. "They stop people on the street, and in the middle of the night. They ask where the leaders have gone."'It's Just a Name'

Hu Qianjie, the 32-year-old owner of a Wenzhou welding factory, is one of the growing number of independent-minded preachers at registered churches in China. The son of peddlers, he grew up in poverty and remembers Christians coming to help pray for a sick younger brother.

"I was so confused about what I was taught in school -- that socialism was good, everybody was equal, no job was better than another," he said of the search that led him to convert to Christianity when he was 17. Today, despite the fact that he leads a congregation affiliated with the official church, he makes his own views known.

"We look like we might be under the umbrella of the Three-Self church but actually it's just a name, like a sign hanging in front of your house," he said. "I don't just explain the Bible to my followers, I link it to the current situation of society."

Hu rejects the formulaic nature of official Three-Self sermons that stick strictly to the Gospel. And he is critical of early Communist Party attacks on any Western ideology, arguing that Christian cultures are better at absorbing useful lessons from other societies. "Chinese culture just expels everything that doesn't fit with its own culture," he said.

By making the church relevant to the lives of young Christians, Hu also hopes it will fill a void because the government is unable to provide moral leadership.

"We don't talk publicly about sensitive, political issues," he said. "We focus more on abortion, divorce, extramarital affairs. The Communist Party has no more standard for that, no more restrictions on that."

Zheng Datong, a Wenzhou preacher who gives sermons in both registered and unregistered churches, said churches in China are an important outlet for the middle class in Zhejiang province.

"I have many friends who are middle class and who own their own businesses," he said. "I can tell there is a need for them to do some soul-searching. People have everything now -- they have cars, they have houses -- but no peace."

Researcher Jin Ling contributed to this report.

Often Parched, India Struggles To Tap The Monsoon (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

SURAT, India — Early on a Monday morning during the August monsoon, after several days of torrential rains, the engineers in charge of a massive dam about 50 miles upstream from this diamond-polishing hub faced a harrowing crisis.

With water brimming well past the permitted levels at the 350-foot Ukai Dam, according to official records, and the skies showing no sign of relief, the engineers apparently threw open the reservoir's 21 sluice gates. Water then did what water does. It surged downriver, swallowing this city of three million people like a hungry beast. The diamond lanes of India became a warren of muck and ruin.

In less than three days, at least 120 people died. More than 4,000 animal carcasses were later hauled out of the mud. Two weeks after the floods, Surat's diamond-polishing factories were practically empty of workers, who had fled fearing disease. An industry group estimated the losses at $60 million.

Exactly what happened in Surat is still under investigation. But the deluge has drawn new attention to a puzzle that is crucial to securing India's future: how to harness and hold on to its rich but capricious rains.

The problem is a matter of bitter and enduring debate in this country — and the answer may hold a key to India's prosperity. Every year, India is crippled by floods in some areas, even as it is parched in blighted corners elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0072649

India's average annual rainfall rate hovers at an abundant 46 inches, as much as Ireland's. Yet growing water scarcity threatens both farms and cities. With the population hitting 1.1 billion, the amount of water available to each Indian is roughly the same as the amount available to the average Sudanese, according to the Food and Agriculture Organization.

India's rains tend to come in short, furious bursts, meaning that much of that water escapes as untapped potential, washing into the sea and wreaking havoc on the fragile villages and flourishing cities that stand in its way.

India is likely to become even more vulnerable, environmentalists warn. Global climate change threatens to make weather patterns even more erratic. Steadily shrinking Himalayan glaciers will inexorably melt and rush down the flood plains.

Floods in India are already a perennial and costly affair, especially in human terms. The southwest monsoon killed 2,545 people in less than four months this year, according to the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Part of the problem lies in India's rapid and unruly development. As water demand has soared, the natural sponges of Indian cities — lakes, ponds, marshes, mangroves — have been lost to construction. Only a handful of city and state governments have lately begun to mandate rainwater harvesting to slowly replenish groundwater.

Moreover, the country faces a water storage crunch. Traditional small-scale Indian storage systems, from temple tanks to elaborate step-wells, have fallen into disrepair. China, a country with similar development issues, manages to store five times the water that India does per person, the World Bank estimates. But the Chinese government, with scant public debate, has moved thousands of people to make way for colossal water projects.

India, too, has tried. But here, in the world's largest democracy, the big-money water solution — the big dam — has been the subject of rancorous disputes. Some projects have met resistance for decades.

Proponents say India must build many more reservoirs to meet its growing water and energy needs. India's founding prime minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, under whose watch the Ukai Dam was built, called them "modern temples" of his newly sovereign nation. India has roughly 4,300 large dams, like the one east of Surat, and an additional 475 under construction.

Critics say that big dams have already proved too costly and too destructive, submerging villages and displacing people without adequate compensation.

They also argue that dams and irrigation canals, like so much Indian infrastructure, are so poorly maintained and managed that already they cannot hold all they are supposed to. According to government estimates, silt deposits make up 10 percent of total capacity. Because of declining rains, India today fills up its reservoirs two out of every three years.

When the Tapi River burst upon Surat on Aug. 7, its swollen waters broke through an already fragile concrete embankment near Abdul Bhai Patel's apartment.

Eventually, the rising waters reduced Mr. Patel's building to a pile of rubble and brick. His wife, Zulekha, was among nearly 40 people who were killed when the building collapsed.

"I screamed," Mr. Patel recalled several days later, as he picked solemnly through the rubble in search of his passport. "No one heard me. There was water all around." The river took away his only source of income, too — the auto-rickshaw that he plied on the streets of Surat.

Downstream, at the industrial park called Hazira, one of the country's largest natural gas plants was forced to shut down. Several petrochemical plants shut down as well. The floodwaters reached as high as 18 feet at Hazira.

Government engineers who manage dams, including the Ukai, have the unenviable task of balancing the competing Indian curses of drought and deluge.

In dry years, they must take measures to store as much water as possible in the reservoir. In wet years, they must guard against drowning those who live downstream.

Whether state officials at Ukai could have taken any steps to forestall the flooding remains uncertain. The officials plead silence, citing a judicial inquiry under way.

Their critics are not silent. They argue that it was reckless to wait so long to discharge so much water, knowing it could submerge the city in a matter of hours, and they have pounced on the drowning of Surat as a model of all that is wrong with the way India uses its reservoirs.

"I call it a management failure," said M. D. Desai, a retired state engineer who once worked at Ukai.

The reservoir was already well over 20 percent full by the time the rains began in July, critics note. Meteorological data forecasted heavy rains in early August. And dam officials should have known that a full moon, on Aug. 9, would bring high tides and further pinch the river's ability to drain into the sea. The Hazira industrial complex, built on the estuary, also compromises the river's ability to drain out.

Often, the wasted water is a double hit to development: Not only does it go unused, it destroys everything in its path, setting back both industry and infrastructure. In Surat, the outpouring of the Ukai Dam snapped electricity and phone lines, and suspended train service and commerce.

DOJ_NMG_0072650

The Business Standard, an English-language daily, fumed in an editorial, under the headline "Man-Made Floods," a few days after the deluge.

"Releasing the water in a rush at the monsoon time means that the stored water has gone completely waste, as runoff," it read. "This is criminal profligacy with a scarce and precious resource."

Modern India, urban and rural, continues to live at the whim of the monsoon.

For two-thirds of India's farmers, who have no access to irrigation, a good monsoon is the difference between survival and penury. For fast-growing cities like this one, the monsoon lays bare the frailties of urban infrastructure.

This year, in the perennially drought-stricken agricultural region of Vidarbha, in central India, the monsoon was first tardy and then, unexpectedly furious. Those who had low-lying lands lost their crops entirely. In the western state of Rajasthan, a fluke downpour turned desert to lake.

In the cities, troubles like those in Surat are spread all around, at accumulating costs. Last year, one day's unusually heavy rains brought Mumbai, formerly Bombay and the country's financial capital, to a standstill.

Trains stopped in their tracks. Cars were submerged, sometimes with people inside. Shanties were washed away. All told, 400 people died in the flooding, and then, 60 more, as cholera and dengue fever festered in its waterlogged streets.

Civic scrutiny fell on years of neglect and bad planning: the narrow storm drains bursting with the city's waste; the slums sitting on the city's floodplains; and the sprawling complex of financial services buildings that has eaten up mangroves.

In Surat, prosperity and population growth brought a surge of new development on the river's edge. A city official acknowledged that expanding construction along the riverbank had made it impossible to put up flood walls in some places.

Any lessons will come too late for Tulsi Mistry, 14, and her family. Before dawn, on that fateful Monday in early August, when news of flooding first reached the Rivera Row Houses, they scrambled to higher ground.

From her perch on the roof, Tulsi watched as the river rose and devoured her city. A refrigerator and washing machine coursed down her street. A body floated in the park up the road.

Tulsi and her family ended up virtually stranded on their rooftop terrace for a week. They ate whatever was left in the pantry and shared with neighbors. They drank what was stored in the rooftop tank, forgoing a bath for seven days.

Burma Detains Two More Dissident Figures (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 1, 2006

RANGOON, Burma, Sept. 30 -- Burma's military junta detained two former dissident leaders on Saturday as part of a renewed crackdown on pro-democracy activists that followed anniversary celebrations of Aung San Suu Kyi's political party.

Min Zeya, 45, and Pyone Cho, 40, were taken from their homes Saturday, a day after sending a letter to the ruling junta chairman inquiring about the status of three other activists detained Wednesday.

Their arrests brought to six the number of activists detained since Suu Kyi's National League for Democracy marked its 18th anniversary Wednesday.

Min Zeya and Pyone Cho were among the leaders of a nationwide uprising in Burma, also known as Myanmar, in 1988. The military crushed the uprising and seized power. Pyone Cho served nearly 14 years in prison and was released in 2003, while Min Zeya served eight years and was released in 1997.

On Wednesday, the military picked up Min Ko Naing, Ko Ko Gyi and Htay Kywe -- supporters of the detained pro-democracy leader Suu Kyi. The three have not been seen since.

They had helped lead pro-democracy demonstrations in 1988 and served sentences of at least a decade before being released with thousands of other prisoners in late 2004.

The U.S. Campaign for Burma, based in Washington, said a sixth activist -- Aye Myint -- had been arrested. This could not be immediately confirmed.

In 1990, the junta refused to hand over power when Suu Kyi's party won a landslide election victory. Suu Kyi, who received the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize, has spent nearly 11 of the last 17 years in detention, mostly under house arrest, despite worldwide calls to free her and hundreds of other political prisoners.

Canadian Overpass Falls; Deaths Feared (AP)

By Phil Couvrette

AP, October 1, 2006

An overpass near Montreal collapsed Saturday, crushing two cars whose occupants were feared dead, authorities said. At least five people were injured.

DOJ_NMG_0072651

Drivers on Highway 19 slammed on their brakes and watched in horror as the overpass slowly collapsed, sending cars plunging and crushing at least two vehicles. Quebec provincial police did not confirm any deaths but spokeswoman Chantal Mackels said police believed it was unlikely that anyone in the two crushed cars survived.

"We watched the overpass slowly come down and two cars fell from it," witness Golda Simon told TVA network.

Manon Joly had just dropped her daughter off at dance school and was in her car about to drive onto Highway 19.

"I slowed down and then all of a sudden everything collapsed like a house of cards," she said. "There were three or four cars that plunged into the hole right in front of me."

Ambulances transported five people. Three were in critical condition including two suffering from head injuries.

Emergency workers had not yet reached people trapped under the wreckage, said Andre Champagne of ambulance service Urgence-Sante. The workers were trying to secure the site before attending to those trapped, he told The Associated Press.

"We know minutes are precious," Champagne said. "It takes a long time. These are heavy structures that have to be moved."

Mackels said three lanes of the overpass plus a pedestrian sidewalk collapsed onto Highway 19. She said four vehicles — a motorcycle, two cars and a minivan — were on the overpass at the time

The incident occurred before 1 p.m. One witness told TVA he noticed that the road sunk an inch or two when he traveled over the overpass minutes earlier and he called emergency dispatchers.

Jean-Nicolas Turcotte, who lives near the overpass, was woken up by the collapse.

"I was sleeping when the large crash woke me up. At first I thought it was an earthquake or an accident. I looked out the window and heard people screaming," Turcotte said. "And I saw large puffs of smoke rising."

Claude Canton was painting his house just off the highway when he heard a loud bang. He said he saw two cars that were stuck under rubble and one started to catch fire before police put it out with extinguishers.

Aerial helicopter shots showed two passenger cars and a van on their backs or on the sides over the wreckage of the collapsed overpass, blocking traffic for miles. Authorities closed the bridge further down connecting Laval with the island on Montreal.

The incident was similar to the 2000 collapse of an overpass, also on the island of Laval north of Montreal, which killed one and injured two.

A New African War Zone (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 1, 2006

PAOUA, Central African Republic

My aim in bringing Casey Parks, the winner of my contest for university students, to this war-torn land wasn't to have her held at gunpoint. That was quite an accident — both times.

My purpose was actually to emphasize the urgency of ending the genocide in Darfur before it destabilizes even more of Africa. The malignancy has already spread to Chad, and now it is beginning to destroy the Central African Republic as well.

Sudan has in effect invaded the Central African Republic with a proxy force of Chadians whom it armed and transported to a remote airstrip in Sudanese Antonov aircraft. Now those troops are living in caves in the northeast part of this country and recruiting local people to fight. When the dry season comes in another month or so, that force of 500 troops will presumably join a larger force of Sudanese puppets in trying to overthrow the government of Chad and perhaps of this country as well.

The north of the Central African Republic is now a war zone, with rival armed bands (some from the government) burning villages, kidnapping children, robbing travelers and killing people with impunity.

The country is already unstable for its own reasons, and its own government has much to answer for, but the Sudanese incursion and the small arms rippling out from Darfur have left this region in complete chaos. The violence has driven 100,000 villagers from their homes, and the U.N. calls it "the world's most neglected crisis."

Casey and I traveled here in a five-vehicle U.N. convoy, including two pickups full of well-armed soldiers. But the presence of soldiers discourages frank interviews with peasants who have been attacked by soldiers, so we twice left the escorts behind and drove through hard-hit villages.

After we had stopped at the eerily empty village of Bottolna and explored a bit, a man named Dominique Dondjoube crept out of a hiding place and told us that most of the villagers were hiding in the bush — where they were dying from bad water, malaria and malnutrition. "Just yesterday, three children died of malnutrition," he said. They were a 6-year-old boy, a 5-year-old girl, and a 3-month-old girl whose mother had no milk because of the lack of food.

DOJ_NMG_0072652

In a hospital run by Doctors Without Borders, a French doctor was treating Arthur Demongoy, a 2-year-old suffering from severe malnutrition. Children like Arthur are heartbreakingly impassive; they are so starved that they never cry, for every calorie goes to keeping them alive.

"Everything was burned in our village, and all our money was taken, and that's why we have no food," explained his mother, Sylvie.

But while a handful of brave aid workers and Catholic missionaries, Europeans and Africans alike, work in this region, they have been shot at and robbed. At some point the danger could force them to pull out.

Indeed, as Casey and I drove on one isolated, rutted road that forced us to drive slowly, we encountered just the kind of menace that has terrorized local people and aid workers: Two men stepped out from the brush on the side of the road, waved rifles and ordered us to stop.

The bandits eventually let us go on, and we continued down the road to interview local people. But since there was only one road into the area, we had to go back the same way — and then were held up again, by the same two men.

That kind of random violence is incredibly infectious, and the legacy of Darfur may be that all of Chad and the Central African Republic will collapse into Somalia-style anarchy. In an interview with Casey and me, President François Bozize of the Central African Republic offered an excellent suggestion: With the deployment of U.N. peacekeepers to Darfur delayed indefinitely because of Sudan's defiance, post them in the meantime in Chad and the Central African Republic — while still pushing to get them into Darfur itself.

When President Bozize traveled to the U.S. this month for the U.N. General Assembly, the Bush administration made available a mere deputy assistant secretary of state to talk to him. That's ridiculous, sending a signal that we're not engaged in Darfur's regional crisis and don't care what Sudan does to this country.

If President Bush is serious about genocide, an immediate priority is to stop the cancer of Darfur from spreading further — which means working with France to shore up both Chad and the Central African Republic. (France has troops in both countries.) It also means putting U.N. peacekeepers in both places. Right now.

Don't Let The Andes Trade Pact Expire (LAT)

By Sergio Muñoz, Sergio Muñoz, A Former Times Editorial Writer, Is A Contributing Editor To The Paper, And His Weekly
The Los Angeles Times, October 1, 2006

Free-trade program has benefited millions while promoting democracy in South America.

VICTORIA Salgado Chambi is a 30-year-old single mother who lives with her young children, Carlos and Ana, in a barrio in El Alto, Bolivia's third-largest city. She is one of tens of thousands of Bolivian artisans who owe their livelihoods to the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act, which the U.S. Congress first passed in 1991. The law allows about 5,600 Bolivian products — among them cut flowers, native fruits and vegetables, jewelry and traditional Indian clothing — to be sold duty-free in the United States.

Salgado, who learned the art of weaving from her Aymara Indian mother and grandmother, specializes in making alpaca coats, sweaters, bags and caps. Her clothing used to sell for less than $20 apiece in the local El Alto market. When the Andean trade law kicked in, an exporter urged Salgado to boost production, and after a local bank loaned her $10,000 to buy the necessary equipment, she hired three women as weavers. Business has been good, and she now employs 15 women. She gets $50 for every clothing item sold in the U.S. for $90.

But the trade program that has created an economic miracle in El Alto — 80,000 new jobs and roughy $250 million in annual income from sales in the U.S. — may lapse in December.

The original goal of the Andean trade act was to combat drug production and traffic in Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru by helping those countries create legitimate jobs, and it has largely worked. In 2001, Congress approved a five-year extension of the program, assuming that by 2006, all four countries would have negotiated free-trade agreements with the United States.

None have, although Peru and Colombia have signed deals that await congressional approval. Ecuador and the U.S. stopped talking free trade a few months ago. And Bolivia is not even on the table.

Furthermore, Bolivian President Evo Morales' decision to nationalize the country's natural gas resources has only made things worse for Bolivia in the U.S. Congress, where many politicians have attacked his plan.

For Bolivia, the expiring trade act is crucial to its economic vitality. In recognition of that, the secretary general of the Organization of American States, Jose Miguel Insulza, has called for an extension of the program, as have all members of the group.

Even Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), whose free-trade voting record is mixed at best, has introduced a bill that would extend the trade provisions for Bolivia by two more years. But Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Senate

Finance Committee, opposes any extension because of Morales' move toward nationalization, even though no U.S. companies would be affected.

To end Salgado's and other Bolivian artisans' competitive advantage in the U.S. marketplace would be shortsighted and counterproductive, and it would border on the petty. For Latin Americans, it would be hard to understand why the world's richest country turned its back on the second-poorest in the hemisphere by ending a trade program that benefits about 40% of El Alto's largely impoverished population and amounts to 65% of Bolivia's trade with us.

Washington has a broad interest in promoting democracy in the Andean region, where Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez is using his country's vast oil wealth to spread his "Bolivarian Revolution." With indigenous movements in Ecuador and Bolivia gaining strength, fighting in Colombia continuing and dissatisfaction with the market economy festering in Peru, it would be foolish for Washington to give Chavez more ammunition by denying poor Bolivian Indians access to the U.S. market. Extending the trade program not only would help solve Bolivia's enormous problems but would serve to restore regional trust in the U.S. commitment to democracy.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Sept. 11 Panel Wasn't Told Of Meeting, Members Say (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Members of the Sept. 11 commission said Sunday they were alarmed that they were told nothing about a July 2001 White House meeting at which George J. Tenet, then director of central intelligence, is reported to have warned Condoleezza Rice, then national security adviser, about an imminent attack by Al Qaeda and failed to persuade her to take action.

Details of the meeting on July 10, 2001, two months before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, were first reported last week in a new book by Bob Woodward. The White House disputes his account.

The final report from the Sept. 11 commission made no mention of the meeting, nor did it suggest that there had been such an encounter between Mr. Tenet and Ms. Rice, now secretary of state.

Since the release of the book, "State of Denial," the White House and Ms. Rice have disputed major elements of Mr. Woodward's account. Ms. Rice has said through spokesmen that there had been no such exchange in a private meeting with Mr. Tenet and that he had expressed none of the frustration attributed to him in Mr. Woodward's book.

"It really didn't match Secretary Rice's recollection of the meeting at all," said Dan Bartlett, counselor to President Bush, in an interview on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "It kind of left us scratching our heads because we don't believe that's an accurate account."

Passages of the book suggest that Mr. Tenet was a major source for Mr. Woodward. The former intelligence director has refused to comment on the book since its release.

There has also been no comment on the book from J. Cofer Black, who was Mr. Tenet's counterterrorism chief, and who, the book says, attended the July 10 meeting and left it frustrated by Ms. Rice's "brush-off" of the warnings.

Mr. Black is quoted as saying, "The only thing we didn't do was pull the trigger to the gun we were holding to her head." He did not return calls left at Blackwater, the security firm he joined last year.

The book says Mr. Tenet hurriedly organized the meeting, calling ahead from his car as it traveled to the White House, because he wanted to "shake Rice" into persuading the president to respond to dire intelligence warnings about a possible terrorist strike.

Mr. Woodward writes that Mr. Tenet left the meeting frustrated because "they were not getting through to Rice."

The disclosures took members of the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission by surprise last week. Some questioned whether information about the July 10 meeting was intentionally withheld from the panel, the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States.

In interviews Saturday and Sunday, commission members said they were never told about the meeting despite hours of public and private questioning with Ms. Rice, Mr. Tenet and Mr. Black, much of it focused specifically on how the White House dealt with terrorist threats in the summer of 2001.

"None of this was shared with us in hours of private interviews, including interviews under oath, nor do we have any paper on this," said Timothy J. Roemer, a Democratic member of the commission and a former congressman from Indiana. "I'm deeply disturbed by this. I'm furious."

Another Democratic commissioner, the former Watergate prosecutor Richard Ben-Veniste, said the staff of the Sept. 11 commission was polled in recent days on the disclosures in Mr. Woodward's book and agreed that the meeting "was never mentioned to us."

"This is certainly something we would have wanted to know about," he said, referring to the meeting. "We asked broad questions which should have elicited this information."

DOJ_NMG_0072660

He said he had attended the commission's private interviews with both Mr. Tenet and Ms. Rice and had pressed "very hard for them to provide us with everything they had regarding conversations with the executive branch" about terrorist threats before Sept. 11.

Philip D. Zelikow, the executive director of the Sept. 11 commission and now counselor to the State Department, agreed that no witness before the commission had drawn attention to a July 10 meeting at the White House or described the sort of encounter portrayed in Mr. Woodward's book.

Mr. Zelikow said it was "entirely plausible" that a meeting occurred on July 10, during a period that summer in which intelligence agencies were being flooded with warnings of a terrorist attack against the United States or its allies.

But he said the commissioners and their staff had heard nothing in their private interviews with Mr. Tenet and Mr. Black to suggest that they made such a dire presentation to Ms. Rice or that she had rebuffed them.

"If we had heard something that drew our attention to this meeting, it would have been a huge thing," Mr. Zelikow said. "Repeatedly, Tenet and Black said they could not remember what had transpired in some of those meetings."

Democratic lawmakers have seized on Mr. Woodward's book in arguing that the Bush administration bungled the war in Iraq and paid too little attention to terrorism threats in the months before Sept. 11.

Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said on CBS that there had been "rumors" of such an encounter between Mr. Tenet and Ms. Rice in the summer of 2001.

Mr. Woodward's book, he said, raised the question of "why didn't Condi Rice and George Tenet tell the 9/11 commission about that? They were obliged to do that, and they didn't."

Bush Critic Hits Clinton's Claims About Bin Laden (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

Michael Scheuer, whose 2004 book "Imperial Hubris" won hosannas from liberals as an indictment of the Bush administration's conduct of the war on terror, turned his sights on former President Bill Clinton yesterday.

In an appearance on "Fox News Sunday," the former CIA counterterrorism official denounced as "lies" Mr. Clinton's contentious defense last week of his efforts against Osama bin Laden, saying the administration passed up at least 10 chances to capture or kill the al Qaeda leader.

"Mr. Richard Clarke, Mr. Sandy Berger, President Clinton are lying about the opportunities they had to kill Osama bin Laden. That's the plain truth, the exact truth," Mr. Scheuer said of the former president and, respectively, his administration's top anti-terrorism adviser and national security adviser.

Mr. Scheuer also disputed Mr. Clinton's assertion that he did not have the necessary authorization to kill bin Laden, pointing out the president is the person who issues authorizations, not the person who needs them.

"It's not a simple, dumb bureaucrat like me; that's not my decision. It's his," Mr. Scheuer said. "For him to get on the television and say to the American people he did all he could is a flat lie, sir. This is not a question of interpretation or judgment. This is a question of fact. And the documents will show the president had the opportunity."

Mr. Scheuer was part of a "Fox News Sunday" panel that debated the Clinton administration's efforts in fighting terrorism, one week after Mr. Clinton caused a stir by getting visibly angry at Fox interviewer Chris Wallace's questions on the topic.

The Scheuer comments were disputed by Daniel Benjamin, a former Clinton National Security Council counterterrorism official, who said intelligence officials never had enough reliable information to capture or kill bin Laden.

"I have the greatest respect for Mike Scheuer, but on this case, I think he's wrong," Mr. Benjamin said. "Quite simply, we never had enough information to do this with confidence, knowing that we would get the target. And it doesn't help your deterrence and it doesn't help your case if you fire and you don't hit the right person."

When pressed by Mr. Wallace, Mr. Scheuer said he remains a critic of the Bush administration's record on combating terrorism and the decision to invade Iraq.

"I think that this administration has led us into a tremendously difficult long-term problem, which will be very bloody and costly for Americans," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0072661

However, Mr. Scheuer defended the Bush administration against accusations from Clinton supporters that the Bush team could have eliminated bin Laden in the eight months before the September 11 attacks.

"Mr. Clarke, Mr. Berger, Mr. Clinton did have opportunities that were delivered by the men and women of the CIA to kill Osama bin Laden," Mr. Scheuer said. "In the first eight months of the Bush administration, there were no such opportunities."

Journalist Lawrence Wright, who also appeared on the "Fox News Sunday" panel, said the real blame for failing to capture bin Laden and eliminate al Qaeda has more to do with the government's inability to hire a competent national security intelligence team at all levels -- agents, analysts and officials.

"They were both poorly served by their intelligence agencies," Mr. Wright said. "In each of these cases, the intelligence was not great. And the reason the intelligence was not great is they didn't have people that were capable of getting inside the tent."

Tape Shows 2 Hijackers In Year Before 9/11 (AP)

AP, October 2, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 1 (AP) — Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks, smiles and jokes with another hijacker before the two turn serious and speak to a camera in a video that surfaced on Sunday.

For more than 30 minutes, the video shows Mr. Atta, who later took over the controls of American Airlines Flight 11, which hit the north tower of the World Trade Center, and Ziad al-Jarrah, who took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania, alternately alone and together.

The Sunday Times, which originally reported on the video and posted it on its Web site, said it was made in Afghanistan and dated Jan. 18, 2000, for release after the men's deaths.

The newspaper said the hourlong video was made at a training camp for Al Qaeda in Afghanistan. It includes images of Osama bin Laden. It has no sound.

At times, the two men look relaxed, laughing and chatting before they grow serious and speak directly into the camera. At one point, they study a document the newspaper identifies as a will.

American intelligence officials in Washington said Sunday that the tape was being analyzed, and one confirmed the men's identities.

9/11 Hijacker Video Surfaces (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 1 -- Mohamed Atta, the ringleader of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, smiles and jokes with another hijacker before the two turn serious and speak intently to a camera in a newly released video.

For more than 30 minutes, the video shows Atta, who flew one of the planes that brought down New York's World Trade Center, and Ziad Jarrah, who piloted United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed into a Pennsylvania field, sitting in front of a bare white wall, alternately alone and together.

The Sunday Times, which originally reported the video and posted it on its Web site, said it was made in Afghanistan and dated Jan. 18, 2000 -- about a year and a half before the attacks against the United States -- for release after the men's deaths.

The newspaper said the hour-long video was made at an al-Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan. It includes images of Osama bin Laden speaking to supporters in Kandahar, Afghanistan. A time stamp indicated that this footage was shot on Jan. 8, 2000.

At times in the video, which has no sound, the two men look relaxed, laughing and chatting together before they grow serious and speak directly into the camera. At one point, they lean over a document the newspaper identifies as a will, studying it intently and sometimes pointing to specific sections and commenting to one another.

The Sunday Times said it had obtained the video "through a previously tested channel" but gave no further details. It said sources from al-Qaeda and the United States had confirmed the video's authenticity on condition of anonymity.

Look Past The Tortured Distortions (WSJ)

By John Warner, John McCain and Lindsey Graham

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072662

WASHINGTON -- Negotiating a complicated piece of legislation with wide-ranging implications is always a difficult endeavor, and the Military Commissions Act of 2006 was no exception. We worked with the administration to achieve a fair system for the prosecution and conviction of suspected terrorists. The proposed legislation also reaffirms and underscores our nation's commitment to the Geneva Conventions, which we must uphold as a matter of principle and to protect our service members in this and future wars. We believe that we have succeeded in this effort.

We also believe that the American people deserve to have this important legislation properly described. Some recent reports, in our view, have not reflected accurately the bill we negotiated. The following points deserve clarification in order that this important legislation may be fully understood by the American people. * * *

Criminal Waiver: A number of recent articles state that in our compromise with the president, we included a waiver for crimes Americans may have committed in interrogating detainees. In fact, our bill contains no waiver for such crimes, nor immunity for any individual. Anyone who has committed a crime may be prosecuted under the torture statute or the War Crimes Act. This legislation actually makes it easier to win a prosecution, because the War Crimes Act as currently written is so broadly worded that a prosecution would likely fail on grounds of vagueness.

Enemy Combatants: Other reporting asserts that the definition of "illegal enemy combatant" in the bill could subject a broad category of people to arrest and indefinite detention with no hope of appeal. Actually, the proposed legislation simply establishes the jurisdiction of military commissions. That jurisdiction extends solely to aliens who have engaged in hostilities against the United States or who have purposefully and materially supported hostilities against us.

We make no apology for wanting to try by military commission both the people who shoot at us and those who aid and abet the trigger-men. Because we believe in the American system of justice, we also do not apologize for giving these individuals the right to appeal their convictions, all the way up to the Supreme Court.

The Geneva Conventions: Another misunderstanding is that the bill gives the president the power to reinterpret unilaterally the Geneva Conventions. In fact, the president, under this legislation, has no power beyond that already given him in the Constitution: the authority to interpret treaty obligations binding on the executive branch. From the beginning, we stood with the five former chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the 50 other general and flag officers who strongly resisted any legal redefinition of the Geneva Conventions.

Some critics state that any determinations made by the president could stay secret. In fact, this legislation requires the president to publish his determinations as to what offenses constitute "non-grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions in the Federal Register. His interpretations will have the force of administrative regulations, and so can be trumped by congressional action at any time.

Habeas Corpus: Another myth is that, under our bill, detainees would lose the basic right to challenge their imprisonment. Actually, both the Detainee Treatment Act and the Military Commissions Act allow an individual to challenge his status in administrative and judicial fora. These challenges are in excess of what our soldiers would be afforded as prisoners of war.

Judicial Review: Other critics claim that our civilian courts would have no power to review any aspect of the military tribunal system, except verdicts by military tribunals. The truth is that our federal courts today already have the right to review the decisions made by military Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

Coerced Evidence: A number of articles state that coercion is defined so as to exempt anything done before the passage of the 2005 Detainee Treatment Act. This, also, is incorrect.

The bill excludes any evidence obtained through illegal interrogation techniques, including those prohibited by the 2005 act. Any evidence obtained before the 2005 law would have to pass a legal reliability test -- and, as applied in practice, the greater the degree of coercion, the more likely the statement will not be admitted. To admit any such evidence, the judge would have to make an additional finding that doing so serves the interest of justice.

Secret Evidence: Some argue the bill weakens the legal standard against withholding evidence from the defendant. In fact, under this legislation, any evidence shown to the jury must be shared with the defendant. This was a key change from the administration's proposal.

Offenses: Finally, there is some confusion about the definitions of torture and rape within the bill. As is made explicit in the legislation, these definitions are for the purposes only of enumerating war crimes -- offenses so serious that they are all potentially punishable by death. They do not affect other legal definitions for the same terms (including torture and rape) contained elsewhere in law. The bill's definition of rape is based on the meaning used in the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. * * *

It is axiomatic that a compromise makes no one happy. Our mission was to help our nation in the war on terror and to give protection to our men and women in uniform, particularly if they are captured. Anyone may disagree with elements of the final product, but an accurate understanding of the legislation is essential to all sides of the debate.

Messrs. Warner, McCain and Graham are Republican senators for Virginia, Arizona and South Carolina, respectively.

In Fog Of War On Terror, Some Rules Set (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

War is rarely kind to civil liberties. From the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 to the suspension of habeas corpus during the Civil War to the forced internment of some 120,000 Japanese in the US during World War II, the nation has repeatedly grappled with how to balance security and rights.

Now - in the middle of a war on terror and nearing critical midterm elections - Congress has taken another stab at achieving that balance. In historic votes last week, lawmakers banned torture, rape, and murder in the interrogation of terrorist suspects. But they left to the president to determine what techniques short of "serious" physical or mental pain or suffering are still allowed.

They also voted to give immunity to those involved in secret interrogations before last year's torture ban and to allow evidence obtained by "cruel and inhuman treatment" before that date to be used in military trials.

And in the most tightly contested decision of the week, lawmakers denied detainees in the war on the terror the right to challenge their detention in US courts. That means that anyone that the president or the secretary of Defense determines to be an enemy combatant - including noncitizens living legally in the United States - can be held indefinitely without trial.

In a wrap-up of the week's votes - including $448 billion for defense spending and $35 billion for homeland security in fiscal year 2007, as well as a mandate to build 700 miles of fence along the southern border - Republican leaders said the US will be "safer, stronger, and more prosperous" because of these laws.

"The specificity that the bill provides to the War Crimes Act - and its retroactive effect - will actually make prosecuting war criminals a realistic goal. None of my colleagues should object to that goal," said Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, who led the drive to ban torture in 2005, in a statement after the vote.

But critics say that, unlike the torture ban, the Military Commissions Act of 2006 is one that the nation will come to regret, just as it has regretted other lapses of civil liberties during times deemed national emergencies.

"This is a debate about whether we are willing to preserve the fundamental protections our nation has fought for centuries to maintain," said Rep. Doris Matsui (D) of California, who cited her family's personal experience in the Japanese detentions in the US during World War II.

The debate is hardly new.

In July 1798, President John Adams signed into law the Alien and Sedition Acts, allowing him to deport any foreigner he deemed dangerous and to ban any spoken or written criticism of the president.

The four laws aimed to protect the nation from security threats from France, but the votes in Congress broke along party lines. The Federalist-controlled Congress aimed to mute criticism from Jefferson's Republicans.

"Wartime is traditionally a period of infringement of civil liberties. The Alien and Sedition Acts took place in a quasi-war with France, but the incoming [Republican] administration allowed the law to expire when the crisis was over," says Donald Ritchie, a Senate historian.

When President Lincoln suspended the writ of habeas corpus in 1862, rioters in Baltimore were threatening to destroy train tracks to block Union troops from reaching the capital and the Maryland legislature was threatening secession. The Constitution allowed suspension of the writ "in cases of rebellion or invasion," he said.

But critics of last week's vote say the decision to suspend a right as fundamental to Western law as habeas corpus was not justified by the facts on the ground. There is no rebellion or imminent invasion, they say.

"I'm not going to support a bill that's blatantly unconstitutional ... that suspends a right that goes back to [Magna Carta in] 1215," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R) of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. He sponsored an amendment to delete the ban on habeas corpus from last week's bill that narrowly failed on a near party-line vote.

"I'd be willing, in the interest of party loyalty, to turn the clock back 500 years, but 800 years goes too far," he added, although he did vote for the final version of the bill.

In the end, all but one Democrat voted to preserve habeas corpus for military detainees and all but four Republicans - Sens. Specter, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Gordon Smith of Oregon, and John Sununu of New Hampshire - voted to suspend that right for those deemed enemy combatants.

"People deeply interested in the issue are the exception rather than the rule," says Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska, the lone Democrat to vote with Republicans to approve the suspension of habeas corpus for military detainees. "People respect Senator McCain on the issue, and he's reflecting a lot of views in Nebraska," he adds.

In final votes on the Military Commissions Act of 2006, the House passed the bill by a vote of 250-170, with seven Republicans voting against the bill and 32 Democrats voting for it. In the Senate, where the bill passed by a vote of 65 to 34, one Republican and 12 Democrats broke with their party. Many of the Democrats voting for the bill face tight midterm elections this fall, as does Senator Chafee, the lone GOP dissenter.

"The Constitution is not a suicide pact," says Senator Sununu, who also voted for the final bill after opposing suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

"We're trying to strike a balance between those rights and processes we should afford everyone, even if they're suspected of grievous acts, with need given the scope of the threat to have very robust tools and very efficient procedures for detention and prosecution," he adds.

A Last-Minute Deal On Detainees (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

After weeks of fighting, Congress passed a bill last week governing the treatment and prosecution of terrorism suspects, marking a victory for President Bush and the GOP-at least momentarily-in the run-up to the midterm elections.

Following House approval of the bill on Wednesday, the Senate voted 65 to 34 to approve the measure on Thursday, with 12 Democrats crossing party lines to vote for the legislation. But even though the president is expected to sign the bill shortly, some lawmakers warned that the Supreme Court might still overturn part of the law, just as the high court overturned the president's original concept for military tribunals back in June.

The bill would prohibit several kinds of abuses of detainees, as defined under the Geneva Conventions, but leave it to the president to say exactly what interrogation techniques are allowable. The bill also sets up military tribunals that allow some use of evidence obtained through coercion but gives defendants partial access to classified evidence being used against them. In addition, the measure expands the definition of "enemy combatants" to include noncitizens living legally in the United States and those who provide weapons, money, or support to terrorist groups.

Differing views. "This bill will help keep Americans safe by creating military commissions to prosecute terrorists for war crimes and by preserving an intelligence program that has disrupted terrorist plots," said Sen. Majority Leader Bill Frist, reflecting the view of many on Capitol Hill.

But others wondered whether the measure could survive judicial review. They said the Supreme Court might object to provisions that eliminate a detainee's ability to challenge detention. "This bill," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, "is not a check on the administration but a voucher for future wrongdoing."

Letting The President Say (TIME)

By By Michael Duffy

Time, October 9, 2006

A few days afterÂ terrorists toppledÂ the World Trade Center in 2001, Vice President Dick Cheney said the U.S. would have to "work ... the dark side" in order to destroy Osama bin Laden's network. Just what the dark side could mean became clearer last month when George Bush suddenly announced that 14 suspected al-Qaeda terrorists had been shipped from mysterious overseas locations to the U.S. detention center at GuantÃ¡namo Bay, Cuba. It was the first White House confirmation of a secret CIA-operated network of overseas prisons, places where unorthodox methods of interrogation were not unknown. "Were it not for this program," Bush said, referring to the secret prisons and the things done there, "al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland."

When Congress adopted legislation last week to establish military commissions to try terrorist suspects, it also gave approval to that program and then some. By allowing coerced testimony to be entered as evidence in trials, Congress potentially legitimized torture as a means of obtaining information. It left the President in charge of filling in the details of what the allowable methods should be. The clearest limit to what might be done was actually not so clear. The new methods could not constitute "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions. But after all the huffing and puffing from Republican Senators John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, the Executive Branch kept control over what exactly could happen to an "enemy combatant." It was allowed to decide who an enemy combatant might be. The package of measures widened the definition to include any person determined to be one under criteria defined by the President or the Secretary of Defense.

More than that, the measures adopted by Congress last week stripped defendants of the ancient habeas corpus right to challenge their detention in court--a step that makes it possible that the Supreme Court will strike down some portion of the law and send everybody back to the drawing board. "The Supreme Court has made clear on three recent occasions that those whom the White House labels enemy combatants are entitled to challenge their detention before a federal judge," says Eric Freedman, a law professor at Hofstra University who is a legal consultant to GuantÃ¡namo detainees. "This new law was passed in outright defiance of those rulings."

What the legislation is likely to do even sooner is put the CIA's secret-prison program back online. That's right: back online. Although when he revealed its existence, the President left the impression he had suspended the program in response to a June Supreme Court ruling, that's not so. What neither he nor Congress nor the CIA has publicly acknowledged is that the agency halted the "special interrogations" in its secret prisons more than nine months ago. People briefed on the matter tell TIME that the agency backed away from its program in December 2005 as Congress passed an amendment to the 2006 defense bill banning "cruel, inhuman or degrading" treatment of prisoners in U.S. custody. According to other U.S. officials, then CIA Director Porter Goss feared that the amendment, sponsored by McCain, might undercut the legal authority for CIA interrogations. So Goss put those procedures on hold while seeking a legal opinion from the Justice Department.

For the next nine months, says a person briefed on activity in the program, some at the agency developed a bias for killing its targets instead of bringing them in for questioning, though sources add that ground conditions make capture impossible anyway. Goss's suspension order left officers in the agency's directorate of operations, says the source, repeatedly asking the question, What are we going to do with these guys if we capture them? So far in 2006, as government sources and public reports indicate, few if any terrorist suspects have been captured by the CIA. But at least four--including bombmaker Abu Khabab al-Masri, on the FBI's most-wanted list--have been killed, in most cases by remotely fired missiles from Predator drones.

The rules adopted last week may mean a return to the practice of capture and question. But question how? Just what interrogation methods are off the table now? Depends on whom you talk to. McCain, who along with Graham and Warner had fought the Administration on some of the most coercive methods, insisted to reporters last week that the harshest techniques--such as waterboarding, stress positions, extreme sleep deprivation and hypothermia--could now be illegal. "For all the gloating from the Administration," says Tom Malinowski of Human Rights Watch, "they are not getting what they want on torture." And what methods are O.K.? No one inside or outside the CIA will say. Which may mean we're going to be fighting on "the dark side" for some time to come. With reporting by Timothy J. Burger, Massimo Calabresi, Adam Zagorin/Washington

Democrats On Al Qaeda (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072666

Democrats keep insisting that, whatever their opposition to the war in Iraq, they'd be as tough as anyone in fighting al Qaeda. We'd love to believe this for the country's sake, but then what are Americans to make of last week's Congressional vote on detainee interrogation and military tribunals?

The bill was a compromise between the White House and three GOP Senators who Democrats had been hailing as voices of independent courage only days earlier. But rather than endorse this deal that put limits on interrogation methods (see nearby), Democrats in both houses voted overwhelmingly no. In the House, only 34 Democrats supported the bill, most of those from the South or rural areas, while the entire leadership and 160 Democrats voted no.

Over in the Senate, 32 Democrats opposed the bill, including the leadership and everyone who's been mentioned as a potential Presidential candidate in 2008: Hillary Clinton, Evan Bayh, John Kerry, Joe Biden, Chris Dodd, Russ Feingold. The dozen who voted yes are either up for re-election or from swing states. If an election weren't coming, we doubt there'd have even been that many. The Democratic "ayes" included Senate candidates Sherrod Brown of Ohio and Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, both partisan liberals on all issues except, suddenly, this one.

This amazing vote only reinforces the Republican argument that, given the chance, Democrats would return to the pre-9/11, law-enforcement model of fighting terrorism. In voting "no," they were opposing aggressive interrogation of even the worst al Qaeda captives. If Democrats fall short of regaining Congress this year, votes like this will be the reason.

'The More Subtle Kind Of Torment' (WP)

By Joseph Margulies

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

In these uncertain times, it's worth recalling that the threat posed by weapons of mass destruction in the hands of madmen is not new. Nearly 50 years before Sept. 11, 2001, the American public learned that a group of prisoners in military custody confessed to being part of an elaborate conspiracy to bomb civilian targets with bacteriological weapons.

The first prisoner to crack said the goal was "the mass annihilation of the civilian population." As often happens, his confession led to others, and before long, three dozen prisoners had coughed up page after page of chilling, meticulously detailed admissions.

But it was all a lie. Thirty-six American airmen, shot from the sky during the Korean War, falsely confessed to a vast plot to bomb civilian targets. How did this happen? With Congress having approved a "compromise" that gives the president authority to determine the meaning of the Geneva Conventions and redefines the War Crimes Act to protect CIA interrogators, we should revisit this all-but-forgotten moment in U.S. history.

During the Korean War, thousands of American POWs were forced to endure grotesque and sadistic physical torture. But the downed airmen were treated differently. The senior officer among them was Col. Frank Schwable, the highest-ranking Marine captured in the conflict. "I want to emphasize," Schwable said later, "that I did not undergo physical torture. Perhaps I would have been more fortunate if I had, because people nowadays seem to understand that better. Mine was the more subtle kind of torment."

The airmen were subjected to something new: touchless torture. They were kept isolated from all human contact, apart from their interrogators. One prisoner spent 10 months in solitary confinement, another 13. Schwable did not learn of the armistice until after he confessed.

They were made to stand or sit in awkward and painful positions for hours at a time. One prisoner had to sit at attention on the edge of a stool for 15 hours per day for 33 days. Another time he had to stand for 30 consecutive hours, until he collapsed. Schwable was required to sit at attention every day for almost 10 weeks.

They were demeaned, taunted and treated like animals. Schwable said the guards "growled" or "barked" at him, slopped food at him, and made him defecate in public. "Every effort was made to degrade and humiliate me," he said.

And of course they were interrogated. Grueling interrogations that lasted hours and hours, repeating the same material they had gone over the day before, and the day before that, until the past became a confusing whirl of fact and fantasy suggested to them by their relentless interlocutors. At last, exhausted and demoralized, their resistance overcome, they confessed. They all confessed in the end. And they all lied.

Maj. William Harris later tried to explain to an incredulous public how he could falsely accuse his country of something so barbaric as a conspiracy to bomb civilians, especially if he wasn't "tortured." "They don't have to lay a hand on you to make you the most miserable person in the world," he said. "I would rather take a beating any day than be subjected to their type of questioning and treatment."

After the war North Korean atrocities were roundly condemned by the United States, which complained to the United Nations that the Koreans had not complied with the Geneva Conventions. One institution, however, was not repelled but intrigued. The experience led the CIA to accelerate its research into the theory and science of coercive interrogation.

Between 1950 and 1962, the CIA poured millions of dollars into studies that tested different interrogation techniques, hoping to learn from and refine the lessons of Korea. The research culminated in the top-secret KUBARK manual, a 1963 primer on how to conduct coercive counterintelligence interrogations. The manual was finally disclosed in 1997 and is now available online.

KUBARK operates on the premise that a prisoner will divulge what he knows once he realizes that resistance is pointless. The prisoner must believe his captors are "all-powerful." Confusion, fear and isolation are the interrogator's stock in trade, since they "create and amplify an effect of omniscience."

Interrogators must create a menacing and ominous environment that destroys the prisoner's capacity to function as a "civilized man." Prisoners should be kept disoriented because "the capacity for resistance is diminished by disorientation."

The prisoner's environment must be manipulated to produce a "regression of the personality to whatever earlier and weaker level is required for the dissolution of resistance." This usually doesn't take much. "Relatively small degrees of homeostatic derangement, fatigue, pain, sleep loss, or anxiety" are generally sufficient.

When in doubt, the interrogator should always keep in mind this useful advice: In order to achieve " the maximum amount of mental discomfort ," (emphasis in original), your prisoner must be instilled with a sense of "debility, dependence, and dread." "When this aim is achieved, resistance is seriously impaired." The prisoner enters "a kind of psychological shock or paralysis." At that moment, "the source is far more open to suggestion [and] far likelier to comply."

Will mild "homeostatic derangement" be deemed acceptable under the legislation just passed by Congress -- a little sleep deprivation here, some extended standing there, perhaps a few more hours in the cold room, a wee drop of solitary confinement now and again, extended isolation from the outside world? Nothing like "real" torture, since everyone knows that's unreliable.

Regrettably, we may not hear the answer in the sad, distant voices of three dozen American airmen. There is a lesson in their cries, if only we'd listen.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, October 2, 2006

The New York Yankees feature large in upstate Republican Rep.Sherwood Boehlert's life. And for the first time in 24 years, that's a good thing. Because this post-season-and World Series, to hear "Sherry" brag on-he'll have a chance to sit in Yankee Stadium instead of campaigning in Utica and Cooperstown for re-election. He's retiring. "Just to give you an example of how this year's been different," he tells our Bret Schulte, "September 3 in an election year, I usually have two or three chicken barbecues and maybe a walk in a Labor Day parade. This September 3, I was sitting in the front row behind the dugout in Yankee Stadium with two of my daughters and grandkids."

You could say he's a rare example of congressional retirement. While others hang around Washington to lobby, Boehlert's giving back to his family. "What about us?" they asked him. So he's obliging, as long as they like baseball. And how could they not? His district includes the Baseball Hall of Fame, which he's already hit up for playoff tickets. "They're the best seats in the house," he says of Cooperstown's front-row dugout spots. He knows: At that September 3 game, centerfielder Johnny Damon rolled a ball to his grandson. Then third base coach Larry Bowa rolled one to his granddaughter. "They thought I was 10 feet tall," he says with a grin. And for the record: He predicts a 27th world championship. Sorry, Mets fans.

A Sneak Preview and an Ashton Fix

The sprawling and stiff Department of Homeland Security, parent agency of the U.S. Coast Guard, is getting pretty jazzed about The Guardian, starring dreamy Ashton Kutcher and oldie-but-goodie Kevin Costner. We hear the agency plans to rent out a Georgetown movie theater for a DHS-only screening of the new Coastie flick. And what a welcome change that would be: Younger workers say DHS used to be a lot more fun before the buttoned-up Michael Chertoff took over. Maybe he'll buy the popcorn.

Make No Mistake: Bush Wants OBL

All this recent talk about whether President Bush tried as hard as former President Clinton to nail Osama bin Laden had us wondering just how bad the prez wants the terrorist. Real bad, it seems. One key insider says that Bush is nearly obsessed with "OBL," as he's called. "He's very taken with the hunt, and it is very much a priority on his mind," says terrorism adviser Frances Townsend. "He has an extraordinary memory for detail. He has an extraordinary ability to recall particular details, plots, individuals, to ask questions about it. And I will tell you that he asks very specific questions on the hunt for bin Laden on a regular basis."

Just Don't Say Iran Caved In-Please

Good news on those Iran-European Union talks over stopping Tehran's bid to build a nuke: Iran's likely to suspend its uranium enrichment program if nobody really calls it that. Insiders say they want some face-saving language in any deal that makes it look like they didn't cave in to western pressure. "They can call it whatever they want," a U.S. official says, "but they have to stop the work" before formal talks including Washington can begin.

Q&A Pervez Musharraf

Pervez Musharraf knows how to make a splash with a book tour. In the week that his new memoir, In the Line of Fire, hit stores, the Pakistani President feuded publicly with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, had tea and Twinkies on The Daily Show with Jon Stewart, ate dinner at the White House, and was greeted in London by Tony Blair and a leaked British defense document accusing Pakistan's intelligence agency of having ties to al-Qaeda. Somehow, he also managed to squeeze in a chat with TIME in New York.

The Afghan government says Pakistan is responsible for the resurgence of the Taliban.

The U.N. Secretary-General's report says that the foot soldiers of the insurgency are Afghans. I've been saying that for the last three months, even though President Karzai and everyone else says they're from Pakistan. Today Karzai said [Taliban leader] Mullah Omar is in Quetta. This is a ridiculous assertion. Mullah Omar has never come to Quetta. Not since 1995 has he come to Pakistan. He is based in Kandahar and is still there.

There have been recent reports that Osama bin Laden may have died. Do you believe them?

I have no such information. I spoke to my intelligence chief, and he did not substantiate this point.

Do you believe bin Laden is in Pakistan?

These are things that agitate me. I could say he could be in any country. But I never say that because I don't know. We have excellent intelligence sources, so if we don't know where he is, I don't know how anyone else knows. We don't know where he is. We are guessing.

If you sent in a larger number of forces, would you have a better chance of finding him?

We'll go anywhere if we have any indication that he is there. We are trying to look for him. But we're dealing with mountainous areas. There are no roads. These are fiercely independent people--they are all armed, everyone carrying a weapon. This is the kind of terrain we're dealing with. It's not easy.

The Black Hole Of A U.N. Blacklist (WSJ)

By David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

LONDON -- Governments around the world have drawn criticism for some extrajudicial steps taken to corral suspected terrorists, from secret prisons to surreptitious abductions to deportations that could lead to torture or execution.

Meanwhile, a program overseen by the United Nations Security Council has stripped hundreds of people of assets and international-travel rights -- and even the right to earn a salary or buy groceries -- without so much as a hearing, let alone trial or appeal. Apart from suspects' lawyers and a European human-rights watchdog, the program has drawn little scrutiny.

Today, 359 people are on this blacklist created by Security Council Resolution 1267. No court process is involved in adding someone to the list, nor is it debated by the council's member states. Those added have no right to present exculpatory evidence to Security Council members, nor any right of appeal.

Cutting Off Funding

The U.S. and other governments say these sanctions are an important weapon in the fight against international terrorism, cutting suspects off from the money they need to communicate and operate, either from jail or when the law would otherwise let them go free.

Opponents say the program has lost its original purpose and is used by governments to evade due process in pursuit of alleged terrorists and their accomplices. Critics also decry the opportunity for governments to abuse the system by framing dissidents and others who draw official disfavor.

"This isn't about preventing terrorism. This is punishment without trial," says German lawyer Gül Pinar, who represents several people in Germany who are on the U.N. list.

A Security Council report in March aired concerns about how effective the program has been against terrorism. In a letter to the panel's president, the chairman of the committee that oversees the list cited inconsistent enforcement among nations, noting many suspects continue to cross borders.

Resolution 1267 was passed in 1999 to pressure Afghanistan's Taliban rulers to hand over Osama bin Laden after Washington accused him of masterminding the 1998 bombing of U.S. embassies in Africa. Rather than impose broad economic sanctions, which would hurt the Afghan population, the Security Council aimed to isolate and punish Taliban leaders. A year later, the restrictions were applied to Mr. bin Laden and some of his associates.

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the U.S., Resolution 1267 has been used against a much wider group, including suspected and convicted al Qaeda operatives and their networks. Some people on the U.N. list have been tried and convicted of terrorist-related offenses and are in jail. Some, like Mr. bin Laden, are or were fugitives. Others inhabit a grayer zone.

Take Saad al-Fagih, whom Saudi Arabia accuses of complicity in an attempted assassination and of helping to buy the satellite phone Mr. bin Laden used to direct the embassy bombings. Mr. Fagih has never been charged with a crime in the United Kingdom, where he lives. His designation on the U.N. list "is a critical part of the international campaign to counter terrorism," according to a U.S. Treasury Department statement.

Two cellphones chirp constantly as Mr. Fagih, a Saudi citizen, pilots a Honda Civic through busy London traffic en route to a four-bedroom townhouse in a tony neighborhood of northwest London. The home, like the car and the phones, is in his wife's name. Mr. Fagih denies any ties or past dealings with Mr. bin Laden: "If it were true, why haven't I been charged?" he asks.

Heino Vahldieck, the head of intelligence in Hamburg, Germany, says administrative pressure, such as 1267 sanctions, is used against men like Mr. Fagih when circumstantial evidence tying them to terrorism is considered overwhelming but criminal prosecution is difficult or impossible. "We need to be creative," he says.

Although most of the list's designated Taliban supporters are Afghan nationals, those accused of al Qaeda links are more diverse, including at least one U.S. citizen, three Britons, two Germans and five Saudi Arabian citizens. The blacklist includes at least 35 Tunisians, five Moroccans, 10 Egyptians and 77 individuals of indeterminate nationality, according to the U.N.'s official 1267 sanctions list.

Sanctions Survive Acquittal

DOJ_NMG_0072670

Last year, a court in Hamburg found Abdelghani Mzoudi -- a Moroccan student and former roommate of three Sept. 11 pilots -- not guilty on all charges of logistical support for those hijack attacks. Despite the acquittal, Mr. Mzoudi, who returned to Morocco after his trial, remains sanctioned under 1267 for his alleged support of al Qaeda.

Mamoun Darkazanli, who lives in Hamburg, was designated under 1267 in October 2001, shortly after he told police he spent Sept. 11 watching television with a man who later admitted -- under interrogation in Syria -- that he recruited three pilots for the attacks. Mr. Darkazanli, whose lawyer notes her client has never been convicted of a crime, was left destitute when banking restrictions made it impossible to run his import-export business. He survives on welfare payments authorized by the Security Council.

This year, the Council of Europe, an intergovernmental human-rights watchdog, said in a report requested by the U.N. that the 1267 process doesn't comply with Europe's convention on human rights because it provides no protection against arbitrary decisions and has no mechanism to review the accuracy of allegations governments make. Those targeted have no recourse against national governments, which can simply say they are bound to follow the dictates of the Security Council.

The procedure to designate someone an al Qaeda or Taliban supporter is simple. A government submits a name to the Security Council's 1267 committee, which circulates it among the 15 council members, along with supporting details. There are no formal standards of evidence required for designation, a diplomat involved in the process said, adding, "The 1267 committee is not a court. This is a political process."

Delistings Are Few

If no objection is made within five days, the person is added to the list. Their assets -- from bank accounts to private debts to prison-canteen funds -- are frozen and they lose the right to travel internationally. "Silence means, 'Yes, the sanction is confirmed,' " a U.N. spokeswoman said. Most sanction requests have been approved without challenge, although nine people have been delisted. Individuals don't get a hearing and can't submit evidence to refute the allegations. Nor can they apply to be delisted -- only a government can on their behalf.

Mr. Fagih says "nobody contacted me about the allegations" when his name went before the 1267 committee in 2004. He eventually learned of Saudi Arabia's charges, and the Security Council sanctions, from the British foreign office. His name was proposed by Saudi Arabia, which alleged that in 2003 Mr. Fagih received $1 million from a man who later confessed to plotting the assassination of the Saudi crown prince, according to the Treasury Department. Mr. Fagih denies involvement in the alleged plot and says he was targeted for organizing peaceful human-rights demonstrations.

Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security adviser at the kingdom's London embassy, says he investigated Mr. Fagih's case for three years and the charges against him are "rock solid." Saudi Arabia hasn't applied to extradite Mr. Fagih, because the U.K., like other European Union countries, refuses to extradite suspects to countries where they would face the death penalty, Mr. Obaid says.

Despite the U.N. sanctions, Mr. Fagih continues to broadcast from London for Al-Islah TV, a Saudi dissident television station that aims to overthrow the royal family. He says the impact of the U.N. sanctions on his life has been negligible.

"Nothing has changed," says Mr. Fagih, while serving tea and cakes from a silver tray in his office. Joking, he adds: "Except I can't buy a tank."

FBI Worries About An Osama-mobsters Link (USAT/AP)

By Pat Milton, Associated Press

USA Today, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The FBI's top counterterrorism official harbors lots of concerns: weapons of mass destruction, undetected homegrown terrorists and the possibility that old-fashioned mobsters will team up with al-Qaeda for the right price.

Though there is no direct evidence yet of organized crime collaborating with terrorists, the first hints of a connection surfaced in a recent undercover FBI operation. Agents stopped a man with alleged mob ties from selling missiles to an informant posing as a terrorist middleman.

That case and other factors are heightening concerns about a real-life episode of the Sopranos teaming with Osama bin Laden's followers.

DOJ_NMG_0072671

VIDEO: Osama and the Sopranos?

"We are continuing to look for a nexus," said Joseph Billy Jr., the FBI's top counterterrorism official. "We are looking at this very aggressively."

The new strategy involves an analysis of nationwide criminal investigations, particularly white collar crime, side by side with intelligence and terrorist activity.

"We have developed an ability to look harder and broader in a greatly enhanced way to see if there is any crossover," Billy said in an interview with the Associated Press.

Organized crime syndicates could facilitate money transfers or laundering, human smuggling, identification fraud or explosives and weapons acquisitions, officials said.

The options are many for terrorists groups.

There are the five reputed La Cosa Nostra families in New York, Russian criminal enterprises from Brighton Beach in the New York borough of Brooklyn to Moscow, and the emerging Asian crime syndicates that operate in many Islamic countries with al-Qaeda offshoots.

A contract study produced recently for the Pentagon and obtained by the AP warned that the potential for organized crime assisting terrorists is growing.

"Although terrorism and organized crime are different phenomena, the important fact is that terrorist and criminal networks overlap and cooperate in some enterprises," the study said. "The phenomenon of the synergy of terrorism and organized crime is growing because similar conditions give rise to both and because terrorists and organized criminals use similar approaches to promote their operations."

The traditional mafia has highly developed networks for acquiring goods and services and money, all for a price.

The mob's potential interest in helping a terrorist has nothing to do with ideology or sympathy but with greed, said Matt Heron, head of New York FBI's organized crime unit.

"They will deal with anybody, if they can make a buck," Heron said. "They will sell to a terrorist just as easily as they would sell to an order of Franciscan monks. It's a business relationship to them."

"If the mob has explosives and a terrorist wants them and they have the money, they could become instant friends," he said.

Pat D'Amuro, a retired senior FBI official and now chief executive of Giuliani Security, said a Mafia boss once acknowledged that the mob would help terrorists.

"I am aware of a high-level Mafia figure, who was cooperating with authorities, being asked if the Mafia would assist terrorists in smuggling people into Europe through Italy," D'Amuro said. "He said, 'The Mafia will help who ever can pay.'"

Officials said they have no specific evidence that such a relationship has been cemented. But concerns were heightened last year after an Armenian immigrant was arrested in New York for allegedly leading a plot to sell military weapons to an FBI informant posing as a middleman for terrorists.

Arthur Solomonyan had claimed to be able to deliver shoulder-fired missiles from his connection in Russian organized crime to the informant, who claimed to have ties to al-Qaeda, federal prosecutors said. Solomonyan and 17 others in New York, Florida and California were charged in the case.

Solomonyan is scheduled for trial this month. His lawyer, Seth Ginsberg, said he plans to "vigorously contest" the charges and call the government's confidential informant to the stand to challenge his motives. The Italian, Russian, and Asian mafia remain active, particularly in New York, even though the government has successfully prosecuted numerous figures in recent years.

In the past three years, well over 100 associates from all five La Cosa Nostra families have been arrested in New York, Heron noted.

While the potential of a gangster-terrorist marriage is on the FBI's radar, homegrown terror cells and weapons of mass destruction are also big concerns for those in the FBI given the job of stopping the next terrorist attack.

"We are not only aware that they want to come across the ocean to attack us but they may be physically here developing in our own homeland," Billy said.

DOJ_NMG_0072672

The Internet has become the new Afghanistan, allowing terrorist sympathizers to promote their radical ideas and to recruit and train followers right their home computers. That makes it far more difficult for investigators to identify them.

Billy said his biggest concern remains weapons of mass destruction. While Hezbollah and Hamas are more defined terrorist groups, with a territorial focus and a political platform, al-Qaeda is more unpredictable.

"We know they were trying to acquire it prior to 9/11, bin Laden's own words said that," said Billy. "What makes us think they are still not trying?"

Wait Ends For Father And Son Exiled By F.B.I. Terror Inquiry (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 1 — Two American citizens of Pakistani descent returned to the United States on Sunday, five months after they were denied permission to fly home to California unless they submitted to an interrogation by F.B.I. terrorism investigators.

The men, Muhammad Ismail, 45, and his son, Jaber, 19, of the Northern California farming town of Lodi, returned from Pakistan on a flight that landed at Kennedy Airport in New York around 3:30 p.m. Eastern time. They were scheduled to arrive in California on Sunday night or early Monday on a connecting flight, their lawyer said Sunday.

The Ismails are an uncle and cousin of Hamid Hayat, a Lodi man who was convicted in April in federal court of providing material support to terrorists. Mr. Hayat told investigators he had attended a terrorism training camp during a long stay in Pakistan and intended to carry out unspecified attacks in the United States. Mr. Hayat's father, Umer, was convicted on a lesser charge of lying to investigators about the amount of cash he carried to Pakistan on a 2003 trip, but a jury deadlocked on terrorism charges.

The Ismails were not charged in the case. They attributed their predicament to being related to the Hayats, the only people to have been charged in what federal prosecutors have described as an investigation into possible terrorism links in Lodi.

Julia Harumi Mass of the American Civil Liberties Union of Northern California, who is representing the Ismails, said the pair had no terrorism connections. In a complaint in August to the Department of Homeland Security, she urged the authorities to explain any accusations against them and why they had been denied permission to fly home.

Legal experts said the matter raised questions about balancing terrorism investigations against American citizens' right to travel freely without having been charged with a crime or detained as a suspect.

On Sept. 6, nearly a month after Ms. Mass's complaint, the Homeland Security Department notified her in a letter and telephone call that unspecified records had been modified "to address any delay or denial boarding" the pair had encountered. Ms. Mass said she took that to mean they were cleared to fly, and the Ismails arranged financing and bought tickets home.

"I never imagined that the country I was born in would stop me from coming home for five months and separate me from my family, especially when I was not charged with a crime," Jaber Ismail said in a statement released through the A.C.L.U.

Hamid Hayat had told investigators he believed that Jaber, who was born in Lodi, attended a terrorism camp, but he lacked details. Mr. Hayat's lawyers attacked the investigators' questioning of Mr. Hayat as vague and coerced. Muhammad Ismail, a naturalized citizen who was born in Pakistan, said in the statement that they had traveled to Pakistan so Jaber Ismail could pursue religious study there.

On April 21, as juries were weighing the Hayats' cases, the Ismails were not permitted to board a connecting flight to San Francisco from Hong Kong and returned to Pakistan, where Jaber Ismail was questioned by F.B.I. agents at the American embassy in Islamabad. The agents, Ms. Mass said, requested further interviews with him and his father and a polygraph, which the Ismails refused.

The United States attorney's office in Sacramento, which prosecuted the Hayats, has declined to comment on the investigation other than to acknowledge that agents wished to speak with the Ismails. A Homeland Security spokesman said he had no information about the case.

Publisher To Offer Inside Account Of Al Qaeda Operative (NYT)

By Julie Bosman

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072673

Basic Books says it will soon publish what it calls the first inside account of life as an Al Qaeda operative.

"Inside the Jihad: My Life with Al Qaeda, A Spy's Story," by Omar Nasiri, is a first-person narrative of Mr. Nasiri's time in an Al Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan in the 1990's, followed by a stint as a spy for a Western intelligence service.

The book, which is expected to be announced today and is scheduled to be published on Nov. 20, is a "detailed portrait of a complex man" with a "unique and chilling perspective," the publisher said in a press release.

But promoting "Inside the Jihad" will be tricky. "It will not be a traditional book tour," said David Steinberger, the chief executive of the Perseus Books Group, whose imprints include Basic Books, Da Capo Press and Running Press, among others. "There will be no author signings and no Oprah appearances and no morning shows."

Omar Nasiri, after all, is a pseudonym for someone who lives in hiding at an undisclosed location abroad, where he wrote the book over the last year. Mr. Nasiri will give only a few interviews, timed to the book's release, and given his ties to Al Qaeda will be unable to enter the United States. One of the interviews is expected to be with the BBC television program "Newsnight," but his face and voice will be digitally altered to protect his identity.

In the absence of an author able to speak for his work, the publisher is depending on other sources to lend credibility to "Inside the Jihad." Michael Scheuer, the former head of the Osama bin Laden unit within the Central Intelligence Agency, read the manuscript before publication, Mr. Steinberger said, and key facts in the book were vetted by members of various European security agencies.

Some consumers may be squeamish about buying a book written by a former Al Qaeda member, reformed or not, Mr. Steinberger acknowledged.

Still, he added, "There's only one way to get an accurate inside view of what goes on in Al Qaeda. The value of understanding what goes on there outweighs any other consideration."

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

Cash advantage

"The president's fund-raising sure helps," U.S. News & World Report reports in its White House Week column.

"Republicans in key congressional districts have now accumulated a big cash advantage over their Democratic rivals. Sources says that House Republican incumbents on the party's endangered list each have an average of $200,000 more on hand than their opponents," the magazine said.

"In the past, that kind of cash advantage has meant victory for more than 90 percent of candidates. Another good sign for the GOP: some of the most endangered Republican incumbents appear to be gaining momentum in their campaigns, according to GOP surveys."

Coming home

"If you have any doubts about the confusion of the Democrats, just look at the party's midterm strategy," Mark Halperin writes in the New York Times.

"On the one hand, Democrats are reluctant to push for liberal policies that would motivate their base. But the core of their enunciated message -- both vowing to stop the president's right-wing policies and blurring their differences with Republicans on highly charged issues -- has in recent elections been a recipe for defeat. Such equivocation is the kind of themeless pudding that does not match up well with the conviction of the White House message and is uninspiring to both the Democrats' base and the center," said Mr. Halperin, who is the political director of ABC News and co-author of "The Way to Win: Taking the White House in 2008."

"For months, the president was in severe political peril, with approval ratings regularly hovering around 30 percent, in large measure because he was missing the support of Republicans and Republican-leaning independents that is essential to his majority. Despite conservative disaffection with the White House over the past year on issues like spending (and even, in some cases, on Iraq), the latest polls show the GOP base is coming home -- and just in time. Base support is headed toward 90 percent, just about where it was before the 2002 and 2004 elections."

Ashcroft book

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft is to publish a memoir of his time in office, lashing critics of the Bush administration's strategy in the war on terror.

Advance copies of "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice," which is to be published this week, were not available, but one person close to Mr. Ashcroft told Shaun Waterman of United Press International that he "hits out hard at critics of the administration" and its war on terror.

He has particularly harsh words for some of the members of the September 11 commission, especially Democratic former Justice Department senior official Jamie Gorelick, the source says.

The publisher's blurb says Mr. Ashcroft's position as the administration's most senior law-enforcement official gave him "a uniquely comprehensive -- and uniquely chilling -- view of the threats to American security," adding that Mr. Ashcroft discusses "the enactment and defense of the Patriot Act, the Robert Hansen spy scandal ... and the recently discovered domestic surveillance program authorized by President Bush."

Mr. Ashcroft, a conservative who became a lightning rod for criticisms of the administration's aggressive interpretation of the limits of presidential power, is slated to appear this morning on NBC's "Today" show to discuss his book.

Poll results

Democratic Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. is running even with Republican Bob Corker in Tennessee, while Democrat Jon Tester has edged ahead of Sen. Conrad Burns in Montana, according to polls released yesterday.

A Mason-Dixon poll found that Mr. Ford had the backing of 43 percent in Tennessee, while Mr. Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, was backed by 42 percent. Mr. Corker had a lead in midsummer polling matching the two.

Another Mason-Dixon poll found that Mr. Tester has pulled ahead of Mr. Burns in Montana, by 47 percent to 40 percent. They were tied in August polling.

Moving over

Robert Knight, who started the Culture & Family Institute at Concerned Women for America (CWA) in 2001, will be heading the new Institute on Culture and the Media (ICM) at the Media Research Center in Alexandria, beginning today.

"ICM will study how the media portray faith and traditional values, and how skewed media coverage undermines personal responsibility," Mr. Knight says.

Mr. Knight's relationship with CWA will continue this week, when he speaks Saturday at CWA's Leadership Conference in Arlington. He also will address a CWA event in Arizona later this month.

Myth-wrecker

"While Al Gore drifts into deeper darkness on the other side of the moon, propelled by such revelations as cigarette smoking is a 'significant contributor to global warming,' Sen. James Inhofe is becoming a one-man myth-wrecking crew," Investor's Business Daily says in an editorial.

"Inhofe, a Republican from Oklahoma, took to the Senate floor two days [recently] to expose the media's role in the global warming hype. This is a man who more than three years ago called the global warming scare 'the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people' and has made a habit of tweaking the left-leaning environmental lobby," the newspaper said.

"One member of the media, Miles O'Brien of CNN, responded ... to Inhofe's criticism of the media with a piece criticizing Inhofe and challenging his arguments. If anything, it seems that O'Brien's reply simply motivated Inhofe to continue his effort to undress the media's complicity and bring light to the issue.

"We hope so. The 'science' on global warming and the media's propaganda campaign need to be picked apart.

"The assumptions made by gloomy theorists should be revealed for what they are: mere conjecture.

"The lies and carefully crafted implications, many of them discharged like toxic pollutants by a former vice president, deserve a thorough and lasting deconstruction.

"What the public needs -- and deserves -- is a credible voice to counter the sermons from Gore, on whose behalf cigarettes were distributed in 2000 to Milwaukee homeless people who were recruited by campaign volunteers to cast absentee ballots. Inhofe could be that voice."

Book review

DOJ_NMG_0072675

In a series of appearances on the talk-show circuit yesterday, White House counselor Dan Bartlett dismissed parts of Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," saying the veteran reporter had "already formulated some conclusions even before the interviewing began" for the book.

During an appearance on ABC's "This Week," Mr. Bartlett described as a "grossly misleading characterization" that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice dismissed warnings from intelligence officials about the threat of al Qaeda before the September 11 attacks.

However, Mr. Bartlett did confirm Mr. Woodward's report that White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. approached President Bush after the 2004 election and suggested he replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. However, he denied rumors Mr. Bush was seeking to replace Mr. Rumsfeld. "The president has confidence in Don Rumsfeld," Mr. Bartlett said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Testing Foreign Air Marshals (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

EGG HARBOR, N.J. -- Eighteen Chinese air marshals were recently put to the test -- the same test faced by their U.S. counterparts. They learned to subdue an armed hijacker, leap down evacuation slides and deal with a bomb found aboard a plane.

The 18 Chinese security officers were part of an international exchange program that brings foreign air marshals to the high-tech and sprawling training compound here that is used by U.S. air marshals. Beijing requested the training because the air marshals will soon be patrolling flights by Chinese carriers that are bound for the United States, authorities said.

Since July 2005, more than 100 air marshals from seven countries -- including Mexico, Poland and Japan -- have participated in the program, which lasts one to two weeks. Foreign governments finance most of the training.

U.S. officials said that the exchange program allows air marshals to study advanced techniques at the high-tech training center. It also gives them an idea of U.S. laws and use-of-force requirements when dealing with suspects.

The U.S. government will not disclose the exact number of air marshals but says it has thousands on the payroll -- up from 33 on Sept. 11, 2001. Joseph J. D'Angelillio, special agent in charge of the training center, said that other countries have rushed to put more air marshals on flights since the 2001 attacks.

"Basically, we are trying to find commonalities, to get the best practices, and get this patchwork quilt put together so we have a very even and transparent aviation security system," D'Angelillio said of the exchange program.

U.S., EU Hit Snag In Air-Data Talks (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Negotiators for the U.S. and European Union failed to reach a deal for sharing confidential airline-passenger information, setting the stage for a possible showdown over U.S. plans for greater security data-mining.

Department of Homeland Security officials said in the absence of a deal, the U.S. would use European airline-passenger information as "we deem necessary to protect the American people."

European officials fear attempts by U.S. officials to share the data with law-enforcement officials in violation of EU law could spark lawsuits and a diplomatic standoff that could ground commercial flights between Europe and the U.S.

Airlines refusing to provide passenger lists to the U.S. may lose landing rights in the country, but those that do provide the lists risk facing legal action under EU member states' data-protection legislation. European Commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said attempts to resolve the deadlock would continue.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has called the sharing of passenger-name record, or PNR, data on incoming flights from the European Union a vital tool to identify possible terrorists before they reach the U.S. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the U.S. demanded that all airlines provide passenger data -- including information such as credit-card numbers, travel itineraries, addresses and telephone numbers -- for all inbound flights. But a subsequent U.S.-EU agreement was ruled illegal by the highest European court in May, giving the EU until midnight this past Saturday to reach a new arrangement.

DOJ_NMG_0072676

A total of 34 pieces of information about each individual passenger must be transferred to American authorities within 15 minutes of a flight's departure to the U.S. under the lapsed agreement.

Some airlines have more than 60 pieces of information about passengers, to which U.S. officials have sought access.

According to U.S. and European officials close to the talks, a deal was almost finalized Saturday when Mr. Chertoff introduced new demands and the Europeans balked. Officials provided no details about those demands, but Mr. Chertoff has said publicly on many occasions that Homeland Security wants to share European PNR information with investigators from other U.S. law-enforcement agencies as well as with U.S. allies. Under European law and the lapsed EU deal, however, the department can't share the data beyond U.S. Customs and Border Protection, which checks the data against U.S. terrorist watch lists.

After the EU negotiators left Washington, Mr. Chertoff spoke several times with Franco Frattini, the European commissioner for justice, freedom and security, and a Homeland Security spokesman said the two were "confident" an agreement could be reached soon. Mr. Chertoff then sent what he called a draft agreement to EU representatives that he initialed for "final ratification."

EU officials called the move a "diplomatic ploy." "Chertoff is attempting to create a unilateral agreement where there is none," said one EU official.

Homeland Security officials denied the charge, saying it was an attempt by Mr. Chertoff to present European ministers with a document the U.S. was prepared to sign. The EU's interior and justice ministers are due to take up the issue Thursday.

Australian Suspect At Gitmo To Be Tried (AP)

By Rod Mcguirk

AP, October 2, 2006

CANBERRA, Australia -- The only Australian held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, will be among the first terror suspects tried by the overhauled U.S. military commission system within months, Australia's attorney general said Sunday.

With domestic pressure mounting on the center-right government over how long alleged Taliban fighter David Hicks has spent at the U.S. naval base in Cuba, Attorney General Philip Ruddock met with his U.S. counterpart Alberto Gonzales last week to press for a speedy resolution. He returned home Sunday.

"It ought to be a matter that can be dealt with quickly. We've said it should be dealt with quickly and they've said to us it will be among the first cases to be heard," Ruddock told Australian Broadcasting Corp. television.

"They don't think it will be within weeks _ obviously the process of regulations, choosing those who will serve on the commissions will take perhaps even some months _ but they're very conscious of our view that this needs to happen very expeditiously," he said.

Hicks, a 31-year-old former kangaroo skinner, was arrested by the Northern Alliance in Afghanistan in December 2001 and was later charged with attempted murder, conspiracy to commit war crimes and aiding the enemy.

Congress last week approved legislation that addressed a U.S. Supreme Court ruling in June that the commissions were illegal. But regulations have yet to be put in place and new charges would need to be drafted, Ruddock aid.

The legislation Congress sent President Bush Friday endorses his plan to interrogate and prosecute terror suspects and sets the rules for court proceedings. It would only apply to those selected by the military for prosecution and leaves mostly unaffected the majority of the 14,000 prisoners in U.S. custody, most of whom are in Iraq.

The Pentagon had previously selected 10 prisoners at Guantanamo Bay prison to be tried and Bush is expected also to try some or all of the 14 suspects held by the CIA in secret prisons and recently transferred to military custody at Guantanamo.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

5 Years After Anthrax Attacks, Investigators Still Have No Answers (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072677

When Bob Stevens, a photo editor in Boca Raton, died of anthrax poisoning five years ago, he became the first U.S. casualty in a new era of bioterrorism threats.

In the days and weeks to follow, four others who contracted anthrax from tainted mail died -- two postal workers in Washington, D.C., a New York City hospital stockroom employee and an elderly Connecticut woman. At least 17 others fell ill but survived during that uneasy autumn after the 9-11 attacks.

Whoever devised the deadly letters slipped back underground -- there have been no anthrax mailings since. The unknown attacker transformed the American consciousness, in part because a potential biological attack seemed remote, until it became a reality.

Hoax letters once tossed in the trash without a thought now merit a full hazardous materials response. Biodefense is a government priority, with billions of dollars dedicated to it. Even as some experts say anthrax would be the easiest biological weapon for terrorists to deploy, others say the threat is low because of the difficulty in obtaining, producing and effectively dispersing it.

What disturbs some bioterrorism experts is the lack of positive signs the FBI will ever solve the mystery.

"Every year that passes, the probability of solving it becomes less and less," said Bill Patrick, a former military anthrax researcher. "It's been five years now. I don't see a solution forthcoming."

That uncertainty hangs over Maureen Stevens, who lost her husband of 27 years. Bob Stevens, 63, fell ill and was hospitalized on Oct. 2, 2001. He died three days later, and Maureen Stevens has no more answers today than she did then.

"I just want to know how it could happen, as much as how it happened, how easy it was for someone to do this," she said recently. "I would really like to know how they did it, why they did it, and what they hoped to achieve."

Though the investigation appears stalled, the FBI says the "Amerithrax" investigation remains a priority, with 17 agents and 10 postal inspectors assigned to the case.

"Despite the frustrations that come with any complex investigation, no one in the FBI has, for a moment, stopped thinking about the innocent victims of these attacks, nor has the effort to solve this case in any way been slowed," Joseph Persichini Jr., acting assistant director of the FBI's Washington Field Office, said in a recent statement.

The FBI initially focused on scientists who worked within U.S. biodefense programs with access to government strains of Ames anthrax and sophisticated labs.

It now appears the person or group behind the attacks didn't require highly specialized scientific training to manufacture the anthrax, potentially opening up a much larger pool of suspects. Some experts previously characterized the anthrax as "weaponized" to make its spores smaller, lighter and more deadly.

An FBI scientist, Douglas Beecher, recently published an article in Applied and Environmental Microbiology saying the spores didn't get special coatings to make the anthrax disperse more effectively.

"A widely circulated misconception is that the spores were produced using additives and sophisticated engineering supposedly akin to military weapon production," Beecher wrote in the journal's August issue.

The FBI's first public comment on the nature of the anthrax is drawing attention from a scientific community that at times has been divided on how technologically accomplished the attacks were.

Patrick says the perpetrator knew his business, at least to the degree that an effective, deadly spore was produced.

"It was good material, not weapons grade -- highly concentrated and small particles," he said. "I don't think it's something you can go into your basement laboratory to do."

The first batch of letters went to media outlets -- the three major television networks and the New York Post in New York City, and to tabloid publisher American Media Inc. in Boca Raton, which publishes the Star and National Enquirer, and where Bob Stevens was a photo editor at the now defunct The Sun.

That anthrax was not as refined as the spores in two letters postmarked Oct. 9 and sent to U.S. Sens. Tom Daschle and Patrick Leahy. The Senate letters had higher concentrations of anthrax -- experts think the perpetrator got better at producing the spores. The FBI's Beecher wrote that even microbes left in a cruder state than weaponized spores can be dangerous.

DOJ_NMG_0072678

"You can use fairly simple methods to make a fairly sophisticated powder," said David Siegrist, a bioterrorism expert at the Potomac Institute for Policy Studies in Virginia. "I think everybody believes it was very sophisticated powder, but it didn't use traditional routes [of weaponization] to get there."

For a time, the FBI focused on a former biological weapons researcher, Steven Hatfill, whose apartment was searched twice in the summer of 2002. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft called him a "person of interest," but no charges were filed. Hatfill is now suing the government.

The anthrax mailings radically changed some government priorities, increasing biodefense spending from roughly $150 million in the late 1990s to an estimated $7.5 billion last year, according to one study.

The increased biodefense spending is being used to study the threat, the biological agents that could be used and the best ways to respond to an attack. Almost $1 billion is earmarked for a new anthrax vaccine and an antitoxin, and an older vaccine and antibiotics are being stockpiled. Shipments of the new vaccine were to start this fall, but problems have pushed back delivery until at least 2008.

The first-responders to any biological threat -- the police, paramedics and firefighters -- now receive more specialized training specifically for such an event. Training is coordinated between local, state and federal agencies.

"The resources are in place for the state. South Florida in particular has the largest number of hazardous material technicians in the state," said Mike Jachles, a spokesman for Broward County Fire-Rescue.

Palm Beach County Fire-Rescue Capt. Don DeLucia says not every contingency can be anticipated.

"A large event is going to be difficult to manage no matter how much you prepare for it. You cannot possibly prepare 100 percent for everything."

But there are some bioterrorism specialists who think the threat is overblown.

Milton Leitenberg, a senior research scholar at the University of Maryland's Center for International and Security Studies, says government officials and others are deliberately exaggerating the biological threat, even though no terror organizations have demonstrated the ability to carry out such attacks. He has been critical of the $7 billion yearly biodefense budget. "I don't believe there is any great threat," he said.

While progress has been made in preparing the nation for a biological attack, many experts say the country still is not ready for a small-scale attack, let alone an effective release of biological agents in an urban center.

"What we saw in 2001 was a minuscule attack with anthrax. A large attack would involve tens or hundreds of thousands of people," said Dr. Eric Toner, a senior associate with the University of Pittsburgh's Center for Biosecurity who specializes in medical emergency preparedness. "We have accomplished a lot in five years, but we have lot more to be done. I'm not satisfied that if we had an attack today we would be able to respond effectively."

DHS Reviews Claims Of Contract Conflicts (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The Homeland Security Department is reviewing whether managers with ties to Oak Ridge National Laboratory improperly influenced the decision to give $20 million to the laboratory since 2004 to help develop a list of the nation's top potential terrorist targets, according to DHS officials.

Officials are examining the roles played by two former Energy Department employees who were working for DHS as well as an Idaho National Laboratory employee who was on assignment to the department, said Undersecretary for Preparedness George W. Foresman.

Among Homeland Security's concerns is whether the men's relationships with the Energy Department inappropriately influenced funding decisions. There is little in the way of records to show how funding decisions were made, officials said.

The national labs are owned by the Energy Department and independently managed.

One of the staffers has been reassigned, nearly $40 million more destined for the lab has been placed on hold, and a team was sent Sept. 15 to Oak Ridge, Tenn., to scrutinize its work and determine whether to refocus its efforts, department officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0072679

Foresman said the department is acting in an abundance of caution because of recent complaints by Congress and watchdog groups about potential conflicts of interest among DHS contractors awarding research to their home institutions. In June, the DHS inspector general issued a sharply critical review of the target list program.

"There is no indication of any type of misconduct, but this is very much about making sure in the context of everything that we're doing we reflect the highest ethical standards," Foresman said.

The department created the target list, formally known as the National Asset Database, in 2003 and named Oak Ridge to host it, with little or no paperwork. A Congressional Research Service report this month warned that the 77,000-item list remains incomplete and is of limited value.

The scrutiny comes during infighting over poor financial management and budget cuts at Homeland Security's infrastructure protection office, which oversees the database, and which Secretary Michael Chertoff recently reorganized. The unit has been criticized for being slow to complete priorities such as securing chemical plants, helping first responders prevent bomb attacks and finalizing industry plans to protect vital facilities.

At least twice in the past nine months, critics have warned of potential ethical lapses in how DHS awards research grants. Congressional auditors reported in December that such grants lacked adequate documentation and could pose conflicts of interest.

Short of staff after its troubled 2003 launch, DHS placed employees loaned by the national laboratories in charge of five of 16 research programs. Auditors found that in 2004, 23 percent of DHS's $761 million science and technology directorate's research budget went to national laboratories.

James F. McDonnell, former head of the DHS risk management division and one of the former Energy Department employees under scrutiny, said the actions he and others took "were perfectly appropriate."

The department faced an urgent need to identify targets and lacked the computer capacity to do the job, said McDonnell, a career officer in the Navy and now a senior fellow at George Washington University's Homeland Security Policy Institute. McDonnell said he approached Oak Ridge National Laboratory and asked "if they would take it on and we would fund them to do it, and they said, 'Sure.' "

DHS can award work to national labs as if they are part of the department, skipping formal contracting requirements, McDonnell said, and the lab produced high-quality classified work. But private vendors have long wanted a bigger share of federal research, Foresman said.

Frank H. Akers Jr., a retired Army brigadier general and Oak Ridge associate lab director for national security, said, "We have followed federal guidelines for securing these work contracts."

The shuffle comes amid tension at the department's infrastructure protection and information system's unit, headed by Assistant Secretary Robert B. Stephan since April 2005 and placed under Foresman last fall.

The Homeland Security inspector general in June castigated the division's slow progress at identifying critical facilities and producing a national plan to secure them despite two presidential security directives since 1998. The database has grown from 160 items in 2003 to nearly 80,000 today, but it contains such entries as petting zoos and popcorn stands, doughnut shops, small-town parades and rural bean festivals. DHS officials said the list is only a reference source for a more selective list of 600 critical assets.

WAR NEWS:

White House Aides Take To Talk Shows To Dispute Book (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The White House intensified efforts yesterday to limit the political damage caused by a new book portraying the Bush administration as divided to the point of dysfunction over the war in Iraq, as top officials took to network talk shows to rebut the book's suggestion that President Bush has misled the nation about how dire the situation is there.

DOJ_NMG_0072680

Counselor Dan Bartlett, a top aide to Bush, said that despite assertions in "State of Denial," by Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward, the president has been forthright with the public about the challenges in Iraq.

"What's interesting about this book is that he doesn't connect his own dots," Bartlett said of Woodward on ABC's "This Week." In fact, "he references throughout the book time after time after time where the president was being presented with the bad information, was pushing the internal process to make sure we were adapting to the enemy, and he was sharing this news with the American people."

Bartlett appeared on three network news shows as part of a larger administration effort to push back against criticism being generated by the book, which draws a portrait of Bush growing increasingly isolated in his determination to stay the course in Iraq while his inner circle rejects recommendations to change direction.

Five weeks before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, and days after the disclosure of a National Intelligence Estimate that concluded that the Iraq war has increased the global terrorism movement, Democrats have seized on the book's disclosures to underscore their position that the administration has clung to its strategy regardless of the facts it faces.

"I think there's an evidence-free zone in the White House and the top levels of the Pentagon," Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, said on "Fox News Sunday."

The White House has issued long news releases disputing assertions made in the book, while current and former White House aides have taken to the airwaves to dispute or play down the significance of incidents reported in the book.

Bartlett took issue with the book's assertion that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was then national security adviser, failed to take action after then-CIA Director George J. Tenet warned her, during a meeting on July 10, 2001, of intelligence pointing toward an impending al-Qaeda attack. The book reports that Tenet and his counterterrorism chief, J. Cofer Black, left the meeting feeling brushed off.

The previously undisclosed meeting was not mentioned to members of the Sept. 11 commission, who did an exhaustive investigation of the events leading up to the deadliest terrorist attack in the nation's history. The White House acknowledges that the meeting occurred but disputes the book's depiction of it.

"I spoke to [Secretary Rice] this morning," Bartlett said. "She believes that this is a very grossly misaccurate characterization of the meeting they had."

Speaking on Fox News, former chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr., who is reported in the book to have suggested twice that Bush fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, acknowledged that he sat for long interviews with Woodward "more than a handful of times." He did not dispute that he recommended Rumsfeld's removal, although he added, "I did not start a campaign."

Card added that it is an "overstatement" to say that first lady Laura Bush joined any effort to oust Rumsfeld. The first lady's office has denied the assertion.

Bartlett added that Rice proposed a turnover of Bush's national security team before his second term began, but that the president decided against making wholesale changes.

The book depicts Rumsfeld as a difficult and alienating figure. At one point, he would not return Rice's phone calls, Woodward reports, an assertion that White House spokesman Tony Snow said Rice dismissed as "ridiculous."

Asked whether things were truly that bad, Card said on Fox: "Well, I would not describe that as bad. We are all human beings. There are Type A personalities running around in this government, and that's good. And sometimes a chief of staff or somebody else has to help bring people together to provide counsel to the president."

Despite the controversy that follows him, Rumsfeld continues to have the backing of Bush. "The president has full confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld," Bartlett said. He "is doing an enormously difficult job fighting a war. . . . We recognize he has his critics."

Traveling in Nicaragua yesterday, Rumsfeld said that he is not considering resigning and that the president had called him personally in recent days to express his continued support, the Associated Press reported.

White House Accuses Reporter Bob Woodward Of Bias (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072681

WASHINGTON - The White House on Sunday attacked investigative journalist Bob Woodward, accusing the reporter of pursuing an agenda in researching his new book "State of Denial," which portrays the Bush administration in an unflattering way.

Appearing on the ABC news program "This Week with George Stephanopoulos," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Woodward had "already formulated some conclusions even before the interviewing began" with current and former top administration officials.

Excerpts from the book were published Sunday in The Washington Post, where Woodward is an assistant managing editor. They included allegations that President Bush gave rosy public reports about Iraq despite intelligence reports that expressed concern about the rise of the insurgency and the ability of the United States to bring stability. The book also alleged that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was warned about Osama bin Laden just months before the Sept. 11 terror attacks.

Two earlier Woodward books, "Bush at War" and "Plan of Attack," were widely considered sympathetic to the White House. But Woodward's third book on Bush's conduct of the war on terror alleges that the president and his team deliberately mislead the public about the on-the-ground reality in Iraq.

On Friday, White House spokesman Tony Snow dismissed the book as cotton candy, suggesting it was light and just repeated old news and views. Sunday, Bartlett took a decidedly more hostile tone, cautioning, "I'm not going to use the word agenda," but then suggesting just that.

Bartlett, special counselor to the president, complained that Woodward wouldn't listen to what he was being told during interviews with administration officials, noting that "their points weren't getting across."

The White House aide also challenged the veracity of one of the book's most controversial assertions. Woodward reported that former CIA Director George Tenet and Cofer Black, the State Department's former anti-terrorism chief, went to Rice on July 10, 2001, in an unscheduled meeting, with intelligence that showed that bin Laden planned to attack the United States.

At the time, Rice was the president's national security adviser. Woodward reports that she gave the two intelligence leaders a brush-off.

Rice, said Bartlett, "believes this is a grossly misleading characterization of the meeting," adding that such a forceful appeal "in her mind didn't happen."

In recent weeks President Clinton, angered by Republican suggestions that he didn't do enough to thwart bin Laden, accused the Bush administration of doing nothing during eight months in office to prevent the terror attacks on New York and Washington.

Bartlett confirmed Woodward's assertions that former chief of staff Andy Card went to the president after re-election and suggested he replace the unpopular defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld. And, he confirmed more recent news reports that others are urging Bush to fire Rumsfeld. Critics accuse Rumsfeld of using too few troops and bungling the post-war period in Iraq.

"The president has confidence in Don Rumsfeld," said Bartlett, during another Sunday morning interview on the CBS program "Face the Nation."

White House On Defensive Over Book's Revelations On Iraq (AFP-Y)

By Claire Gallen

AFP, October 2, 2006

An explosive new book by star journalist Bob Woodward alleging President George W. Bush hid the truth of the deteriorating Iraq situation has rocked the White House just five weeks before key US congressional elections.

Woodward's "State of Denial" says Bush told Congress and the public that US efforts to establish a democratic government in Iraq were progressing steadily, even as internal White House reports detailed a growing threat of civil war.

It also says that Bush rejected pressure from White House officials to sack Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on the grounds that his policies were contributing to the worsening security situation in Iraq.

"There was a vast difference between what the White House and Pentagon knew about the situation in Iraq and what they were saying publicly," Woodward said Sunday in a Washington Post article adapted from the book.

DOJ_NMG_0072682

"In memos, reports and internal debates, high-level officials of the Bush administration have voiced their concern about the United States' ability to bring peace and stability to Iraq since early in the occupation," he said.

The book's official release is Monday, but details were reported by US media days earlier from leaked copies. More excerpts were published Sunday by the Washington Post, where Woodward works, and Newsweek magazine.

The book threatened to damage efforts by Bush's Republican Party to maintain control of the Congress in November elections, in which the ongoing US occupation of Iraq is an important issue.

On Sunday, White House counselor Dan Bartlett insisted Bush had been candid about the war.

"I know the president has been very blunt with the American people about the challenges we face in Iraq. We've given that information," he told CBS television.

And on Friday, White House spokesman Tony Snow insisted that "Nobody's tried to mislead anyone about (Iraq)," in response to the charges by Woodward, whose reporting on the early 1970s Watergate scandal helped force the resignation of president Richard Nixon.

Citing interviews with top officials and internal documents, "State of Denial" portrays Rumsfeld as running rough-shod over the advice of the country's top generals and ignoring advice against US policies since seen as contributing to instability in the country.

Rumsfeld said Sunday that Bush had given him his personal support and that he will not resign despite the new wave of criticism set off by the book.

"No, no, no," Rumsfeld said on a trip to Nicaragua when asked if he had considered resigning. "How many times do I have to answer?"

The Woodward book also shows that some senior government advisors were unwilling to argue over US policies with Bush in White House meetings, viewing Bush as not open to advice contrary to existing policies.

In one episode recounted by Woodward, Rumsfeld flatly rejected pleas by Jay Garner, the first US administrator in Iraq following the March 2003 invasion, to reverse "tragic" decisions to disband Iraq's military and to ban members of the former ruling Baath party from government service.

That rebuff left Garner too timid to raise the same points in a meeting with Bush.

"In my thinking, the door's closed," Garner later told Woodward, who noted the decisions left hundreds of thousands of unemployed, armed Iraqis to join the insurgency.

After Condoleezza Rice became secretary of state in January 2005, her personal emissary reported that Iraq "remains a failed state" beset by violence and that Washington had no comprehensive, articulated policy for it.

Yet, Woodward shows, the White House steadfastly maintained publicly that the United States was progressing toward defeating the insurgents.

He contrasts positive public remarks by Bush over the past three years with concurrent, candid secret reports and memos in the White House that showed the Iraq situation worsening.

For instance, on November 11, 2003, Bush said in a speech that the United States was "not only containing the terrorist threat, we are turning it back."

On the same day, a senior CIA official told Bush, "We are seeing the establishment of an insurgency in Iraq."

Should He Stay? (WP)

By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

After President Bush won reelection in 2004, White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. got out an 8 1/2 -by-11 spiral notebook, half an inch thick, with a blue cover. He called it his "hit-by-the-bus" book -- handy in case someone in the administration suddenly had to be replaced. He had intentionally used a student notebook, something he had bought himself, so it wouldn't be considered a government document or presidential record that might someday be opened to history. It was private and personal.

DOJ_NMG_0072683

A second term traditionally leads to personnel changes. The question was whether one of them would involve Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Card had to approach the issue with delicacy. Iraq was the centerpiece of everything now, and the president was clearly predisposed not to do anything that would disrupt the war effort. If Rumsfeld left, what would the impact be on overall momentum and on the morale of those who were doing the fighting? Rumsfeld had a virtual monopoly on defense contacts with the president, so there was no way the president could get independent information to answer those kinds of questions.

The champions of change at the Defense Department included Condoleezza Rice, the national security adviser who would soon be nominated to become the new secretary of state; her replacement as national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley; and Card himself.

Card had the names of 11 possible Rumsfeld replacements in his "hit-by-the-bus" book, among them Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), who had been Al Gore's vice presidential running mate in 2000 and was a staunch defender of the Iraq war, and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.).

But Card thought the best replacement for Rumsfeld would be James A. Baker III, who had been White House chief of staff and Treasury secretary under President Ronald Reagan, then secretary of state and chief political adviser to the president's father.

Card floated the names to Bush over the course of several weeks, all the while underscoring the advantages of change. But his focus was on Baker.

"Mr. President, this is my quiet counsel," Card said. "Put a diplomat in the Defense Department."

The president seemed genuinely intrigued.

"You don't have to rush to make a decision," Card advised.

Card spoke with Rumsfeld, who talked as if he presumed there would be no change. One of Rumsfeld's minions told Card, "Nothing will happen until the war is over."

Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser, weighed in with the president. A contentious session with Congress was coming up. As he saw it, the Democrats were in no mood for a honeymoon. With Rice's confirmation hearing to replace Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, and with the expected nomination of White House counsel Alberto R. Gonzales to be attorney general, would another Senate confirmation overload the system?

"I've got Powell going. I'm going to have to replace Condi," the president told Rove. "Do I have to have some continuity in all of this?" And, clearly, the conduct of the war in Iraq would be the subject of confirmation hearings for anyone Bush nominated to be the new secretary of defense.

Rove agreed they did not want to do anything that would prompt hearings on the war.

"If we need to do it, we need to do it. But if we don't need to do it, you know," Bush said, deciding nothing but sounding reluctant to make a change.

With Card's knowledge and encouragement, Michael Gerson, the chief White House speechwriter, also lobbied the president. Gerson said he believed that Rumsfeld should be replaced, as a symbol of change. The president should talk to Lieberman about taking over for Rumsfeld, Gerson recommended. What better symbol of change could there be than to bring in Gore's running mate?

Knowing how important loyalty was to Bush, he said, "Mr. President, it's not disloyal to have someone in for four years, four and a half years, in a job like this, and then for a variety of reasons, many of them not of his own doing, okay, to say that it would be advantageous to have a change."

Interesting idea, Bush said.

Card kept pushing, at one point raising the possibility of change at the Pentagon with Vice President Cheney.

No, Cheney said, he was predisposed to recommend that the president keep Rumsfeld right where he was. Card was not surprised.

In private conversations with Bush, Cheney said Rumsfeld's departure, no matter how it might be spun, would be seen only as an expression of doubt and hesitation on the war. It would give the war critics great heart and momentum, he confided to an aide, and soon they would be after him and then the president. He virtually insisted that Rumsfeld stay.

DOJ_NMG_0072684

In mid-December 2004, the president made his final decision. Rumsfeld would stay, he indicated to Cheney and Card. He couldn't change Rumsfeld.

"That didn't mean he didn't want to," Card later said.

Earlier this year, I asked Rumsfeld whether there was ever a moment when Bush asked him to stay.

"I don't recall that there was," he said. But on the other hand, he added laughing, "I'm quite confident there was never a moment where he said, 'I want you to leave.' "

Doubts From the Start

Cheney had suggested Rumsfeld to Bush in late December 2000. Rumsfeld was so impressive, Bush told Card at the time. He had had the job in the Ford administration a quarter-century before, and it was as if he were now saying, "I think I've got some things I'd like to finish."

But there was another dynamic that Bush and Card discussed. Rumsfeld and Bush's father, the former president, couldn't stand each other. Bush senior didn't trust Rumsfeld and thought he was arrogant, self-important, too sure of himself and Machiavellian. Rumsfeld had also made nasty private remarks that the elder Bush was a lightweight.

Card could see that overcoming the former president's skepticism about Rumsfeld added to the president-elect's excitement. It was a chance to prove his father wrong. And Rumsfeld fit Cheney's model of a defense secretary who could not only battle things out with the generals but who also had as much gravitas as the rest of the new national security team.

Bush would nominate Rumsfeld, he told Card. Cheney had been selected for his national security credentials. He was the expert, and this was the sort of decision that required expertise. Still, Bush wondered privately to Card about pitfalls, if there was something he didn't see here. After all, his father had strong feelings.

Is this a trapdoor? he asked.Disdain for the Process

During the long run-up to the war, Rumsfeld made little attempt to disguise his disdain for what was called "the interagency process" -- coordinating policy with the State Department under Powell and the National Security Council under Rice.

By the start of 2003, Frank Miller, the NSC's senior director for defense, who was coordinating the Iraq issue among the different federal agencies, felt that Rumsfeld had made his job almost impossible.

There was constant tension between the NSC and Rumsfeld's Pentagon, and Rumsfeld went to extra lengths to keep control of information. Often, when Rumsfeld came to the White House with Gen. Tommy R. Franks to brief the president, the NSC and some of the staff on the Iraq invasion plans, he would see that the slides and handouts were distributed just before the meeting and taken back immediately after.

Sometimes there would be a handout for the president with 140 pages, and the lesser beings like Miller would only be allowed to see 40 of them. On one occasion, Rumsfeld came to a meeting without enough briefing packets for all the principals, so Rice wound up looking on with the person next to her.

Sometimes, Rumsfeld would point across the room in the middle of a briefing. "People shouldn't be taking notes," he scolded. "People should not be taking notes in here."

When the generals came over to the White House with him, Rumsfeld spoke first, introducing everyone and explaining what they were going to talk about. It was worse for Gen. Richard B. Myers, then the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Miller and Myers were longtime friends, and Miller could see that Myers was suffering.

At times Rumsfeld would not return Rice's phone calls when she had questions about war planning or troop deployments. She complained to Rumsfeld, who reminded her that the chain of command did not include the national security adviser.

Rice complained to the president.

Bush's response was to try to be playful with Rumsfeld.

"I know you won't talk to Condi," Bush once teased Rumsfeld, "but you've got to talk to her."

At the Pentagon, Rumsfeld built a "kitchen cabinet" of special assistants and consultants within the Office of the Secretary of Defense. It grew into a fortress of old friends and retired military officers.

Perhaps the most important of these was Stephen Herbits, a lawyer and longtime Rumsfeld friend going back to 1967. Herbits had been one of Rumsfeld's civilian special assistants during his first Pentagon tour. Rumsfeld made him a consultant with a license to analyze current problems, and he functioned as a management fix-it man, somewhat as Karl Rove did for Bush.

Herbits, who was also a gay rights activist and occasional contributor to Democratic candidates -- and thus highly unusual among Republican defense experts -- was known for his incisive, provocative, slashing dissections of personnel and institutions. Rumsfeld appreciated his style and skill at cutting through the normal fog of Pentagon paperwork and lowest-common-denominator analysis.

On December 5, 2002, in the middle of the most intense invasion planning for Iraq, Herbits walked into Rumsfeld's office.

"You're not going to be happy with what I'm going to tell you," he said, "but you are in the unique position of being the sole person who could lose the president's reelection for him if you don't get something straightened out."

Rumsfeld flushed.

Herbits continued. "Now that I've got your attention, you have got to focus on the post-Iraq planning. It is so screwed up. We will not be able to win the peace."

Herbits warned Rumsfeld that policy Undersecretary Douglas J. Feith was screwing up. The fighting between the State and Defense departments was so bad that interagency meetings were at times little more than shouting matches. Postwar planning was so fiercely off track that it required the secretary's personal intervention.

Rumsfeld didn't say much but soon called a surprise Saturday meeting with Feith and others involved.

"What's going on here?" he asked. "We've got to get this on track."

It later became clear that one of the root causes for troubles in postwar Iraq was the lack of security, and that that was the result of the chronic shortage of troops faced by U.S. commanders.

The record showed that the plan for invading Iraq had a top number of 275,000 ground combat troops, including about 90,000 who were scheduled to flow into Iraq in the weeks and months after March 19, 2003, when the war began.

Earlier this year, I asked Rumsfeld about the troop levels.

He said it is one of the great "canards" that he had decided or unduly influenced the decision to not bring in the 90,000. It was all on Franks's recommendation, he said. "He made a judgment that he had what he needed, or would have as this played out, and that he would not need the additional ones that were in the queue. . . . And he made that recommendation and I made the recommendation to the president, and we agreed with it." So the 90,000 additional ground troops were not sent for the war or stabilization.

The critics -- or the "opiners," as Rumsfeld called them, "the people who don't have responsibility for making the decisions" -- don't understand, he said. "Many of them say, 'Oh, it's Rumsfeld,' as though I'm sitting around with a black box figuring all this out. And anyone who knows me or watched me do anything knows that I don't do it that way. I come here to this job knowing that there's no one smart enough to do this job." So he relied on "smart people," he said, and on "advice from multiple sources."

But half a dozen of the generals and civilians who worked most closely with Rumsfeld made it clear in interviews that it was Rumsfeld who was making the decisions.

By this summer, Rumsfeld had softened his position on the issue of whether there were enough troops.

"It's entirely possible there were too many at some point and too few at some point, because no one's perfect," he said in another interview. "All of us that were trying our best to make these judgments were doing it in a context of concern about having enough to get the job done, and enable a process, political and economic process, to go forward, and not so many that it persuaded people that we were there to steal their oil and occupy their country and disrupt and cause disturbances in the neighboring countries that cause the overthrow of some of those other regimes. And so we made the best judgment we could.

"In retrospect I have not seen or heard anything from the other opiners that suggests to me that they have any reason to believe that they were right and we were wrong. Nor can I prove we were right and they were wrong. The only thing I can say is they seem to have a lot more certainty than my assessment of the facts would permit me to have."

One of the harshest critics of what happened in Iraq as the security situation deteriorated and the insurgency intensified was Rumsfeld's own aide, Herbits.

On July 15, 2004, Herbits sat down at his computer and wrote another memo, a scathing seven-page report titled "Summary of Post-Iraq Planning and Execution Problems." Though he discussed the postwar planning and policies, and the tenure of L. Paul Bremer III as head of the Coalition Provisional Authority, his real target was his friend of 37 years. The memo listed a series of tough questions:

DOJ_NMG_0072686

Â· "Who made the decision and why didn't we reconstitute the Iraqi army?"

Â· "Did no one realize we were going to need Iraqi security forces?"

Â· "Did no one anticipate the importance of stabilization and how best to achieve it?"

Â· "Why was the de-Baathification so wide and deep?"

"Rumsfeld's style of operation," Herbits wrote, was the "Haldeman model, arrogant" -- a reference to President Richard M. Nixon's White House chief of staff, H.R. "Bob" Haldeman.

"Indecisive, contrary to popular image," Herbits wrote of Rumsfeld. "Would not accept that some people in some areas were smarter than he. . . . Trusts very few people. Very, very cautious. Rubber glove syndrome -- a tendency not to leave his fingerprints on decisions."

Herbits reached his crescendo: "Did Rumsfeld err with the fundamental political calculation of this administration: not getting the post-Iraq rebuilding process right within 18 months?"A Worried General

Rumsfeld's relationship with his own generals only worsened.

In the summer of 2005, Marine Corps Gen. James L. Jones, the NATO commander, paid a call on his old friend Gen. Peter Pace, then the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs. It was virtually certain that Pace was going to move up to replace Myers as chairman, the top position in the American military.

Jones expressed concern that Pace would even want to be chairman. "You're going to face a debacle and be part of the debacle in Iraq," he said. U.S. prestige was at a 50- or 75-year low in the world. He said he was so worried about Iraq and the way Rumsfeld ran things that he wondered if he himself should not resign in protest. "How do you have the stomach for eight years in the Pentagon?" he finally asked.

Pace said that someone had to be chairman. Who else would do it?

Jones did not have an answer. "Military advice is being influenced on a political level," he said. The Joint Chiefs had improperly "surrendered" to Rumsfeld. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder."

Pace became chairman, and later flatly denied that Jones had told him that Iraq was a debacle. "He's a good friend. He was in my wedding," Pace said, noting they had known each other for 36 years. "If Jim felt that way he would tell me."

I called Jones at NATO headquarters in Belgium. He said that he had made all those comments to Pace in their meeting in 2005. "That's what I told him," he said.The First Lady's Concerns

Every six weeks or so, Card tried to have a private, candid session with first lady Laura Bush to hear her concerns.

The first lady was worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband, and her perspective seemed to reflect Rice's concern about Rumsfeld's overbearing style and tendency to dominate. Card knew that the first lady and Rice often took long walks together on the Camp David weekends.

"I agree with you," Card said. On one level he was trying to educate and explain, but he was also lobbying. So he outlined his problems with Rumsfeld and said he believed it was time for a change.

"Well, does the president know about that?" she asked. Was Card being candid with her husband?

Card said he was. "That's why I'm arguing." He said, however, that so far his advice on the Rumsfeld situation had been considered and rejected.

"He's happy with this," the first lady said, "but I'm not." Another time she said, "I don't know why he's not upset with this."

Card's relationship with Rumsfeld was always difficult. Last year, in the days after Hurricane Katrina hit New Orleans with devastating effect, Bush decided more troops were needed and asked Card to relay the message to Rumsfeld.

"You know I don't report to you," Rumsfeld said.

"I know you don't report to me," Card replied. "You report to the president. But believe me, he would like you to do this."

"I'm not going to do it unless the president tells me," Rumsfeld told the chief of staff. Too many strains and obligations were being placed on the National Guard.

Card protested that he had just talked to the president, who had made an absolute decision.

"Then he's going to have to tell me," Rumsfeld said.

"Hey," the president said to Card later. "Rumsfeld called me up. I thought you were going to handle that."One More Try

DOJ_NMG_0072687

After Thanksgiving 2005, Card made another concentrated effort to get the president to replace Rumsfeld. He didn't want the president to have blinders on. Many Republican and Democratic leaders were telling Card privately that they just could not deal with the secretary of defense. He was arrogant and unresponsive.

Card was also hearing from members of the old foreign policy establishment connected to the president's father -- the Gray Beards, he called them -- who were complaining more and more.

"Who's going to do the job?" the president asked Card.

Card again mentioned Baker.

"How do we get Roger Clemens back into the game?" Card asked, comparing Baker to one of the all-time great pitchers, who had retired from baseball only to come back for another year with his hometown team. "He can still pitch," Card said about Baker.

Bush reminded him that they were at war. Rumsfeld was transforming the military, hadn't been insubordinate and needed to get the new Pentagon budget approved. Replacing him would be disruptive to the upcoming Iraqi election on Dec. 15.

"Interesting," the president said nonetheless. "Interesting."

But the president would not even authorize Card to send out feelers or to enter into any discussion with Baker. Rumsfeld would stay.

Rumsfeld Says He Won't Resign (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 2, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, coming under renewed fire for his management of the Iraq war, said Sunday he is not considering resigning and said the president had called him personally in recent days to express his continued support.

Speaking to reporters en route to Nicaragua for a meeting of defense ministers, Rumsfeld said he was not surprised by reports in a new book that White House staff had encouraged President Bush to fire him after the 2004 election.

"It's the task of the chief of staff of the White House — and having been one, I know that — to raise all kinds of questions with the president and think through different ways of approaching things," Rumsfeld said. "So it wouldn't surprise me a bit if that subject had come up."

Asked by reporters if he had recently considered resigning, Rumsfeld said, "No."

In the new book "State of Denial," Washington Post assistant managing editor Bob Woodward writes that former White House chief of staff Andrew Card twice sought to persuade Bush to fire Rumsfeld.

Card on Friday did not dispute that he had talked about a Rumsfeld resignation with the president but said it was his job to discuss a wide range of possible replacements, including his own.

Rumsfeld on Sunday also denied any rift with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and said the ongoing debate doesn't detract from his work with other international leaders.

He said he had spoken to Bush since the book's contents were made public. Bush "called me personally," said Rumsfeld, to voice support.

Rumsfeld has previously acknowledged that he twice offered Bush his resignation, but it was not accepted.

The defense secretary and Bush have faced growing criticism for their handling of the Iraq war as violence there has escalated, U.S. casualties have mounted and public support for the conflict has declined. Fueling the debate in recent days was the release of a classified intelligence report that concluded that the Iraq war has helped fuel a new generation of extremists and increased the overall terrorist threat.

Just back from a five-day trip to the Balkan region, which included a NATO defense ministers meeting in Slovenia, Rumsfeld arrived in Nicaragua Sunday afternoon for two days of meetings with defense officials from more than 30 South and Central American countries.

The talks here — in one of the Western Hemisphere's poorest countries — are expected to focus on counter-narcotics and counterterrorism efforts, peacekeeping missions, humanitarian and disaster relief and the removal of land mines from the region.

The meeting of the region's defense ministers follows a tense period in which Venezuela's leaders lashed out at the U.S. and President Bush during a U.N. meeting in New York City. Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez called Bush "the devil" and slammed U.S. leaders for trying to block his country from taking a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Rumsfeld said Sunday he did not expect to meet privately with the Venezuelan defense minister, although he will see him during the regular meeting.

U.S. officials have long considered Chavez a destabilizing force in Latin America. And they have suggested that Venezuela would make the U.N. Security Council unworkable if the nation were to win its bid against U.S.-backed Guatemala for a rotating council seat.

Also of interest to U.S. leaders is the possibility that Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega, whose socialist government was a major antagonist of the United States in the 1980s, has been leading in the polls for the upcoming Nicaraguan presidential election.

Ortega led the overthrow of dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1979 and fought the U.S.-backed Contra rebels as Nicaragua's president from 1985-90.

Aide: Bush Backs Rumsfeld, Disputes Book (USAT)

USA Today, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush has full confidence in Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and his management of the war in Iraq, a top White House official said Sunday in responding to a critical new book.

Dan Bartlett, White House counselor, denied that Bush was misleading the American public about the level of violence against U.S. troops in Iraq, an assertion made in Washington Post Assistant Managing Editor Bob Woodward's book, State of Denial.

Appearing Sunday on ABC's This Week, Bartlett said Bush continues to believe that Rumsfeld is “the right man to do the job that he's doing,” dismissing critics who say the administration failed to adequately plan for the war in Iraq or send enough troops.

“We recognize that he has his critics,” Bartlett said of Rumsfeld. “Some people don't like his bedside manner.”

Rumsfeld said Sunday that he will not resign and that Bush had called to offer support. He spoke to reporters on a flight to Nicaragua.

Bartlett also disputed the assertion in Woodward's book that then-White House chief of staff Andrew Card twice tried to have Rumsfeld fired, the second time with the support of first lady Laura Bush. Bartlett, on CNN's Late Edition, said Card had presented options to Bush that included replacing the secretary.

In addition, he said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice “suggested to the president maybe he ought to bring in a whole new national-security team starting the second term.”

“The president decided that's not the approach he wanted to take,” Bartlett said.

Card told MSNBC that he discussed with Bush replacing Rumsfeld on at least two occasions but said “There was never an orchestrated campaign to remove the secretary of Defense that I was party to.”

Woodward also wrote that while Bush spoke publicly of progress in Iraq, a secret intelligence report in May said the insurgency was growing.

Bartlett said Bush has been “blunt” with the U.S. public about the violence in Iraq.

Bush has consulted with Henry Kissinger, who was an architect of the Nixon administration's strategy in the Vietnam War, about Iraq, Bartlett acknowledged. But he said the former secretary of State is not “a driving influence behind the president's policy.”

Aide: Bush Confident In Rumsfeld (AP-Y)

AP, October 2, 2006

President Bush has full confidence in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld even if others dislike the Pentagon chief's "bedside manner," a top White House official said Sunday.

Bush counselor Dan Bartlett did not directly respond to questions about whether the White House has considered possible replacements for Rumsfeld, as reported in Bob Woodward's new book on the Bush administration's Iraq war policy.

DOJ_NMG_0072689

Bartlett said "every Cabinet member serves at the pleasure of the president," but that Bush believes Rumsfeld is the right man to run the Pentagon.

"We recognize that he has his critics," Bartlett said on ABC's "This Week." "We recognize that he's made some very difficult decisions. Some people don't like his bedside manner. But what President Bush looks to in Secretary Rumsfeld is to bring him the type of information he needs to make the right decisions in this war."

In his book "State of Denial," Woodward writes that former White House chief of staff Andrew Card twice sought to persuade Bush to fire Rumsfeld, the second time with the support of first lady Laura Bush.

Card has rejected any suggestion that he led a campaign to dump Rumsfeld but said he did discuss with the president Rumsfeld's role in Bush's second term. Card said it was his job to discuss a wide range of possible replacements.

Rumsfeld Says Bush Affirmed His Support Amid New Criticism (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

MANAGUA, Nicaragua, Oct. 1 — Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Sunday that President Bush had called to affirm his support in the midst of an uproar over a new book raising questions about Mr. Rumsfeld's management of the war in Iraq.

The president "made some comments in a larger group, by secure video, and then he called me personally," Mr. Rumsfeld told journalists traveling with him to a meeting here of defense ministers from the Western Hemisphere.

Asked if the president had expressed his support, Mr. Rumsfeld said, "Oh, my Lord, yes."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he had no intention of resigning. And he denied that he had had a feud with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The book, "State of Denial," by Bob Woodward, describes deep divisions within the administration over American policy on Iraq, and quotes former Pentagon officials and some former military officers who describe Mr. Rumsfeld as arrogant and brusque. Mr. Woodward says that Andrew H. Card Jr., as White House chief of staff, tried on two occasions to persuade the president to name a new defense secretary.

Mr. Rumsfeld said he took the report in stride.

"It's the task of a chief of staff at the White House — and having been one, I know that — to raise all kinds of questions with the president," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "It would not surprise me a bit if that subject came up." Mr. Rumsfeld was chief of staff for President Gerald R. Ford in 1974-5.

Asked if he considered resigning as criticism of his performance increased in recent weeks, Mr. Rumsfeld said: "No, no, no, no. How many times do I have to answer?"

Asked if there had been a time when he and Ms. Rice were not talking, Mr. Rumsfeld said, "There's nothing I can recall over the last five or six years."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he had not read the book by Mr. Woodward, an assistant managing editor of The Washington Post. "Everybody seems to be saying that the things he said aren't so," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "I wouldn't know."

The defense secretary said he seriously doubted that the White House had withheld any data on Iraq from him or the Pentagon.

"I can't believe any charge that data is being kept in the White House," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "I just can't conceive of that." It would be "near-impossible and unhelpful," he added.

Some Democrats in Congress have called for Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation. They say he did not provide enough troops to prevail in Iraq and severely underestimated the strength of the insurgents who attacked American troops after the fall of Saddam Hussein.

But Mr. Rumsfeld said the criticism did not erode his ability to represent the United States in dealings with foreign officials like the defense ministers here.

"They don't seem to pay a lot of attention to it," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

DOJ_NMG_0072690

Mr. Card has acknowledged that he and Mr. Bush had discussed the possibility that the president might replace Mr. Rumsfeld. But Mr. Card said it was in the context of larger discussions about possible personnel changes.

"It's not inaccurate to say that we talked about Rumsfeld," Mr. Card said in an interview on Friday, but "there was no campaign" to oust the defense secretary.

More Questions About Defense Secretary's Leadership (WSJ)

By Greg Jaffe and Yochi Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- For months, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has been cast by Democrats and even some Republicans as the face of an unpopular war.

Now a new book, which paints Mr. Rumsfeld as isolated from his Bush administration colleagues and at odds with some of his generals, is providing fodder for more questions about his leadership.

The heightened focus on the defense chief -- sparked in part by publication of "State of Denial: Bush at War, Part III" by Washington Post editor Bob Woodward -- is complicating White House efforts to keep November's midterm elections from becoming a referendum on the war. Just as significantly, Mr. Rumsfeld's apparent increasing political isolation is affecting how he runs the Defense Department and oversees the war.

The criticism continued yesterday. "I don't have confidence in Don Rumsfeld. He's made major mistakes in this war," said Sen. Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican facing a tough re-election campaign. Speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press," Sen. DeWine stopped short of calling for Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation, saying that should be President Bush's decision.

Yesterday, Mr. Rumsfeld told reporters that he isn't considering resigning and that Mr. Bush telephoned him recently to express his confidence in the defense chief.

Meanwhile, senior White House officials made it clear that Mr. Bush still supported Mr. Rumsfeld. "There are a lot of armchair quarterbacks, but he's the right man," said White House counselor Dan Bartlett on CBS's "Face the Nation."

The controversy over Mr. Rumsfeld's leadership does look to be changing the way he manages the military's massive bureaucracy, forcing him to take a less-direct approach to running the department. An example of this is the Army's recent budget woes. Typically, the Secretary has played a significant role in advocating for major changes to the Pentagon budget. This year, rather than make the case himself for a bigger Army budget, Mr. Rumsfeld left it to Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker to make the case on his own and to sell it to Congress and the White House.

Gen. Schoomaker has told lawmakers that the service needed $17 billion in the fiscal year that started yesterday to repair equipment. In briefings on Capitol Hill and the White House, the service has said it needs $137 billion in fiscal 2008, a $24 billion increase over the planned budget for that year.

The shift in approach in many ways amounts to an acknowledgment by Mr. Rumsfeld of his own vulnerabilities. "If Rumsfeld comes in and asks for more money for the Army, it is evidence of bad management," said Daniel Goure, who served on Mr. Rumsfeld's Pentagon transition team in 2001 and now is a vice president at the Lexington Institute, a defense think tank in Washington. By allowing the Army to make its own case, the defense chief avoided additional criticism by some lawmakers of how he has handled the war. "It shows he understands his weaknesses," Mr. Goure says.

A spokesman for Mr. Rumsfeld, Eric Ruff, yesterday disputed the notion that the Secretary has changed his approach, and added that Mr. Rumsfeld has been "heavily engaged" on Capitol Hill over issues regarding the coming budget and has met repeatedly with members of Congress.

Despite his efforts to assume a lower profile, Mr. Rumsfeld still presents a political problem for the administration. Amid concerns that the war could cost Republicans control of at least one chamber of Congress next month, the White House has tried to mix acknowledgments of Iraq's continuing chaos and violence -- and some of the administration's own miscues -- with calls for staying the course there.

It is a difficult message to calibrate, and White House aides say Mr. Rumsfeld, who is arguably the most polarizing figure in the Bush cabinet, has made the task even harder.

DOJ_NMG_0072691

Senior White House aides say Mr. Bush, having backed Mr. Rumsfeld for so long, is unlikely to abandon him in the run-up to next month's midterm elections. Moreover, polls suggest that firing the defense chief wouldn't do much good. In a recent Wall Street Journal/NBC poll, only 44% of respondents said Mr. Rumsfeld should resign and about 68% said his resignation would amount to little more than a symbolic gesture.

The aides say the White House has sought to reduce Mr. Rumsfeld's public role, to keep him from possibly weighing on the administration's poll numbers. That was evident in late July, when the U.S. announced a major shift in military strategy in Iraq that called for deploying thousands of additional American forces to Baghdad in an effort to secure the Iraqi capital. The announcement wasn't made by Mr. Rumsfeld. Instead, Mr. Bush disclosed the plans himself during a joint news conference with visiting Iraqi Premier Nouri al-Maliki.

Mr. Woodward's book, which states that senior White House aides tried twice to persuade Mr. Bush to fire his defense chief, complicates the Bush strategy.

In recent days, some officials in the White House and one prominent military commander have raised questions about Mr. Woodward's account. He says that on multiple occasions Gen. John Abizaid, the top military commander in the Middle East, said Mr. Rumsfeld was an ineffective leader. Gen. Abizaid denied ever making the statements attributed to him. "He has great respect for Mr. Rumsfeld and full confidence in the chain of command," said Col. Jerry Renne, his spokesman.

The book also quotes Gen. James Jones, the head of U.S. European Command, describing Iraq as a "debacle" and saying that "military advice is being influenced on a political level." Gen. Jones declined to comment.

In the Loop (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Remember that great "Mission Accomplished" banner on the aircraft carrier Abraham Lincoln on May 1, 2003, when President Bush dramatically landed there to give his speech announcing the end of "major combat operations" in Iraq?

The White House said the banner was not its doing and must have been the Navy's idea.

Now we find out, in Bob Woodward 's new book "State of Denial," that wasn't the case. None other than Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld , on the record, tells Woodward that "I took 'Mission Accomplished' out" upon reading a draft of the speech. "And I fixed it and sent it back. They fixed the speech," he said, "but not the sign."

The book also reminds us what a small town this is. On election night 2004, GOP communications guru Mary Matalin was with Bush and Vice President Cheney and talking with her husband, Democratic strategist James Carville , who was close to -- but not in -- John Kerry 's campaign.

Kerry, Carville told her, was going to challenge 250,000 provisional ballots in Ohio, which could change the result there or tie things up for a long time. Matalin promptly told Cheney, and they met with Bush. The Kerry camp made the announcement shortly thereafter.Another War, Another Book

And now, yet another must-read book on a U.S. military venture. If you think Woodward's book has good stuff, then try "The McNamara Ascendancy, 1961-1965, Volume V," just out from the Pentagon's Historical Office.

A Pentagon news release says it's a "full-length, scholarly account of the dynamic, often controversial early years of the McNamara era," as Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara marched the country into Vietnam.

Okay, maybe Woodward's is a better read.

Secrets, And The Obvious, Revealed (LA)

By Tim Rutten

Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

Bob WOODWARD'S "State of Denial" is the third volume in what aspires to be an inside history of George W. Bush's wartime presidency.

Less wishfully hagiographic than "Bush At War," less credulously detached than "Plan of Attack," this book's analysis essentially mirrors the shift in opinion on the administration's conduct of the war that has occurred in the foreign policy establishment's broad middle ground, where "reasonable" Republicans and Democrats still mingle in amiable, man-of-the-world solidarity. Still, "State of Denial" is a dogged piece of reporting — rich in anecdote, telling detail, fascinating snippets of conversation and troubling stories heretofore untold.

This is the darker Woodward — disquieting scene follows chilling bit of dialogue succeeded by secret memo. The administration he now portrays is a grimly feckless assemblage of dysfunction and division, disillusion and self-delusion. Yet for all the sensational revelations — and there are several — the overwhelming impression left at this very long book's rather wan end is that much labor has gone into establishing that, when it comes to the Bush White House and its war in Iraq, things are pretty much what they seem.

You don't really need a classified briefing to recognize a military and political quagmire. You don't require an unnamed source to tell you that something is wrong when the number of Americans killed exceeds 2,700 and the acknowledged death toll among Iraqi civilians climbs toward 60,000 — and there's no end in sight.

In an interview Sunday on CBS' "60 Minutes," Woodward went to the substantive heart of his appraisal: The president and his surrogates have consistently misled the American people and Congress about what's going on in Iraq, insisting that the situation is improving, while the insurgency continues to strengthen and violence escalates. Woodward said that the insurgents now attack U.S. forces 900 times a week, roughly once every 15 minutes. Intelligence experts he said, believe that "next year, 2007, is going to get worse and, in public, you have the president and you have the Pentagon [saying] 'Oh, no, things are going to get better.' " This is despite the fact, as the author writes in his book, that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice dispatched trusted aide Philip Zelikow to Iraq in February 2005, and he reported in a secret memo that the country already was "a failed state." Similarly, according to Woodward, generals on the ground were telling Washington that the conflict is "militarily unwinnable."

In "State of Denial," Woodward demonstrates that althoughdisinformation has been part of the administration's approach to Iraq from the start, the pace picked up — unsurprisingly — during Bush's 2004 reelection campaign. "In the days and weeks before election day, violence surged in Iraq," Woodward writes. "The classified figures showed that the number of insurgent attacks in Iraq had soared over the summer, going from 1,750 or so in June and July to more than 3,000 in August.... The violence was now 10 times worse than it had been when Bush landed on the aircraft carrier in May 2003 and declared that major combat was over. New Iraqi army and police units rolling out of training were being butchered.... Between 30% and 50% of all trained Iraqi units melted away and went home."

Last spring, Woodward writes, the U.S. military's Joint Chiefs of Staff provided another alarming secret analysis: "A graph included in the assessment measured attacks from May 2003 to May 2006. It showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces and Iraqi authorities was as high as it had ever been — exceeding 3,500 a month. [In July the number would be over 4,500.] The assessment also included a pessimistic report on crude oil production, the delivery of electricity and political progress.

"On May 26, the Pentagon released an unclassified report to Congress, required by law, that contradicted the Joint Chiefs' secret assessment. The public report sent to Congress said the "appeal and motivation for continued violent action will begin to wane in early 2007."

"State of Denial" reports that, after Bush's reelection, then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card and former chief speechwriter Michael Gerson urged the president to fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who emerges in this account as the boss from hell — petty and petulant, vindictive and territorial, arrogant and self-pitying, a micromanager who resolutely refuses to accept responsibility for his decisions. As recently as last May, according to Woodward, Rumsfeld circulated a secret memo arguing that "the charge of incompetence against the U.S. government should be easy to rebut if the American people understand the extent to which the current system of government makes competence next to impossible."

Bush, of course, decided to retain Rumsfeld — apparently at the urging of Vice President Dick Cheney — but sacked Secretary of State Colin Powell, who was replaced by the eerily devoted Rice.

She figures in one of the peripheral incidents Woodward recounts, one that we're likely to hear a great deal more about in the weeks ahead. He writes that two months before Sept. 11, Rice — then Bush's National Security Advisor — received a surprise visit from then-CIA Director George Tenet and J. Cofer Black, the state department's counterterrorism chief. They reviewed freshly collected, top-secret intelligence pointing to an impending attack by Al Qaeda. Based on the material, they "sounded the loudest warning" that Osama bin Laden's target was inside the United States. By Woodward's account, Rice listened politely, then gave them "the brushoff."

A former counsel to the 9/11 Commission, Peter Rundlet, wrote on the Huffington Post blog Sunday that Rice, Tenet and Black never mentioned this briefing during their testinmoney in public and in private, nor, he alleges, is it mentioned in any of the documents given investigators by the White House and CIA. Woodward, by contrast, writes that "Though investigators had access to all the paperwork about the meeting, Black felt there were things the commissions wanted to know about and things they didn't want to know about." Rundlet dismissed this explanation as "absurd" and wrote that "[a]t a minimum, the withholding of information about this meeting is an outrage. Very possibly, someone committed a crime."

One of the more troubling subplots running through "State of Denial" involves Prince Bandar, the long-time Saudi ambassador to the United States. By Woodward's account, when then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush decided to run for president, his worried father enlisted Bandar, an old family friend, to tutor the son on foreign policy. When Bandar arrived in Austin, the younger Bush blithely observed that while he had lots of ideas about domestic policies he didn't have a clue about foreign affairs. The Saudi took him under his wing, but he proved a trying pupil, who addressed his mentor as "asshole" and "smart aleck." (Perhaps this is how hereditary princelings affectionately address each other?) At one point, the younger Bush peevishly demanded to know why he needed "to care about North Korea." Bandar pointed out that, if he became president, he would have 35,000 American troops sitting on the DMZ.

Oh, right....

Later, with a Bush back in the White House, Bandar bullied the president into explicitly endorsing a two-state solution to the Israeli-conflict by threatening a total cutoff of Saudi support for U.S. policies. (Bush may never have played poker, but Bandar obviously has.) In another instance, the Saudi prince imperiously demanded — and, worse, obtained — two CIA officials to accompany him on a wild goose chase to Pakistan, where he hoped to kill Bin Laden. During a meeting in the Oval Office, according to Woodward, Bush personally thanked Bandar because the Saudis had flooded the world oil market and kept prices down in the run-up to the 2004 general election.

You don't have to be Michael Moore to find all this unsettling. Equally disquieting, Woodward's source for all this has to be Bandar or one of his intimates, acting at the Saudi's behest. What that suggests is that, after decades of arduously cultivating the Bush family, one of the shrewdest operators on the world stage has written off George W. Bush.

Unlike the previous books in this series, Bush and Cheney — both of whom declined to be interviewed for this volume — are remote figures in this narrative. The president informs Bandar that he prays daily and receives guidance from God and tells others that he intends to stay in Iraq, even if his supporters dwindle to his wife and dog. Cheney, meanwhile, broods obsessively on unfound weapons of mass destruction.

"State of Denial" is best read in tandem with Joan Didion's assessment of Cheney in the current issue of the New York Review of Books. With that as background, one conclusion that suggests itself is that — from the beginning — Iraq really has been about Vietnam. Cheney and Rumsfeld have been the Iraq war's principle advocates and architects. As Woodward now reveals, they've even introduced Henry Kissinger back into the equation, and he now is Bush's most frequent nongovernmental advisor on foreign policy. Cheney and Rumsfeld were bright young men headed for the top during the Nixon and Ford administrations, both of whom thought of themselves, as others did, as future presidents. Though the disaster in Southeast Asia hardly ruined them, a certain stigma has attached itself ever since.

For them, the Iraq war, the whole wrenching debate over domestic spying, the detainees and unitary executive power is all about Vietnam. Cheney, Rumsfeld and Kissinger all have been convinced for decades that the country drew all the wrong historical and governmental conclusions from Vietnam. The Reagan era intervention in Central America was a first attempt to overturn those conclusions, but it foundered on the arms-for-hostages scandal. Once George W. Bush — for a set of Freudian family issues too tedious to belabor — put himself in their clutches, he became the instrument of a Cheney/Rumsfeld/Kissinger attempt to abolish 30 years of history and their enduring resentment that their youthful exercise of power ended in failure, death and disaster.

So, here we are again.

New Facts About Iraq (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, October 9, 2006

The fiery debate over Iraq is turning absolutely sulfurous. With the November 7 congressional elections just around the corner, two new developments are stoking a surge of second-guessing about President Bush's conduct of the war and raising new concerns about how Washington can extricate itself from what most Americans now see as a deadly, baffling mess. One was last week's partial release of a secret National Intelligence Estimate that pokes big holes in Bush's rationale for the conflict by concluding that it is fueling, not curtailing, support for the global jihadist movement. The second is a new book by investigative reporter Bob Woodward asserting that the administration is putting a deliberately misleading spin on how the war is going.

All this, coupled with daily news reports of chilling new spasms of violence there, is deepening America's sour mood about the war and escalating tensions in Washington. After calling for conciliation and unity on the five-year anniversary of 9/11 less than a month ago, President Bush angrily branded Democrats the "cut and run" party last week and sparked another round of bitter recriminations. But a senior White House adviser said the situation, prompted by New York Times and Washington Post stories about the NIE, was so potentially damaging politically that "we needed to get our arms around this quickly."

Making matters worse for a president trying to sound upbeat, a new poll conducted for the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes found that a large majority of Iraqis believe the U.S. military presence there is provoking more violence than it is preventing. Most want U.S. troops out within a year, and 6 out of 10 support attacks on U.S.-led forces. Meanwhile, U.S. News has learned that the U.S. Army may ask Congress to expand its 504,000-strong force by 30,000-in large part because of the manpower strains from keeping 140,000 troops in Iraq.

"Things are not right." Even though Bush is getting a political boost from the economy (story, Page 36), the latest developments may prove to be a crystallizing moment in America's assessment of the war. Which is "the last thing the Republicans can afford," as they try to hold on to their fragile majorities in the House and Senate, says Boston University historian Julian Zelizer. What makes the furor over the Iraq intelligence assessment so important, Zelizer adds, is that it's based on an evaluation by 16 intelligence agencies, not the Democrats or other Bush critics. "It's nonpartisan analysis," Zelizer says, and it shows that "things are not right" in Iraq and that the rosy scenarios offered by Bush and his allies seem to be untethered by the facts.

As if all that weren't enough, more troubling disclosures and criticisms are contained in Woodward's book, State of Denial. Unlike the positive tone of his previous writings about Bush and his advisers, this time Woodward is highly negative and appears to be revising his own earlier assessments. He told CBS's 60 Minutes last weekend that the administration has not told the truth about the level of violence in Iraq, especially against U.S. troops, and says intelligence sources have predicted an even more violent insurgency there. Woodward writes that, last May, the intelligence division of the Pentagon's Joint Chiefs of Staff predicted an increase in violence not only this year but also in 2007. This report, Woodward writes, also painted a bleak picture of oil production, electricity generation, and the potential for political stability. But Bush, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice continued to say publicly that the war was going well and remained vital in combating terrorism. In an interview with Mike Wallace, Woodward said attacks against coalition troops occur, on average, every 15 minutes, which he says the administration has kept secret. "It's getting to the point now where there are eight, nine hundred attacks a week. ... The insurgents know what they are doing. They know the level of violence and how effective they are," Woodward wrote. "Who doesn't know? The American public."

The Woodward War (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

The White House had more than an inkling of what was coming. This was Bob Woodward's third book about the Bush administration since 9/11, and it was sure to be less friendly than the first two. In scores of interviews over many months, Woodward's questions to senior officials had been more aggressive, more hostile. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld seemed to be a particular target of the veteran Washington Post reporter, who remains, three decades after his Watergate debut, the best excavator of inside stories in the nation's capital. White House aides did recommend that the president and the vice president not grant interviews, but it was obvious that Woodward could, and would, get just about everyone else in positions of authority to talk.

When "State of Denial" arrived at the White House Friday morning, a team of aides went to work deconstructing the 576-page volume. Some of Woodward's revelations, like the scenes of Bush rejecting pleas for more troops in Iraq, the White House tried to dismiss as old news. Woodward's depictions of tensions within Bush's inner circle were played down or denied. It was not true, White House aides told reporters, that First Lady Laura Bush wanted to see Rumsfeld fired. Harder to slough off was Woodward's account of the role played by former chief of staff Andy Card. The White House made no serious attempt to refute Card's campaign to unseat Rummy. (Card himself quibbled over the word "campaign," telling reporters that the discussions about Rumsfeld's future needed to be seen in a "broader context.") Instead, White House spokesman Tony Snow took a dismissive, this-too-will-pass tone. Woodward's book is like "cotton candy," Snow said. "It kind of melts on contact."

A truer simile might be to a loud musical instrument. An orchestra of books has raised a cacophony of doubts about the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq. Coming after Bernard Trainor and Michael Gordon's "Cobra II," Tom Ricks's "Fiasco," Ron Suskind's "The One Percent Doctrine," "Hubris" by NEWSWEEK's Michael Isikoff and The Nation's David Corn, Woodward's "State of Denial" resounded among the administration's growing chorus of critics like a clash of cymbals.

With the midterm elections only five weeks away, Bush and his political minions have been striving mightily to direct the attention of voters away from Iraq and toward the threat of a terrorist attack. But Iraq keeps coming back into the headlines. Before the Woodward book began landing in stores late last week, portions of a National Intelligence Estimate began leaking out, suggesting that the war in Iraq was undermining the war on terror. The leaked portions of the NIE, a document representing a consensus of the U.S. intelligence community, disclosed the somewhat unsurprising conclusion that Iraq was turning into a training ground for terrorists. Bush responded by authorizing the declassification of other portions of the NIE, suggesting that if American forces were to quit Iraq, the problem would only grow worse. But simply "staying the course" in Iraq may not satisfy American voters who can see only darkness at the end of the tunnel.

Democrats as well as a few Republicans will renew their calls for Rumsfeld's head, but it is doubtful that Bush will dump his Defense secretary before the elections. That might be seen as a concession to the "Defeatocrats," as the GOP likes to call the opposition. (Rumsfeld himself had no comment about Woodward's book.) But a senior White House official, operating under the usual cover of anonymity, gave a less than airtight guarantee of Rumsfeld's job security. The president, normally one to rely on his inner circle, has been consulting outsiders. The official did not say which ones, but it is known that Bush speaks on occasion to Henry Kissinger and to his father's former secretary of State, James A. Baker. The counsel of the outsiders, says this official, "so far has been that Rumsfeld should stay. But I can't predict the future."

The Rumsfeld portrayed by Woodward is bullying and petty. Bush himself doesn't come off much better. The president is folksy and jocular, but incurious to the point of cluelessness. His war cabinet is deeply dysfunctional. Condoleezza Rice is almost a pathetic figure, whining to the president that she can't get Rumsfeld to return her calls.

As you read the excerpt that follows, keep in mind some essential context. The administration was not just unlucky. It was almost willfully blind to the risks entailed in invading and occupying a large, traumatized and deeply riven Arab country. Rumsfeld, who pushed aside Rice and Secretary of State Colin Powell to take over even the planning for postwar Iraq, wanted a lean and mean force to get in and get out quickly. This was all well and good as long as American forces could turn over the job of running the country to an effective group of local Iraqis. But the planning for this was hamstrung by disputes over the postwar role of Iraqi exiles. When Iraq began to unravel, the administration—with little debate—lurched in the other direction. The White House installed Paul Bremer as a kind of grand pooh-bah over all of Iraq, but Rumsfeld refused to give him the forces he needed for a long occupation.

Woodward writes that when Gen. Jay Garner, the man Bremer replaced in Baghdad, returned to Washington in June 2003, he told Rumsfeld that the United States had made "three terrible decisions." Garner told the Defense secretary that Bremer had seriously blundered by purging the bureaucracy, disbanding the Army and dismissing an interim leadership group. Rumsfeld shrugged off the concerns, according to Woodward. "I don't think there's anything we can do, because we are where we are."

There is always the risk in these instant histories that disgruntled former officials will cover their posteriors for posterity. One of Woodward's more obvious and prominent sources is former CIA director George Tenet. In "State of Denial," Tenet is deeply ambivalent about going to war in Iraq, but it does not appear that he voiced his concerns loudly or well inside the Oval Office. White House spokesmen were not just blowing smoke last week when they cautioned reporters to look for self-serving motivations behind some of the leaks.

Even so, Woodward's book is studded with documents and memos from Bush insiders that paint a much gloomier view of the war than the president's public statements at the time. After the first two, generally positive, volumes in his "Bush at War" series, Woodward (an object of fascination and much jealousy in the press corps) was widely derided for playing stenographer to the president and his hero-worshiping advisers. In "State of Denial," Woodward expresses shock and disbelief in interviews with Rumsfeld at his apparent denials and equivocations. Interviewed by Washington Post media critic Howard Kurtz, Woodward was matter-of-fact about his new, more critical tone. "I found out new things, as is always the case when you replow old ground," Woodward said. "The bulk of them I discovered this year. I wish I'd had some of them for the earlier books, but I didn't."

Woodward's new book, like the other critical treatments of the war, is still an early draft of history. But with each new revelation, with each depiction of the chaotic events inside the White House and Pentagon in the months before and after the invasion of Iraq, the picture of Bush's leadership becomes more refined and more disappointing.

'State Of Denial' (NSWK)

By Bob Woodward

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

A movie of the George W. Bush presidency might open in the Oval Office on January 26, 2001, when Donald H. Rumsfeld was sworn in as defense secretary. A White House photographer captured the scene. Rumsfeld wears a pin-stripe suit, and rests his left hand on a Bible held by Joyce, his wife of 46 years. His right hand is raised. Bush stands almost at attention, his head forward, his eyes cocked sharply leftward, looking intently at Rumsfeld. Vice President Dick Cheney stands slightly off to the side, his trademark half smile on his face. It is a cold, dry day, and the barren branches of the trees outside can be seen through the Oval Office windows.

Back in the days of the Ford presidency, in the wake of Watergate—the pardon of Nixon, the fall of Saigon—Cheney and Rumsfeld had worked almost daily in the same Oval Office where they once again stood. The new man in the photo, Bush, five years younger than Cheney and nearly 14 years younger than Rumsfeld, had been a student at Harvard Business School. He came to the presidency with less experience and time in government than any incoming president since Woodrow Wilson in 1913.

Well into his seventh decade, many of Rumsfeld's peers and friends had retired, but he now stood eagerly on the cusp, ready to run the race again. He resembled John le Carre's fictional Cold War British intelligence chief, George Smiley, a man who "had been given, in late age, a chance to return to the rained-out contests of his life and play them after all."

"Get it right this time," Cheney told Rumsfeld.

In his first Pentagon tour, as Ford's secretary of defense from 1975-1977, Rumsfeld had acquired a disdain for large parts of the system he was to oversee once again. He had found the Pentagon and the vast U.S. military complex unmanageable. One night at a dinner at my house a dozen years after he had left the Pentagon the first time, he said that being secretary was "like having an electric appliance in one hand and the plug in the other and you are running around trying to find a place to put it in." It was an image that stuck with me—Rumsfeld charging around the Pentagon E-ring, the Man with the Appliance, seeking an elusive electrical socket, trying to make things work and feeling unplugged by the generals and admirals.

"After two months on the job, it is clear that the Defense establishment is tangled in its anchor chain," Rumsfeld dictated in a four-page memo on March 21, 2001, two months into his second tour. He was already frustrated. Congress required hundreds of reports. It seemed there might be more auditors, investigators, testing groups and monitors looking over their shoulders than there were "front-line troops with weapons."

"The maze of constraints on the Department force it to operate in a manner that is so slow, so ponderous and so inefficient that whatever it ultimately does will inevitably be a decade or so late."

This "Anchor Chain" memo, which Rumsfeld revised and added to, became notorious among Rumsfeld's staff as they watched and tried to help him define the universe of his problems. It sounded like he had almost given up fixing the Pentagon during the George W. Bush presidency. The task was so hard and would take so long, he dictated in a later version, that "our job, therefore, is to work together to sharpen the sword that the next president will wield."

"I'm the secretary of defense," Rumsfeld insisted repeatedly in his first months in 2001. "I'm in the chain of command." He—not the generals, not the Joint Chiefs of Staff—would deal with the White House and the president on operational matters. Rumsfeld micromanaged daily Pentagon life and rode roughshod over people. In one public confrontation at a hearing with Senator Susan Collins, the earnest Maine Republican, Rumsfeld had put her down in a manner that was stunning even for him. Collins's voice had quivered at one point. Later, Powell A. Moore, Rumsfeld's assistant secretary of defense for legislative affairs, suggested that he call her, try to smooth things over.

"Hell," Rumsfeld said, "she needs to apologize to me."

On one occasion, he led a delegation from Congress to the funeral in Columbia, South Carolina, for Representative Floyd Spence, a Republican who had been a pro-Pentagon hawk for three decades. Moore had arranged the seating on Rumsfeld's plane the way everything was done in Congress, by seniority.

"I don't want this," Rumsfeld declared, and personally re-arranged the seating—putting Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who would soon become the House Armed Services Committee chairman, in the back.

On January 20, 2003, President Bush signed a secret National Security Presidential Directive, NSPD-24. The subject: setting up an "Iraq Postwar Planning Office" within the Defense Department for the expected invasion of Iraq. Rumsfeld picked Jay Garner, a 64-year-old retired three-star general and defense industry executive to head the postwar office. Six weeks later, Garner went to the White House, mid-morning on Friday, February 28, 2003, to meet President Bush for the first time. In the Situation Room, Garner passed around copies of his handout, an 11-point presentation, and dove right in. He said four of the nine tasks his small team was supposed to be in charge of in Iraq under Bush's NSPD-24 were plainly beyond their capabilities, including dismantling weapons of mass destruction, defeating terrorists, reshaping the Iraqi military and reshaping the other internal Iraqi security institutions.

The president nodded. No one else intervened, though Garner had just told them he couldn't be responsible for crucial postwar tasks—the ones that had the most to do with the stated reasons for going to war in the first place—because his team couldn't do them.

The import of what he had said seemed to sail over everyone's heads.

Garner next described how he intended to divide the country into regional groups, and moved on to the interagency plans.

"Just a minute," the president interrupted. "Where are you from?"

"Florida, sir."

"Why do you talk like that?" he asked, apparently trying to place Garner's accent.

"Because I was born and raised on a ranch in Florida. My daddy was a rancher."

"You're in," the first rancher said approvingly. His brother Jeb was governor of the state, and the president visited regularly.

One of Garner's talking points was, "Postwar use of Iraqi Regular Army." He said, "We're going to use the army. We need to use them. They have the proper skill sets."

How many from the army? someone asked.

"I'm going to give you a big range," Garner answered. "It'll be between 200,000 and 300,000."

Garner looked around the room. All the heads were bobbing north to south. Nobody challenged. Nobody had any questions about this plan.

"Thank you very much," Bush said when Garner was done. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice started talking about something else, so Garner figured he was dismissed. As he started to walk out of the room, the president caught his eye.

"Kick ass, Jay," Bush said.

Garner waited for Rumsfeld outside. Soon, Bush and Rice came out and walked three or four steps past Garner. Suddenly Bush turned back.

"Hey, if you have any problem with that governor down in Florida, just let me know," he said.

Shortly after the invasion, while Garner was in Kuwait waiting to move into Iraq, Rumsfeld chose L. Paul "Jerry" Bremer, a 61-year-old terrorism expert and protégé of Henry Kissinger, to effectively replace Garner, but as a presidential envoy. On

Garner's first day in Iraq, April 22, he signed on to an agreement to set up an interim Iraqi advisory group, made up of prominent Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis, many of them expatriates, to put an Iraqi face on the postwar occupation government. Two days later, Rumsfeld called to tell him Bremer was coming over, and said he wanted Garner to stay on as well.

"It doesn't work that way," Garner said. "You can't have the guy who used to be in charge and the guy who's now in charge there, because you divide the loyalties of the people. So the best thing for me is just to step out of here."

Rumsfeld convinced Garner to stay temporarily, and the retired general and Bremer clashed, as Bremer quickly unveiled a plan to ban as many as 50,000 members of Saddam Hussein's Baath Party from government employment.

"Hell," Garner told him, "you won't be able to run anything if you go this deep."

The next day, Bremer revealed a second draft order, disbanding the Iraqi ministries of Defense and Interior, the entire Iraqi military, and all of Saddam's bodyguard and special paramilitary organizations. Garner was stunned. The de-Baathification order was dumb, but this was a disaster.

"We have always made plans to bring the army back," he insisted. This new plan was just coming out of the blue, subverting months of work.

"Well, the plans have changed," Bremer replied.

Bremer then met with the Iraqi advisory group Garner had agreed to work with. "One thing you need to realize is you're not the government," he told them. "We are. And we're in charge."

The next day, the group went home.

Garner came back to the U.S. in June and basically hid out for a couple of weeks, not wanting to see anyone at the Pentagon or talk about his experience in Iraq. Finally, on June 18, 2003, alone with Rumsfeld around the small table in the secretary's office, Garner felt he had an obligation to state the depths of his concerns.

"We've made three tragic decisions," Garner said.

"Really?" Rumsfeld said.

"Three terrible mistakes," Garner said. He cited the extent of the de-Baathification, getting rid of the army, and summarily dumping the Iraqi leadership group. Disbanding the military had been the biggest mistake. Now there were hundreds of thousands of disorganized, unemployed, armed Iraqis running around. Garner made his final point: "There's still time to rectify this. There's still time to turn it around."

Rumsfeld looked at Garner for a moment with his take-no-prisoners gaze. "Well," he said, "I don't think there is anything we can do, because we are where we are."

Rumsfeld and Garner went to the White House to see Bush. It was Garner's second time with the president. "Mr. President, let me tell you a couple of stories," Garner said. Describing meetings with Iraqis, Garner painted a positive picture. "I'd get ready to leave," Garner said, "and this is true—as I leave they're all thumbs-up and they'd say, 'God bless Mr. George Bush and Mr. Tony Blair. Thank you for taking away Saddam Hussein.' That was in 70 meetings. That always was the final response."

"Oh, that's good," Bush said.

On the way out, Bush slapped Garner on the back. "Hey Jay, you want to do Iran?"

"Sir, the boys and I talked about that and we want to hold out for Cuba. We think the rum and the cigars are a little better … The women are prettier."

Bush laughed. "You got it. You got Cuba."

Of course with all the stories, jocularity, buddy-buddy talk, bluster and confidence in the Oval Office, Garner had left out the headline. He had not mentioned the problems he saw, or even hinted at them. He did not tell Bush about the three tragic mistakes. Once again the aura of the presidency had shut out the most important news—the bad news.

It was only one example of a visitor to the Oval Office not telling the president the whole story or the truth. Likewise, in these moments where Bush had someone from the field there in the chair beside him, he did not press, did not try to open the door himself and ask what the visitor had seen and thought. The whole atmosphere too often resembled a royal court, with Cheney and Rice in attendance, some upbeat stories, exaggerated good news, and a good time had by all.

DOJ_NMG_0072699

Soon Rumsfeld was distancing himself from Bremer, who, on paper, was to report to the president through the secretary of defense. Rumsfeld later confirmed to me in an interview that he felt that Bremer had only "technically but not really" reported to him.

"He didn't call home much," Rumsfeld said of Bremer.

Rumsfeld also stepped away from the hunt for Saddam's alleged WMD. CIA Director George Tenet proposed to Rumsfeld that the person in charge of the WMD hunt report to both of them.

"Absolutely not," Rumsfeld said.

After Bush's re-election in November 2004, the biggest question mark at the White House was Rumsfeld. Should he stay? White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. had to approach the issue with delicacy. The biggest voice for change was outgoing Secretary of State Colin Powell. In one conversation, Powell had told Card, "If I go, Don should go." Bush had decided to replace Powell with Rice, but it was unclear who he wanted at Defense.

Card got out his "hit-by-the-bus" book, an 8½-by-11-inch spiral notebook, a half-inch thick with a blue cover. On separate pages he had lists of possible replacements for all the major administration posts, including his own. The names were listed in no particular order. Card kept the notebook in his desk at the White House and periodically added or deleted names. He had intentionally used a student notebook, something he had bought himself, so it wouldn't be considered a government document or a presidential record that might someday be opened to history. It was private and personal.

His list of 11 possible Rumsfeld replacements included Senator Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who had been Al Gore's running mate in 2000, and Republican Arizona Senator John McCain.

But Card had what he thought was a great idea—a sleeper candidate. The best replacement for Rumsfeld would be James A. Baker III. "Everyone would say, 'Phew,'" Card said. "No learning curve. Great. Interesting." Baker was 74, only two years older than Rumsfeld. He had served in the Marine Corps. He had been the best modern White House chief of staff, Card thought. He had successfully handled the 2000 Florida recount for Bush. Mr. President, this is my quiet counsel, Card said. Put a diplomat in the Defense Department.

The president seemed genuinely intrigued. You don't have to rush to make a decision, Card advised. But the president would not even authorize Card to send out feelers or to enter into any discussion with Baker.

Card spoke with Rumsfeld, who talked as if he presumed there would be no change. Rumsfeld wanted to stay.

Soon Karl Rove weighed in. A contentious session with Congress was coming up. As he saw it, the Democrats were in no mood for a honeymoon. With Rice's confirmation hearing and with the expected nomination of White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales as attorney general, would another Senate confirmation overload the system? And, clearly, the conduct of the war in Iraq would be the subject of confirmation hearings for anyone Bush nominated to be the new secretary of defense.

Rove agreed they did not want to do anything that would prompt hearings on the war. Jesus, no.

In mid-December the president made his final decision. Rumsfeld would stay, he indicated to Cheney and Card. He couldn't change Rumsfeld.

"That didn't mean he didn't want to," Card later said.

Card tried to have a private, candid session with First Lady Laura Bush about every six weeks to hear her concerns. He set aside an hour and a half for each meeting. Sometimes it took 30 minutes, sometimes the full hour and one half and on occasion two hours.

The first lady was distressed about the war, worried that Rumsfeld was hurting her husband, and her perspective seemed to reflect Rice's concern about Rumsfeld's over-bearing style and tendency to dominate. Card knew that the first lady and Rice often took long walks together on the Camp David weekends.

"I agree with you," Card said. On one level he was trying to educate and explain, but he was also lobbying. So he outlined his problems with Rumsfeld and how he believed it was time for a change. He said, however, so far his advice on the Rumsfeld situation had been considered and rejected.

"He's happy with this," the first lady said, "but I'm not." Another time she said, "I don't know why he's not upset with this."

As the new secretary of state, Rice hired Philip Zelikow, an old friend, as the counselor to the State Department, a powerful but little known top post that would leave him free to undertake special assignments for her, and quickly dispatched him and a small team to Iraq. On February 10, Rice's 14th day as secretary, Zelikow presented her with a 15-page, single-spaced memo classified SECRET/NODIS, meaning "no distribution" to anyone else. "At this point Iraq remains a failed state shadowed by constant violence and undergoing revolutionary political change," Rice read. This was a shocking notion—"a failed state," after two years, thousands of lives, and hundreds of billions of dollars.

In midsummer 2005, General Jim Jones, the NATO commander, paid a call on his old friend General Pete Pace, the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs. It was virtually certain that Pace was going to move up to become chairman, the number one military position.

The two Marine generals had been friends for more than three decades. They had been in Vietnam at about the same time, a searing and formative experience for both, and then served side-by-side as first lieutenants in 1970 at the Marine barracks in southeast Washington.

Jones expressed chagrin that Pace would even want to be chairman. "You're going to face a debacle and be part of the debacle in Iraq," he said. U.S. prestige was at a 50- or 75-year low in the world. He said he was so worried about Iraq and the way Rumsfeld ran things that he wondered if he himself should not resign in protest. "How do you have the stomach for eight years in the Pentagon?" he finally asked.

Pace said that someone had to be chairman. Who else would do it?

Jones did not have an answer. "Military advice is being influenced on a political level," he said. The JCS had improperly "surrendered" to Rumsfeld. "You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder."

His concern was complete. When Senators John Warner and Carl Levin, the chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, visited him at his headquarters in Belgium, Jones told them about all the problems. He said they needed new legislationto re-empower the service chiefs or make some kind of sense of the crazy system.

"The Joint Chiefs have been systematically emasculated by Rumsfeld," Jones said.

Pace soon became chairman. In an interview, he flatly denied that Jones had told him that Iraq was a debacle or that Rumsfeld had systematically emasculated the Joint Chiefs. "He's a good friend. He was in my wedding," Pace said, noting they had known each other for 36 years. "If Jim felt that way he would tell me."

I called Jones at NATO headquarters in Belgium. He said that he had made all those comments to Pace in their meeting in 2005. "That's what I told him," Jones said.

In March 2006, Rumsfeld invited six of the Pentagon's regular outside advisers in to be briefed and ask questions. One was Ken Adelman, a longtime Rumsfeld friend and vehement early supporter of the war who had become entirely disillusioned over the administration's handling of the postwar. His relationship with Rumsfeld was almost over.

"What metrics would you use for success in Iraq?" Adelman asked Rumsfeld. "You know, for winning the war?"

"Oh, there are hundreds," Rumsfeld replied. "It's just so complicated that there are hundreds."

"Wait a minute," Adelman insisted. "A former boss of mine always said identify three or four things, then always ask about, get measurements and you'll get progress or else you'll never get any progress." The former boss was Rumsfeld himself, who had driven the point home to Adelman 35 years ago, when he worked for Rumsfeld at the Office of Economic Opportunity. What are they? Adelman insisted.

Rumsfeld said it was so complicated that he could not give a list. "Hundreds," he insisted.

Adelman believed that meant there was a total lack of accountability. If Rumsfeld didn't agree to any criteria, he couldn't be said to have failed on any criteria.

"Then you don't have anything," Adelman said. He left as dis-turbed as ever. There was no accountability.

On March 16, General John Abizaid, the commander of CENTCOM and thus the top military officer for the Middle East, was in Washington to testify before the Senate Armed Services Committee. He painted a careful but upbeat picture of the situation in Iraq. Afterward, he went over to see Congressman John Murtha, the 73-year old former Marine who had introduced a resolution the previous November calling for the redeployment of troops from Iraq as soon as practicable. Sitting at the round, dark wood table in the congressman's office, Abizaid, the one uniformed military commander who had been intimately involved in Iraq from the beginning and who was still at it, indicated he wanted to speak frankly. According to Murtha, Abizaid raised his hand for emphasis and held his thumb and forefinger a quarter of an inch from each other and said, "We're that far apart."

Rumsfeld circulated a six-page SECRET memo on May 1, proposing some fixes, entitled "Illustrative New 21st Century Institutions and Approaches."

It was almost the latest version of the "Anchor Chain" memos he had written in his first months as secretary in 2001—a cry from his bureaucratic and managerial heart. Not only was the Defense Department tangled in its anchor chain but so was the rest of the U.S. government, and the world.

He dictated, "The charge of incompetence against the U.S. government should be easy to rebut if the American people understand the extent to which the current system of government makes competence next to impossible."

On Wednesday, May 24, 2006, the intelligence division of the Joint Staff, the J-2, circulated an intelligence assessment, classified SECRET, that showed that the forces of terror in Iraq were not in retreat. It put hard numbers on trends that had been reported to Bush all year. Terrorist attacks had been steadily increasing. The insurgency was gaining. Attacks were now averaging 700 to 800 a week. Every IED that was discovered—whether it detonated and caused damage or casualties or was identified and disarmed before it could do any damage—was still counted as an attack. A graph measuring attacks from May 2003 to May 2006 showed some significant dips, but the current number of attacks was as high as they had ever been—exceeding 3,500 a month.

I told Rumsfeld that I understood the number of attacks was going up.

"That's probably true," he said. "It is also probably true that our data's better, and we're categorizing more things as attacks. A random round can be an attack and all the way up to killing 50 people someplace. So you've got a whole fruit bowl of different things—a banana and an apple and an orange."

I was speechless. Even with the loosest and most careless use of language and analogy, I did not understand how the secretary of defense would compare insurgent attacks to a "fruit bowl," a metaphor that stripped them of all urgency and emotion. The official categories in the classified reports that Rumsfeld regularly received were the lethal IEDs, standoff attacks with mortars, and close-engagements such as ambushes—as far from bananas, apples and oranges as possible.

During one week in May 2006, enemy-initiated attacks soared to 900, a new record. In June, attacks went down to about 825 one week but then spiked up again. By July it was over 1,000 a week, again a new record. It was even worse considering the level of violence existed after two years spent training, equipping and funding 263,000 Iraqi soldiers and police. The cost had been $10 billion, and American teams had been embedded with most of the Iraqi units for over a year. At an equivalent time in 1971, after several years of Vietnamization, the trend lines of insurgent violence had been down, not up.

In July 2006, I interviewed Rumsfeld on two successive afternoons. I asked him about troop levels—a key issue and point of contention. The record showed that the plan for invading Iraq had a top number of 275,000 ground combat forces, including about 90,000 who were scheduled to flow into Iraq in the weeks and months after March 19, 2003, when the war began. Rumsfeld said it is one of the great "canards" that he had decided or unduly influenced the decision to not bring in the 90,000. It was all on General Franks's recommendation, he said. But by the summer of 2006, Rumsfeld had softened his position on the issue of whether there were enough troops. "It's entirely possible there were too many at some point and too few at some point, because no one's perfect," he said. "In retrospect I have not seen or heard anything from the other opiners that suggests to me that they have any reason to believe that they were right and we were wrong. Nor can I prove we were right and they were wrong. The only thing I can say is they seem to have a lot more certainty than my assessment of the facts would permit me to have."

Asked about the battle with the Iraq insurgency, he said, "It could take eight to 10 years. Insurgencies have a tendency to do that." Overall he said, "Our exit strategy is to have the Iraqis' government and security forces capable of managing a lower-level insurgency and ultimately achieving victory over it and repressing it over time. But it would be a period after we may very well not have large numbers of people there."

I said I understood that General George W. Casey Jr., the top commander of forces on the ground in Iraq, had reported that the insurgency had not been neutralized—key goal of his campaign plan—but only contained. After some typical verbal jousting, I was able to ask directly, "Do you agree it has not been neutralized?"

"Oh clearly not," Rumsfeld answered.

"Only contained?"

"Yeah," he said. "Thus far."

DOJ_NMG_0072702

I then read from the May 24, 2006, assessment that said the "Sunni Arab insurgency is gaining strength and increasing capacity." I asked him, "Does that sound right to you?"

Here was one of the central questions in any war. Was the other side "gaining strength and increasing capacity?" General Casey the Joint Chiefs' intelligence staff, and the CIA had all categorically said the insurgency was gaining. Certainly Rumsfeld knew that. I had also quoted from the assessment on a list of 29 sample questions I had submitted in advance, and I know he had spent at least one hour the day before preparing for the interview.

"When was this?" Rumsfeld asked.

Six weeks ago, I answered. The question on the table was whether he agreed or not that the insurgency in the Iraq War was gaining. I was ready for a pure Rumsfeldian moment, and I was not disappointed.

"Gosh, I don't know," the secretary of defense replied. "I don't want to comment on it. I read so many of those intelligence reports"—I had never said it was an intelligence report—"and they are all over the lot. In a given day you can see one from one agency, and one from another agency, and then I'll ask Casey or Abizaid what they think about it, or Pete Pace, 'Is that your view?' And try and triangulate and see what people think. But it changes from month to month. I'm not going to go back and say I agree or don't agree with something like that."

He was right that there might be some changes month to month, but, as he knew, the overall assessment and trend was visibly, measurably and dramatically worse.

I asked Rumsfeld what was the best, most optimistic scenario for a positive outcome in Iraq.

"This business is ugly," he replied. "It's tough. There isn't any best. A long, hard slog, I think I wrote years ago. We're facing a set of challenges that are different than our country understands … They're different than our Congress understands. They're different than our government, much of our government, probably understands and is organized or trained or equipped to cope with and deal with. We're dealing with enemies that can turn inside our decision circles." The enemy can move swiftly, he said. "They don't have parliaments and bureaucracies and real estate to defend and interact with or deal with or cope with. They can do what they want. They aren't held accountable for lying or for killing innocent men, women and children.

"There's something about the body politic in the United States that they can accept the enemy killing innocent men, women and children and cutting off people's heads, but have zero tolerance for some soldier who does something he shouldn't do."

"Are you optimistic?" I asked.

Rumsfeld looked through me and continued. Three of his aides who were sitting with us at the table in his office could not help but register surprise as Rumsfeld plowed on without answering.

"We're fighting the first war in history in the new century," he continued, "and with all these new realities, with an industrial-age organization in an environment that has not adapted and adjusted, a public environment that has not adapted and adjusted."

At the end of the second of two interviews, I quoted former Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara: "Any military commander who is honest with you will say he's made mistakes that have cost lives."

"Um hmm," Rumsfeld said.

"Is that correct?"

"I don't know. I suppose that a military commander..."

"Which you are," I interrupted.

"No I'm not," the secretary of defense said.

"Yes, sir," I said.

"No, no. Well … "

"Yes. Yes," I said, raising my hand in the air and ticking off the hierarchy. "It's commander in chief, secretary of defense, combatant commander."

"I can see a military commander in a uniform who is engaged in a conflict having to make decisions that result in people living or dying and that that would be a truth. And certainly if you go up the chain to the civilian side to the president and to me, you could by indirection, two or three steps removed, make the case."

DOJ_NMG_0072703

Indirection? Two or three steps removed? It was inexplicable. Rumsfeld had spent so much time insisting on the chain of command. He was in control—not the Joint Chiefs, not the uniformed military, not the National Security Council or the NSC staff, not the critics or the opiners. How could he not see his role and responsibility?

I could think of nothing more to say.

Into The Blacksnake's Lair (NSWK)

By Michael Hastings

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

Murat Karayilan prefers to travel in darkness. Under cover of a starry night, his white Nissan Pathfinder crawls up a narrow gravel road in Iraq's mountainous far north to a typical-looking village house. Karayilan—his name is Turkish for "blacksnake"—is a hunted man. To the east, Iran's anti-U.S. leaders would like nothing better than to see the Kurdish guerrilla commander jailed or dead. To the west, America's longtime allies in the Turkish government feel the same. The State Department lists his group, the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), as a terrorist organization. "We are not terrorists," the Blacksnake tells NEWSWEEK, seated in a sparsely furnished room with a stone floor. "The U.S. has seen us through the eyes of our enemies. We want you to see us as friends."

That's not easy. Even as U.S. forces struggle against rising chaos and violence elsewhere in Iraq, the fear now is that the north could also be engulfed, thanks to Kurdish separatists' use of Iraqi soil as a staging area for their war against the Turks and the Iranians. The rebels see themselves as standing up against centuries of often brutal repression. This year the Blacksnake's guerrillas have staged more than 250 attacks on Turkey, in one bloody week killing 14 Turkish soldiers, a toll unmatched since a decade ago, at the height of the separatist conflict. Ankara keeps threatening to send its troops into Iraq to root out the rebels. Meanwhile, a PKK-affiliated group in Iraq is picking fights with Iran. In recent weeks the violence has escalated, as everyone tries to inflict as much damage as possible before winter snows interrupt the fighting.

There is no authority but the PKK in its corner of Iraq. To get there you climb a winding road where even the shepherds carry AK-47s, into the Qandil Mountains, a stretch of high peaks straddling the borderlands of Iraq, Turkey and Iran. The last Iraqi government checkpoint is at the foot of the mountains, guarded by soldiers from Iraq's Kurdish Regional Government. It flies the flag of Iraqi Kurdistan, a yellow sunburst on a field of green, white and red. The flag at the next checkpoint, almost two miles above sea level, belongs to the PKK: a red star on a yellow sun outlined in green. Armed guerrillas make sure no one goes farther without permission from PKK central command. Around the bend, an immense portrait has been painted on the rocky hillside—the face of Abdullah Ocalan, the group's founder.

Ocalan created the PKK in the 1970s as a Kurdish national liberation movement against Turkish rule. The Kurdish-speaking people, whose homelands stretch from Iran to Syria and eastern Turkey, have never had a country all their own. In the 1980s, the PKK's fighters reportedly hung out with Yasir Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization and made pilgrimages to Lebanon's Bekaa Valley, then a hive of anti-U.S. terrorism. By the time Ocalan was captured in 1999, his war had claimed some 37,000 lives.

Karayilan has set a very different tone. He spoke glowingly to NEWSWEEK about democracy and human rights and "Mr. Bush's new Middle East project." He says his 7,000 armed fighters could be a valuable ally for the United States against Islamic fundamentalism. Not to mention Iran. The Free Life Party (PJAK, pronounced "peshak"), a two-year-old offshoot of Karayilan's group, claims some 1,500 guerrillas along the Iranian border from Azerbaijan to Iraq. American forces in Iraq have steered clear of the group, at least in public. "We have the same enemy as the U.S., but they do not extend help to us," PJAK's leader, Abdul Rahman Haji Ahmadi, told NEWSWEEK in a phone interview from his exile home in Germany.

The Blacksnake's guerrillas remain on the terrorist list. Washington recently named retired Gen. Joseph Ralston as "anti-PKK coordinator," to work on a plan for disarming the group. Last weekend the guerrillas proclaimed a unilateral ceasefire. No one was impressed. At least four previous ceasefires have failed, and last week Turkey issued a pre-emptive dismissal of any PKK peace offer. "The PKK usually hibernate over the winter," says one Turkish diplomat. "When spring comes, they are up to their usual business again." The Blacksnake shows no sign of quitting the fight. "If the Turkish Army comes to Iraq, they will lose the battle," he promises. "They have lost 100 times already." Across the border, Turkey's troops are itching to accept that challenge.

'Whatever Is Necessary' (NSWK)

By Lally Weymouth

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

Turkey's foreign minister, Abdullah Gul, was in New York last week and spoke bluntly with NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth about how the Turkish government sees the situation in Iraq. He warned that if the Iraqi Kurds did not curb the PKK terrorist group, Turkey may take matters into its own hands. Excerpts:

WEYMOUTH: Last week Iraq's President [Jalal] Talabani said that if Turkey continues to meddle in Iraq's affairs, the Iraqi Kurds will support opposition movements of other countries.

GUL: I was surprised, because Turkey is the one country that has really contributed to the Iraqi [Kurds]. Turkey is the country that protected them when there was a chemical attack in Saddam's time. I think Talabani's statement was unfortunate and unwise. He is not the leader of one of the tribes now; he is the president of Iraq. So he has to be careful in his statements.

Was Talabani suggesting supporting the PKK?

The PKK is a terrorist organization. The Americans ... will [ultimately] withdraw, and he will be living with his neighbors—so he should be careful.

Last week Talabani told me that Iraq had convinced the PKK to announce a ceasefire and that a new chapter would soon open in relations between Turkey and Iraq.

What is the new chapter? Turkey is one of the main countries that has stressed the territorial integrity of Iraq. We are protecting their territory.

Do you think there is about to be a ceasefire with the PKK?

We cannot bargain with a terrorist organization.

Do you think the Kurds could control the PKK if they wanted to?

If they don't, we have the capacity, ability and determination to fight to the end ... PKK terrorism has increased. Also, the PKK has a new source of weapons. They have obtained weapons and explosives from the Iraqi Army. They bring them into Turkey and use them with remote-control devices.

Are the Iraqi Kurds working hand in hand with the PKK?

I don't want to say this, but they are not doing enough. The PKK terrorists feel relaxed to move about. We are expecting serious cooperation on this issue from all Iraqis as well as from the U.S. In the past, the leader of the PKK lived in Syria, and that regime was the enemy. Now the leaders of the PKK are in northern Iraq, which is controlled by the Coalition forces.

So, would Turkey invade northern Iraq to bring the PKK under control?

We will do whatever is necessary to fight this organization. I want to give the message that if our friends don't help us, we will do the job ourselves.

The White House has announced that PKK terrorism is on the agenda of the meeting President Bush will hold with [Turkish] Prime Minister [Recep] Erdogan this week.

We appreciate that several times President Bush has declared that the U.S. will take serious steps to fight terrorism, but we have to see the results.

When President Talabani was in the United States last week, he painted an optimistic picture of Iraq.

Since the beginning of this year, 16,000 people have been killed there. There is an escalation of the violence. Sectarianism is getting worse and worse.

In the United States many people believe the time has come to withdraw.

How can you leave a vacuum over there? Then, what will happen? All the neighbors of Iraq and the U.S. should work hand in hand with the Iraqi government and the different tribes in Iraq to bring stability. I think it is possible. There is no other way. You have to put things in order.

Here people are asking, why doesn't Iraq split into three parts?

DOJ_NMG_0072705

The neighboring countries will not accept this. That idea should be forgotten—it should not be an option. Those [who favor it] don't know Iraq or the region.

You said previously in Washington that you thought Iran might respond positively to nuclear talks. What is your assessment now?

A good package has been given to Iran. During my visit to Iran in August, I met with all the leaders and they said they appreciated the package—I learned this from [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad. He said that this package is different than previous ones. With good intentions, I think there can be a solution.

Why doesn't he suspend nuclear activity?

They say that when they are guaranteed delivery of all the things in the package, then they will suspend. Both sides lack confidence [in each other]. As a neighbor country, we want to see a peaceful solution. We don't want to see any nuclear weapon in our neighborhood.

Saddam's Revenge (TIME)

By Brian Bennett

Time, October 2, 2006

Baghdad

When Ahmed Hassani Mohammed al-Dujaili took the stand as witness No. 1 in the trial of Saddam Hussein last December, he might have thought his worst nightmares were behind him. On a summer afternoon in 1982, two days after gunmen in his town opened fire on a presidential motorcade, Ahmed and all the other males in his family were rounded up by Saddam's Special Republican Guard. Ahmed and three of his 11 brothers were eventually released; the rest disappeared. Two years later, Saddam signed execution orders for six of Ahmed's brothers; a seventh died during interrogation. They were among the 148 men and boys Saddam is accused of ordering killed in retaliation for the assassination attempt. Ahmed says that when he recounted those horrors in court, he looked over at Saddam. The deposed dictator stroked his beard, looked Ahmed dead in the eye and ran his forefinger across his throat.

Since then, the nightmare has returned to Dujail. Ahmed believes that Saddam's throat-slitting gesture, made while television cameras were rolling, was a message to loyalists to kill Ahmed's family. Two of his cousins were kidnapped in July and haven't been heard from since. On Aug. 6, his brother Ali Hassan Mohammed al-Dujaili, another witness, was attacked in the middle of Dujail. Ahmed's nephew Husam was killed while protecting Ali. When Ahmed's younger brother Jaafer came to collect Husam's body, a sniper lying in wait put several bullets in Jaafer's legs. Jaafer lived but will always walk with a severe limp. He is among the lucky ones. The town's mayor, Haji Mohammed Hassan al-Zubeidy, says some 180 people have been murdered in Dujail since Saddam's trial began in October 2005. Basam Ridah, adviser to the Prime Minister for the Saddam trial, puts the number closer to 200. About 80 more have vanished while traveling on the road between Dujail and Baghdad. "Have you ever heard of the Bermuda Triangle?" asks Mahmoud Hussein al-Hesreji, chief of the Dujail city council. "It's just like that."

On Oct. 16, a five-judge panel will deliver a verdict on whether Saddam and his regime carried out the original 148 killings in Dujail. If convicted, he will face the death penalty. That trial, as well as a second one focused on the massacre of Iraqi Kurds in 1988, has been taking place inside the heavily secured Green Zone, where a succession of judges have given the former dictator the kind of hearing he never afforded his victims. But for many others associated with the trials, there has been no refuge from assassins who take justice--and revenge--into their own hands. Shi'ite death squads have murdered defense lawyers, while ex-Baathists have targeted the families of prosecutors and judges. The brother-in-law of Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa, the second trial's presiding judge, was gunned down last week in Baghdad. If putting Saddam on trial is intended to help Iraqis bury the demons of his murderous rule, the spate of vendetta killings has served as a reminder of the unchecked mayhem that has followed it.

Nowhere has the trial brought more misery than in Dujail, a town of 84,000, most of them Shi'ites, in the middle of the Sunni triangle. Since the start of Saddam's trial, Dujail has been infiltrated by ex-Baathist hit squads. Residents believe they have been ordered by Saddam's former henchmen to take out the families of witnesses. A number of insurgent cells operating around Saddam's hometown of Tikrit, a mere 45-minute drive north of Dujail, have targeted relatives of witnesses, most of whom rarely leave the Green Zone. Abu Hamid, commander of a nationalist cell based north of Dujail, says if any of the witnesses in the Saddam trial leave the Green Zone to return home, "we will destroy all of Dujail. If the people of Dujail allow these villains to live in the town, they will get the same treatment."

The plight of the town reflects the broader collapse of order in the center of Iraq. Insurgents have destroyed the town's water and electricity facilities. Mayor al-Zubeidy says he needs at least 200 more people from the police or Iraqi National Guard to secure the entrances and exits of Dujail. He says he has been unable to persuade the Iraqi government to send reinforcements to the town. "We haven't gotten any support from any of the governments," he says. "There is almost a siege of Dujail, and we can't move out. If they catch you on the way to Baghdad and they find out you are from Dujail, you will be killed at once." The town has provided Ali with three police bodyguards, but he still feels vulnerable. "I'm hunted," he says. "The government is ignoring Dujail."

The killings in Dujail speak to a larger battle being waged in the Iraqi psyche. In Saddam's police state, there were navigable boundaries that made it possible to live. True, the executions by Saddam's regime in Dujail showed that those boundaries were a mirage: they could close in on you in less time than it takes a bullet to fly from the barrel of a gun. But life in Iraq has become so bloody and death so ever present, random and unpredictable that some Iraqis are nostalgic for Saddam's tyranny. When I told U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad about the killings of witnesses' families in Dujail, he shook his head but said the current loss of life is "different than a government carrying on violence against its own citizens." Iraqis, he says, "have paid and are paying a high price to potentially head in a great direction that was not available under Saddam."

It is indicative of the scale of Saddam's brutality that there are some in Dujail who believe the current bloodshed is preferable to what preceded it. "Of course, now it is much better," says Ali, speaking by phone from Dujail. "Saddam's terrorism would go on forever if he were still in power." Ali's brother Ahmed, witness No. 1 in the Saddam trial, doesn't know when he will leave the Green Zone or what awaits him if he does. But after spending his high school years in prison and losing most of his brothers, he says he is willing to pay the ultimate price to see Saddam answer for his crimes: "I'll give up my own life and the lives of my family if it means I have helped send Saddam to the gallows." The sobering reality is that both may come true.

Letter Gives Glimpse Of Al-Qaeda's Leadership (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Six months before the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in June, a senior al-Qaeda figure warned him in a letter that he risked removal as al-Qaeda's leader in Iraq if he continued to alienate Sunni tribal and religious leaders and rival insurgent groups.

The author of the Dec. 11 letter, who said he was writing from al-Qaeda headquarters in the Waziristan region of Pakistan, was a member of Osama bin Laden's high command who signed himself "Atiyah." The military's Combating Terrorism Center at West Point, which last week released a 15-page English translation of the Arabic document made public in Iraq, said his real identity was "unknown."

But counterterrorism officials said they believe he is Atiyah Abd al-Rahman, a 37-year-old Libyan who joined bin Laden in Afghanistan as a teenager during the 1980s. He has since gained considerable stature in al-Qaeda as an explosives expert and Islamic scholar. After becoming acquainted with Zarqawi in the western Afghan city of Herat in the late 1990s, he became al-Qaeda's main interlocutor with the fiery Jordanian.

Atiyah's name does not appear on any published U.S. government list of known or suspected terrorists. But his biography, as described by counterterrorism officials who agreed to discuss him on the condition that they not be named, offers a rare glimpse into the cadre of loyal senior aides who escaped with bin Laden into the mountainous Afghan-Pakistani border region in the fall of 2001.

The letter, the first document to emerge from what the military described as a "treasure trove" of information uncovered from Iraqi safe houses at the time of Zarqawi's death, provides new details of a debilitated al-Qaeda leadership-in-hiding, locating it in Waziristan.

"I am with them," Atiyah writes Zarqawi of the high command, "and they have some comments about some of your circumstances."

DOJ_NMG_0072707

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said on a visit to the United States last week that he believes bin Laden and his top lieutenants are on the Afghan side of the border. U.S. military and intelligence officials have long believed that the al-Qaeda leadership is hiding in one of the tribal provinces on the Pakistani side of the border, and Atiyah's letter, if accurate, would confirm their location at the time it was written.

Atiyah bemoans the difficulty of direct communications between Waziristan and Iraq and suggests that it is easier for Zarqawi to send a trusted representative to Pakistan than the other way around. The "brothers," he writes, "wish that they had a way to talk to you and advise you, and to guide and instruct you; however, they too are occupied with vicious enemies here.

"They are also weak," he continued, "and we ask God that He strengthen them and mend their fractures. They have many of their own problems, but they are people of reason, experience and sound, beneficial knowledge. . . . This letter represents the majority of, and a synopsis of, what the brothers want to say to you."

Deemed authentic by military and counterterrorism officials, Atiyah's letter adds context to events in al-Qaeda's often rocky relationship with its Iraqi subsidiary, shedding new light on the depth of the organization's concern over Zarqawi and the limits of its control over him.

An earlier letter to Zarqawi, written in July 2005 by bin Laden deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, made some of the same points in more formal and less pointed words. But it appeared to have little effect. In September 2005, Zarqawi released an audiotape accusing Sunni leaders and Shiites of cooperating with U.S. forces and promising their certain death.

Atiyah's letter begins with warm personal words for Zarqawi. "I am setting this out as an introduction," he says, because the rest of his letter "will be primarily about the negatives and cautioning against things that are perilous and ruinous."

Zarqawi had been placed in a position of high responsibility, Atiyah continues, but needed to expand his circle of advisers in Iraq and listen more to those with a better sense of al-Qaeda's wider political objectives. If his words led Zarqawi to wonder if he were being asked to step down, Atiyah writes, the response would be "not necessarily." But, he continues, "it is a possibility if you find at some point someone who is better and more suitable than you." Sharia law, he reminds, requires that "proper fitness be ordained."

Atiyah orders him not to make "any decision on a comprehensive issue" without consulting bin Laden, Zawahiri and the other "brothers." He said Zarqawi should improve his relationship with other Sunni insurgent groups in Iraq and be more judicious in using the al-Qaeda name in his operations.

Atiyah refers to a bombing in Jordan ordered by Zarqawi as the kind of operation that requires consultation. He urges the utmost caution "against attempting to kill any religious scholar or tribal leader who is obeyed, and of good repute in Iraq from among the Sunnis, no matter what." After they have succeeded in driving out U.S. forces and dismantling the Iraqi government, he writes, "then we can behave differently."

"Know that we, like all mujahiddin, are still weak. . . . We have not yet reached a level of stability. We have no alternative but to not squander any element of the foundations of strength or any helper or supporter."

Atiyah's December missive seemed to produce at least temporary results. In January, Zarqawi's organization, al-Qaeda in Iraq, announced it was melding operations with other Sunni insurgent groups under a new umbrella organization called the Mujaheddin Shura Council. But any hopes of appealing to Shiites -- seen by al-Qaeda as an interim necessity that would be abandoned once U.S. forces were ejected -- was eliminated when Zarqawi-affiliated forces blew up an important Shiite shrine, the golden-domed al-Askari mosque in Samarra, in February. A number of Sunni tribal leaders in Iraq's Anbar province have also been killed this year under the Shura Council banner.

Since Zarqawi's death in a U.S. air raid near the Iraqi city of Baqouba in June, the new leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, has appeared more in tune with al-Qaeda's wishes and has reached out to Sunni tribal and religious leaders. Competing for their support with the U.S.-backed Iraqi government of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, al-Muhajer on Thursday issued a public appeal for their forgiveness and pledged to respect their scholarship and status.

Atiyah is no longer in Waziristan, according to U.S. officials who declined to speculate on his current whereabouts. But they said he was not in U.S. custody and expressed certainty that he is still alive. Asked what priority they attach to his capture, one official said: "He is an important figure. . . . The world would be a much safer place with him off the streets."

DOJ_NMG_0072708

The official said that Atiyah is one of a number of senior al-Qaeda figures whose names have not been made public. "We knew about him," he said. "There are a lot of key al-Qaeda people that might not be on lists for the general public or the press." Rita Katz, whose Washington-based SITE Institute monitors extremist Web sites, said she believes that Atiyah is a "top al-Qaeda strategist" who frequently appears on a password-protected site under the name of Louis Atiyah Allah. "He's the one the jihadists go to when they have a question. He tells them what to do, what fatwahs to provide. He communicates with the jihadi online community."

The counterterrorism official declined to say whether the government believes Louis Atiyah and Atiyah Abd al-Rahman are the same person.

Atiyah's journey from Libya to a prominent position in the al-Qaeda hierarchy began like that of many young Muslims who traveled to Afghanistan to join the Afghan mujaheddin fighting a Soviet military occupation in the 1980s. Many were recruited and organized there by bin Laden, a charismatic Saudi who had joined the mujaheddin cause. U.S. officials said Atiyah was principally based around the eastern Afghan city of Jalalabad.

In the early 1990s, after a brief return to Saudi Arabia, bin Laden transferred his operations to Sudan. The 1991 U.S. action against Iraq had given him a new cause, and his al-Qaeda organization, formed of the foreign recruits he had organized in Afghanistan, declared war against the U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf.

As bin Laden organized in Sudan, Atiyah went to Algeria, where he is believed to have fought with the Armed Islamic Group (known as GIA, its French initials).

When the Taliban took power in Kabul in 1996, bin Laden returned to Afghanistan, where Atiyah joined him in establishing terrorist training camps. After his release from a Jordanian prison, Zarqawi arrived in Afghanistan in 1999. Although he had only a tenuous relationship with al-Qaeda, Zarqawi took bin Laden's money to set up his own training camp near Herat to prepare to overthrow the Jordanian government in Amman.

It was in Herat, U.S. officials believe, that a relationship was established between Zarqawi and Atiyah.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Zarqawi traveled to Iran and then to northern Iraq. After U.S. forces invaded Iraq in March 2003, he leveraged his al-Qaeda connections to gain legitimacy and adherents to an anti-U.S. insurgency. In October 2004, he changed the name of his burgeoning organization to al-Qaeda in Iraq.

Atiyah's liaison role was "more a function of his long-term ties to al-Qaeda and his relationship with the al-Qaeda central leadership and their interest in seeing him assume this role as opposed to a close relationship with Zarqawi," a counterterrorism official said.

In Hunt For Terrorists In Iraq, General Is No Armchair Warrior (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

A group of American terrorist-hunters that included one of the most senior commanders in Iraq quickly descended on the burned-out rubble that framed the dying body of Abu Musab Zarqawi.

The deadly operative of al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden, Zarqawi had been the personal quarry of a super-secret task force whose backbone is the Army Delta Force and Navy SEALs of U.S. Joint Special Operations Command (JSOC). Its commander, Army Lt. Gen. Stanley A. McChrystal, was so personally involved in the hunt that he went with his men to the bombed-out hut near Baqouba to make sure they got their man.

A source close to the special-operations community said Gen. McChrystal's eyes-on identification is representative of the three-star general's hands-on approach as Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's chief terrorist pursuer in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"He goes on raids. He doesn't sit back at headquarters," said the source, who asked not to be named. A spokesman at U.S. Special Operations Command in Tampa, Fla., declined to comment on the general's operating style.

The West Point graduate's personal commitment to the mission has led some to dub him the first "commander-forward" of JSOC. He spends little time at the command's headquarters at Fort Bragg, N.C. Instead, he shuttles between task forces in Afghanistan and Iraq to personally supervise hundreds of commandos.

DOJ_NMG_0072709

Gen. McChrystal's team was so instrumental in finding Zarqawi, and enabling an Air Force F-16 National Guard pilot to kill him in an air strike, that President Bush thanked the general in a phone call to him and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

"I haven't spoken to our commanders yet, except to call Gen. Casey and McChrystal and congratulate them, but more importantly, for them to congratulate the troops and the intel groups that were working on finding Zarqawi," Mr. Bush said at a June 10 press conference at Camp David.

The "intel groups" represent part of Gen. McChrystal's domain. He oversees a task force that includes JSOC, as well as a special intelligence group that specializes in intercepting communications and the "Night Stalkers" aviation unit. The group is augmented by intelligence officers, including the CIA and Defense Intelligence Agency.

The task force's special intelligence unit cinched the kill. Once Jordanian agents identified Zarqawi's clerical adviser, a frequent visitor to the al Qaeda in Iraq leader, the intelligence unit used special technical means to track his whereabouts. On June 7, the unwitting accomplice ended up on the front door of the terrorist's hide-out. JSOC has used the technical means to track and capture scores of Zarqawi henchmen.

Mr. Rumsfeld takes a personal interest in the assignment of admirals and generals, especially for such a key post as JSOC commander. The defense secretary has made it a priority to bolster special-operations spending and manpower. Shortly after the war on terrorism began, he traveled to Fort Bragg and toured the highly secret training ground of Delta Force. He watched a HALO (high-altitude, low-opening parachute jump), a practice raid and some sharpshooting, and he met Delta recruits.

Gen. McChrystal caught the defense secretary's attention in 2003 when the formertwo-star general was vice director of operations in the Joint Staff, the planning arm of the Joint Chiefs chairman. He conducted nationally televised press briefings at the Pentagon and met frequently with Mr. Rumsfeld and others to map strategy.

At his debut in March 2003, as war kicked off in Iraq, former spokeswoman Victoria Clarke introduced him. "I won't quite say he volunteered, but he's going to help out on the briefings," she said.

After less than a month of fighting, Gen. McChrystal declared from the podium, "I would anticipate that the major combat engagements are over."

Gen. McChrystal long had a special-operations niche: He trained and deployed as an Army Ranger, an elite special-operations force that does the big missions of unconventional warfare.

"There are very few flag-officer movements the secretary doesn't decide," said Larry Di Rita, a former senior aide to Mr. Rumsfeld who worked with Gen. McChrystal. "He tends to invest a lot of time into those decisions, and this one was no different."

He added, "[McChrystal] is well-known in the Army as an exceptional operator and an ability to work in a joint environment, an ability to work at various levels of operational skills. It is those things the secretary tends to look at in these kinds of commands. An ability to communicate. [McChrystal] is a very good communicator."

Special-operations insiders say that when it is time to replace Army Gen. Bryan "Doug" Brown, commander of Special Operations Command, Gen. McChrystal will likely be a finalist, along with Lt. Gen. Dell Dailey, a former JSOC chief.

Iraq Government Facing Sectarian Rift (AP-Y)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

Shiite politicians demanded changes in the Iraqi government Sunday, accusing a Sunni Arab party in the coalition of ties to terrorism after a bodyguard of its leader was arrested on suspicion of planning bomb attacks.

The dispute threatened a sectarian crisis within the national unity government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, which is struggling to contain spiraling Shiite-Sunni killings that the U.S. ambassador said have surpassed Sunni insurgent attacks in deadliness.

After the bodyguard's arrest, an unprecedented surprise curfew was imposed on Baghdad on Saturday, preventing pedestrians as well as vehicle traffic. The curfew was lifted early Sunday.

At least 23 people were killed in violence Sunday, and 21 bodies were found in Baghdad or to the south, many of them bound and tortured. In the evening, gunmen burst into a frozen food factory in Baghdad, kidnapping 24 workers and wounding two others — similar to past attacks in which militants have picked out members of the opposing sect from among the captives and killed them.

The U.S. military also reported Sunday that two American soldiers were killed the day before in fighting in western Anbar province — bringing to at least 70 the number of U.S. troops killed in September, the second highest monthly toll this year after April, when 76 died.

Iraqi troops backed by American military advisers arrested a suspected Shiite militiaman believed to have carried out kidnappings and killings. A gunbattle broke out at the suspect's house in Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City, leaving a woman and a young girl dead, Iraqi police said.

Afterward, angry men at the scene held up a color photo of a smiling, winking Jesus giving a "thumbs up" sign that they said was left by troops at the raided house — an allegation denied by U.S. and Iraqi officials.

The photo, known as the "Buddy Christ," is from the movie "Dogma," a 1999 religious satire in which "Buddy Christ" is part of a church campaign to improve Jesus' image.

U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said the photo was a "rather ridiculous attempt" to discredit the raid. It was unclear how it ended up at the site.

The potential government crisis erupted after U.S. troops on Friday arrested a bodyguard of Sunni politician Adnan al-Dulaimi, saying the man was suspected of leading an al-Qaida-linked cell that was "in the final stages" of carrying out a string of bombings in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, the center of government and home to the U.S. and British embassies.

Al-Dulaimi heads the Iraqi Accordance Front, the main Sunni Arab party with 44 seats in the 275-member parliament and positions in al-Maliki's government, including a supporter in the Defense Minister post.

The government also includes Shiite parties linked to militias accused of killing Sunnis — and the arrest threatened to wreck al-Maliki's attempts to forge a reconciliation between the sects that could rein in the militias as well as Sunni insurgent violence.

"We are faced with two choices, either militias or the nation. We will not allow the dignity of the nation to be violated," the Shiite prime minister said Sunday in an interview with Al-Hurra TV, which is funded and overseen by the State Department.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, sought to contain the political fallout, underlining in a joint statement that "the arrested individual had no ties to al-Dulaimi's family, nor is al-Dulaimi connected in any way to the suspect activities of the individual."

But Baha el-Deen al-Araji, a lawmaker from the party of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, accused Sunni politicians of having "direct and indirect links to Saddamists, Takfiris (Sunni radicals) and terrorists."

He demanded a "significant cabinet reshuffle" to change "ministries of security and public services dossiers."

"All our Sunni brothers have terrorist groups. This is destructive to the reconciliation process," another Sadrist lawmaker, Nasser al-Saadi, told The Associated Press. "We must stand up to them."

He said that if al-Dulaimi is shown to have links to al-Qaida "he should be treated as a terrorist." The lawmakers said parliament would discuss the arrest in a session on Monday.

Al-Dulaimi denied any connection to militants and said those trying to "defame" the Accordance Front should "be silent because any factor that leads to blow up this case would affect the entire national unity process."

Thousands of people have died in recent months in Shiite-Sunni killings, even as violence by Sunni insurgents continued. The top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, said Wednesday that over the preceding week suicide attacks were at their highest level ever.

Khalilzad said al-Qaida-linked militants had been weakened in recent months and that "a main part of the violence now is sectarian violence ... between death squads associated with militias."

Speaking on CNN's "Late Edition," he said al-Maliki's government "in the course of the next two months, has to make progress in terms of containing sectarian violence."

But he expressed optimism that with the prime minister's reconciliation plan and U.S.-Iraqi security efforts "next year the level of violence will be lower than this year."

DOJ_NMG_0072711

Iraq's National Security Adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie, meanwhile, said security forces were closing in on the leader of al-Qaida in Iraq Abu Hamza al-Muhajer, also known as Abu Ayyub al-Masri.

He succeeded slain militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi at the helm of the group, which is accused of some of the deadliest suicide bombings against Shiites.

"In a very short time, we will bring you the good news of Abu Ayyub al-Masri either killed or handcuffed to be brought before the Iraqi justice system," he said.

He showed what he called an al-Qaida instructional CD found this week in a raid south of Baghdad in which al-Masri is seen explaining how to build a car bomb.

"Your days are numbered and you will face your fate very soon," al-Rubaie said, addressing al-Masri.

Sadr Political Bloc Calls For Overhaul Of Iraqi Cabinet (WP)

By Amit R. Paley And K.I. Ibrahim

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 1 -- The political bloc of anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr demanded a shake-up of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's cabinet on Sunday, the latest challenge to the country's increasingly beleaguered unity government.

"Some of those who are in this government have direct or indirect relationships with terrorists," said Bahaa al-Araji, a senior legislator with Sadr's Shiite Muslim party. "The democracy that the occupation brought to Iraq is being exploited by the Sunni insurgents and the terrorists to kill our sons and our men."

Araji's remarks appeared aimed at Adnan al-Dulaimi, the leader of the largest Sunni Arab coalition in parliament, whose bodyguard was arrested Friday on suspicion of planning suicide bombings inside the fortified Green Zone.

The demands of the Sadr movement -- a major bloc in the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite coalition that has 130 seats in the 275-member parliament -- exposed deep rifts in the government, as well as mounting frustration with its perceived failure to stanch the horrific sectarian bloodshed here.

Senior U.S. military commanders have questioned whether Maliki has the political will to root out corruption and tackle the militias and death squads wreaking havoc across the country. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said in an interview Friday that Maliki was running out of time to address the problem.

Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for Maliki's government, did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Dulaimi has denied that his bodyguard is connected to terrorists, and on Sunday other Sunni legislators denounced Araji for making "hysterical statements."

"They accuse the Sunnis of being insurgents, Baathists and Saddamists, but if we check the records of the majority of those politicians, we will find that they have ties to the former regime," said Hussein al-Falluji, a Sunni member of parliament.

Falluji also suggested that tensions within the Shiite government -- over Maliki's efforts, unsuccessful so far, to disarm militias controlled by Sadr and other Shiite groups -- are causing politicians to lash out at Sunnis. "They are trying to transfer their problems to us," he said.

Sadr officials in recent days have stepped up their criticisms of Maliki's government. In a sermon on Friday in the city of Kufa, Sheik Mouyed Khazrajy, a member of the Sadr movement, called on the prime minister to move swiftly to reduce sectarian tensions.

"Our patience has limits," he said.

"The hands with which we fought the tyrants are still on the triggers, and the weapons we fought with, which placed you on the prime minister's chair, are still full of gunpowder," Khazrajy said. "We are ready to give you and your masters a lesson in defiance and steadfastness. . . . What has held us back, as the leader has said, is neither humiliation nor ignominy, but feelings of brotherhood and love for the country."

Violence continued to convulse Iraq on Sunday. Twenty-three people were killed and 21 bodies were discovered in incidents across the country, the Associated Press reported.

The U.S. military also announced that two soldiers assigned to the 13th Sustainment Command were killed Saturday during combat in Anbar province, the volatile Sunni insurgent stronghold in western Iraq.

Shiite Politicians Grow More Critical Of Iraq's Government (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 1 — Iraq's fragile government showed further signs of strain on Sunday, as Shiite political leaders expressed growing frustration at having to share power with Sunni Arabs whom they view as having ties to insurgents.

"There is a real trust crisis," said Baha al-Aaraji, a prominent Shiite legislator at a news conference broadcast on television. "The prime minister does not trust his deputy," and the speaker of Parliament "does not trust his first deputy."

The remarks, which included a call for a cabinet shuffle, came after the disclosure on Friday that a guard working for a leading Sunni politician might have been involved in a plot to detonate multiple car bombs in the Green Zone. But they quickly led to a larger debate, with Sunni and Shiite factions accusing one another of protecting their militias and governing to suit their own sects.

The outburst underscored the weakness of Iraq's government. A patchwork of parties and groups that represents most of Iraq's ethnicities and sects, the government was assembled through weeks of bitter negotiations brokered by the Americans this spring.

At the time, the thinking was to include all of Iraq's groups, particularly the minority Sunni Arabs who dominated the government of Saddam Hussein, in order to drain support for the insurgency. But now, five months after the government was formed, the violence has only worsened, with death squads carrying out sectarian killings that are changing the texture of neighborhoods.

On Sunday evening in Al Amel, a neighborhood in western Baghdad that is largely Sunni Arab, 26 workers were taken from a store that sells sandwiches and meat pastries, Iraqi officials said. Mass kidnappings began occurring with some frequency in the spring.

Continuing another grim trend, the Iraqi police said they discovered 50 bodies in and around Baghdad in the 24 hours ending Sunday night.

The United States military said Sunday that two American soldiers were killed by small-arms fire on Saturday in Anbar Province.

Until now, Shiites have largely held back from explicit criticism of the government, which is run by a Shiite, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, out of fear of weakening him. But progress has been slow, and Shiites seized on the accusation that a guard working for the Sunni leader may have been planning a suicide bombing.

Mr. Aaraji's comments — including a call for a "significant reshuffle" of the cabinet — were the most public and pointed criticism to date. He openly derided a national reconciliation plan announced earlier this year that included a limited amnesty for some Iraqis, saying the plan was soft on insurgents. "We are stuck between the hammer and the anvil because of the national reconciliation plan," he said. "We and our sons are being killed because of it."

The Sunnis, for their part, brought up complaints at news conferences of their own. "The interior minister himself said there are 3,000 militiamen" who had infiltrated the Ministry of Interior, said a member of the Iraqi Consensus Front, the largest Sunni Arab bloc. "Three thousand versus one person," she said, referring to the arrested guard.

Some Shiites say that the Americans, who still control security, have made it hard for the government to act. Parts of the government "still feel paralyzed," said one Shiite politician, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he did not want to be seen as critical of the leadership. "Neighborhoods are being attacked by armed groups. Threats are passed on to families."

Against Turkey, Washington Is Caught Between Allies (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

QANDIL MOUNTAIN RANGE, Iraq -- Kurdish guerrillas have used the remote mountains of northern Iraq as a base to attack Turkey for years. Now their presence has become a thorny problem for Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0072713

Thousands of Kurdish fighters move openly in dozens of camps spread throughout Qandil's scrubby mountainsides and tree-covered ravines. A day's hike to the north lies Turkey, where most of these militants were born and where they face terrorism charges for fighting for Kurdish autonomy. Here in northern Iraq, with grenades clipped to the belts of their matching olive-green outfits, the guerrillas conduct combat drills, restock arms or watch satellite television. A few months ago they honored their leader by painting his image on a giant concrete slab they poured onto a hillside. It is visible from miles away.

"We have our own state in the mountains," says Farman, the 42-year-old area commander whose neck bears the indented scar of a bullet wound. Like other militants from the Kurdistan Workers' Party, or PKK, he introduced himself by first name only.

The guerrillas' enclave in northern Iraq is at the center of a growing diplomatic storm. As the U.S. begins to exert pressure on Iraq to rein in the anti-Turkey fighters, it finds itself caught between two key allies. On one side is Iraqi Kurdistan, which supported the U.S. invasion of Iraq and whose leaders have deep ties with the Kurdistan Workers' Party. On the other is Turkey, a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and a Muslim democracy, whose leaders say they are committed to destroying the PKK.

Stakes for Washington are high. Iraqi Kurdistan is the safest part of Iraq. Armed conflict between Turkey and Kurdish fighters would prove calamitous, adding another front to the bloody Iraqi battlefield and further stretching U.S. and Iraqi security forces. Turkey, which maintains tens of thousands of troops on its border with Iraq, said this summer it is drawing up plans to attack the guerrillas' positions.

For the first time since these fighters began using Iraq as a base more than two decades ago, Washington has appointed a high-level diplomat to address the crisis. In late August, it named retired Air Force Gen. Joseph Ralston to the post of Special Envoy for Countering the PKK. Gen. Ralston, a former NATO top commander, took a whirlwind tour through Turkish and Iraqi capitals in September, pressing the U.S. point that Iraqi territory shouldn't be used as a PKK haven. Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan will raise the issue with President George W. Bush when the two meet in Washington today.

Gen. Ralston's tour comes after a summer of heightened violence. In one week in July, PKK militants killed at least 15 Turkish soldiers and police. A month later, explosions in three Turkish cities killed three Turkish citizens and injured 60 civilians, including foreign tourists. The attacks against civilians were claimed by Kurdistan Freedom Falcons, which Turkish and Western officials say operates under the auspices of the PKK.

On Saturday, the PKK promised to halt attacks, the fifth time the group has declared a cease-fire. However, the decades-old conflict remains far from defused. Past truces have led to lulls in violence, followed by intensified fighting. Turkey immediately dismissed the cease-fire. Violence in the Kurdish area of Turkey continued yesterday.

Marxism and Nationalism

The Kurds, who number about 25 million and speak their own language, have never had a country of their own. Most of them live in contiguous border stretches in Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Syria. The majority -- about 15 million -- live in Turkey, which has historically denied them minority rights such as cultural recognition or Kurdish-language education.

Since its birth in Turkey in 1974, the PKK, or Partiya Karkerên Kurdistan, has employed a violent blend of Marxism and nationalism. Its guerrillas consolidated support in the countryside, ruthlessly attacking Turks and Kurds alike who stood in the way of their goal of establishing an independent Kurdistan. The conflict with the Turkish military led to an estimated 30,000 deaths in the 1980s and the 1990s.

Pressured inside Turkey, the PKK found a haven in northern Iraq in the mid-1980s. Iraqi Kurdish leaders, fighting their own rebellion against Baghdad, allowed the PKK to enter northern Iraq in a gesture of pan-Kurdish solidarity. Iraqi Kurds were also among the region's strongest supporters of the U.S. decision to depose Saddam Hussein, who is currently on trial in Baghdad on charges of genocide against Iraqi Kurds in the 1980s.

Three guerrillas from the Kurdistan Workers' Party in northern Iraq's Qandil mountains. Behind them, a structure housing a television room and a small library.

In the aftermath of the 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq, which Turkey opposed, Iraqi Kurdistan has strengthened its autonomy. The home to five million Kurds, the Iraqi region has gradually accumulated the trappings of sovereignty from Baghdad's rule, serving as an inspirational example to Kurds across the border in Turkey and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0072714

In early September, Massoud Barzani, the region's president, outlawed the Iraqi national flag on the grounds that it symbolizes repression of Kurds under Mr. Hussein. Only Kurdish flags, marked with a bright yellow sun in the middle, now remain. The region's parliament just approved a petroleum law that stipulates that revenue from future oil production doesn't have to be shared with Baghdad. (Baghdad has criticized the region's drive to set its own oil policy.) Boundaries between Kurdistan and the rest of Iraq are reinforced with trenches and patrolled by units of the regional government's own military force, the Peshmerga.

In addressing the guerrillas sheltering within their borders, Iraqi Kurdistan's officials find themselves with dual allegiances. While Washington classifies the Kurdistan Workers' Party as a terrorist group, Iraqi Kurd leaders view them as freedom fighters. Masrur Barzani, the head of Iraqi Kurdistan's intelligence branch and the son of the regional president, says Kurds "existed here long before" the Turkic tribes from Central Asia began their conquest of modern-day Turkey a millennium ago. Jafar Mustafa Ali, an Iraqi Kurd in charge of many of the Peshmerga units, suggests the PKK fighters are cut from the same nationalist cloth as Iraq's anti-Saddam Kurdish guerrillas. "The PKK asks for the rights of its people," he says. "Why should somebody be called a terrorist for that?"

At the same time, the region's administrators are eager to avoid the sort of violence afflicting the rest of Iraq. As northern Iraq looks to start pumping its own oil, it will require cooperation from Turkey and Iran to ship it to international clients. Already, bilateral trade between Turkey and northern Iraq has grown to an estimated $3 billion last year, according to Turkish and Iraqi officials. A peaceful resolution of the PKK issue will also help the area attract foreign investment.

According to Turkish and Western intelligence, some 3,000 guerrillas live in Iraq's Qandil mountains at any given time. A smaller force is based on the Turkish side of the border. Western and Turkish intelligence officials say guerrillas train and acquire weapons in Iraq. The camps also serve as rest-and-recuperation sites for rebels who have fought in Turkey, especially during harsh winters when skirmishes usually die down. The PKK says it runs a hidden hospital here that treats fighters wounded in clashes inside Turkey.

A typical guerrilla is Semad, a 29-year-old who grew up in the southeastern Turkish city of Diyarbakir and later moved with his family to Istanbul. Two of his older brothers died in the fighting with Turkish security forces, and Semad says he started helping the PKK at the age of nine, delivering messages, leaflets and food in the militant underground. He worked briefly as a postman in Istanbul. By the time he turned 18 he walked off into the mountains and joined the fighters, taking the name of one of his dead brothers as a nom-de-guerre.

Life for Semad in the Qandil camps follows a well-established routine: political education in the morning, military training in the afternoon, then soccer, volleyball or ping-pong. The guerrillas watch satellite television, particularly Roj TV, a Denmark-based channel sympathetic to PKK's cause.

Devotion to the group's Marxist founder, Abdullah Öcalan (pronounced O-dja-lan), borders on cultish. Mr. Öcalan was captured in 1999, and is currently serving a life sentence in a Turkish island prison. His portrait is ubiquitous in the camps, on bright yellow banners or surrounded with flowers. His severe, moustached visage is painted in bold blue, white and black on a concrete slab, some 8 feet by 20 feet, above one of the camps. Semad has an image of Mr. Öcalan on the screen of his mobile phone.

On a quiet day at the camps, the wooden hovels, tents and clearings brim with domesticity, though alcohol and dating are banned. On a recent sunny morning, Saria, a 21-year-old Kurdish woman from Syria who joined the PKK five years ago, watered a patch of saplings. A male guerrilla chopped firewood. Inside one of the shacks, in a wooden bookcase straining under the weight of books written by Mr. Öcalan, there are two well-thumbed volumes of J.R.R. Tolkien's "The Lord of the Rings" in Turkish, the language most guerrillas here speak fluently and use in conversations alongside Kurdish.

The camps' relaxed feel belies their occupants' serious mission. "Our position now is self-defense war everywhere" against the Turkish military, the Kurdistan Workers' Party current leader, Murat Karaylan, said in a middle-of-the-night interview early last month in Qandil. Mr. Karaylan, a pistol holster under his vest, has been a PKK member since 1978 and leads a clandestine existence shuttling among mountain camps. His arrest and extradition are among Turkey's main demands. "If necessary, we can escalate [the war] four to five times," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0072715

Washington's envoy, Gen. Ralston, did not speak with the PKK. Last month in northern Iraq, Ankara and Baghdad, he met with northern Iraq President Barzani, Turkish and Iraqi prime ministers, and U.S., Turkish and Iraqi military officials. He urged Iraqi leaders to put pressure on the guerrillas, asking them to close PKK offices and adopt other, as yet undisclosed, measures against the group. "Clearly, this is not an easy task," Gen. Ralston told reporters upon his return to Washington late last month.

In his interview, Mr. Karaylan said he had been pressed by Iraqi Kurdish officials to halt attacks on Turkish forces. On Thursday, the imprisoned Mr. Öcalan appealed to PKK guerrillas to call a cease-fire, asking them to fight back only if attacked by Turkish forces. In a news conference on Saturday, field leader Mr. Karaylan announced that the guerrillas would call a truce.

The Turkish government called instead for full disarmament. "A cease-fire is done between states," Prime Minister Erdogan told a Turkish television channel last week. "A terrorist organization must lay down its arms." On Sunday, hours after the truce took effect, Turkish soldiers killed a PKK fighter in Southeastern Turkey, not far from the Iraqi border.

Under pressure from the U.S. and Turkey, Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, a Shiite Arab, has promised to close PKK offices in Iraq. The Kurdistan Workers' Party, though, doesn't have many offices in Iraq, and prefers to operate in seclusion from the northern mountains. Iraqi forces would find it challenging to dismantle the camps: Baghdad does not have sway over Iraqi Kurdistan's Peshmerga security forces, who would be unlikely to turn their weapons against fellow Kurds.

Turkish officials say they are prepared to wait for the diplomacy to run its course before considering military options. But one Turkish government adviser says, "We won't wait too long." Iran, which has also suffered attacks from Kurdish separatists linked to the PKK and fighting out of the same Iraqi mountains, shelled northern Iraq earlier this year, according to officials in Iraqi Kurdistan. Iranian officials deny this.

Attacking With Rocks

While northern Iraq has assumed importance as a PKK haven, the root causes of the group's appeal to some Turkish Kurds can be found in the Turkish Southeast. The area still reels from the violence of the past two decades. Major riots erupted in the city of Diyarbakir in March after several PKK fighters were killed by Turkish forces. Thousands of young Kurds set up roadblocks, trashed banks and shops and attacked police with rocks. In some parts of Diyarbakir, a city of one million residents, unemployment runs as high as 70%.

Partly under pressure from the European Union, which Turkey hopes to join, Turkish officials have been trying to address some Kurdish demands for greater rights. Broadcasting in Kurdish, as well as Kurdish-language classes, have been allowed, though both activities are still tightly controlled. A few years ago, the PKK dropped its demand for an independent Kurdistan, saying it would be content with some form of autonomy inside Turkey. The government wants to channel investment to the region and now openly acknowledges that it has long neglected its Kurdish citizens and denied their identity. While these are small steps, they would have been unthinkable even a decade ago.

"One of the reasons we were fighting was to provide the conditions for greater cultural and language rights. At the time it was necessary," says Hasan Seker, a one-time teacher in a village school who joined the PKK in the 1980s, fought, lost an index finger, was captured and spent nine years in prison. He now runs a cultural center in Diyarbakir promoting Kurdish music, literature and language. Though the center faces restrictions, he says the difference is obvious. "It's serious progress. We came from the point of 'Kurds don't exist' to this point," he says. "Of course it gives us hope."

Threatened By Soldiers, Iraqi Doctors 'Don't Feel Safe' (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

BAGHDAD -- It was a little before 2 p.m. last Monday when a group of Interior Ministry soldiers carried a wounded colleague into the emergency room at Yarmouk hospital.

Waving their weapons frantically, two of the soldiers demanded immediate attention from Haider Hussein, 25, a resident with only three months' experience.

The soldiers did not react well when Dr. Hussein requested time to prepare before examining the patient.

"They told me, 'We're authorized to kill you if you don't help us now,' " Dr. Hussein said.

DOJ_NMG_0072716

Two armed men left and, according to several doctors, returned with about 15 more soldiers who blocked the entrances to the emergency room, holding the attending doctors prisoner. The standoff didn't end until the hospital's security force fired into the air to persuade the ministry soldiers to release the doctors.

The confrontation turned out to be a breaking point for doctors at Yarmouk. On Thursday afternoon, they went on strike, saying they were accustomed to dealing with the worst of the capital's unrelenting violence but no longer could handle the intimidation and aggressive tactics of the military and police.

"We don't feel safe anymore," said Haider Brahim, 28, the chief surgeon in Yarmouk's emergency room.

The one-day strike did not resolve their problem, but it did win them a promise that authorities will look into three main demands: a public apology from the Interior Ministry, a ban on weapons inside the hospital and a ward exclusively for armed-forces physicians to care for military and police casualties.

It was the third time that Yarmouk's doctors have walked off the job in three years because of the harsh working environment, said the hospital's director, Haqqi Razzaiki. He said 16 physicians had quit in the past two months because of miserable working conditions.

"The whole situation is bad, and we're getting no help from the Ministry of Health," Dr. Brahim said.

Yarmouk's 24 emergency-room physicians earn a little more than $135 a month.

Most of the hospital's 150 doctors live in dilapidated residence halls on the hospital grounds. In one cramped room with no bathroom, six doctors who work alternate shifts share three small beds pressed against the walls.

About 50 doctors share a narrow restroom in a hallway. Dust covers the floor, and a hole in the floor serves as a toilet. Another restroom on a separate floor lacks running water.

The food, prepared in large metal pots in a room tucked away from the first-floor corridor, is a frequent target of criticism.

"We tried to give the food once to stray cats, but they wouldn't eat it," said Dr. Hussein. "Some prisoners live better than this."

The hospital's location in the southern Baghdad neighborhoods that are flash points for sectarian and insurgent attacks also makes it an epicenter for urgent cases. Dr. Brahim estimates that his staff treats 100 to 300 emergencies a day.

Yarmouk also attracts patients from the violent western Anbar province because it is one of the first large government-run hospitals along the highway into Baghdad. As a government-run hospital, it is obliged to provide free health care to all Iraqis.

Before the strike Thursday, the triage area was filled with the wounded, their families, paramedics, hospital administrators, nurses and doctors. The building smelled of perspiration, blood and human waste.

A young resident working without plastic gloves examined a gaping wound in one man's thigh, the result of a roadside bomb. Another man on a bloodstained gurney wailed in agony as a male relative gently kissed his face.

And 9-year-old Amer Yousef, a bandage over the bullet wound in his lower abdomen, tried to fight back tears as a group of women in black abayas watched over him.

Outside the hospital's gates, an Interior Ministry pickup truck swerved to a sudden stop and uniformed men frantically escorted the injured colleague inside. A soldier in the back of the vehicle fired a machine gun into the sky to halt the oncoming traffic.

"There's no magic solution to resolve these problems," said Dr. Razzaiki, who has practiced medicine in Iraq for 27 years. "If we had better security, the problems would solve themselves."

The Big Question On Iraq (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The campaign season debate about Iraq, which circled last week around the question of whether the war has increased global terrorism, might suggest that Washington is nowhere near facing the critical question of what to do about the actual situation on the ground. Yet behind President Bush's "we're safer" rhetoric and the answering shouts of "fiasco," the most serious debate about U.S. Iraq strategy in three years is quietly emerging. Shortly after the election it should take center stage.

The central question for discussion is this: Should the United States continue to depend on Iraq's "unity" government and army to carry out the political, military and economic measures needed to stabilize the country -- most important, a political settlement among its warring sectarian factions? Or is it necessary to override the new political system and mount some sort of intervention, led by the United States and perhaps other governments, to force the necessary deals?

President Bush has been hinting about this decision point ever since Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's visit to Washington in July. "Iraq can count on our partnership as long as the new government continues to make the hard decisions necessary to advance a unified, democratic and peaceful Iraq," Bush said in an Aug. 31 speech. Administration officials say the passage was a warning deliberately aimed at Maliki.

A more explicit signal came in a Sept. 19 news conference by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton, who are leading a congressionally mandated and Bush-blessed commission to consider options for Iraq. The panel long ago decided not to make recommendations until after the November elections. So why hold a news conference in September? Perhaps so that Hamilton could make this statement: "The government of Iraq needs to show its own citizens soon, and the citizens of the United States, that it is deserving of continuing support. The next three months are critical. Before the end of this year, this government needs to show progress in securing Baghdad, pursuing national reconciliation and delivering basic services."

At least some in Maliki's government are hearing the warning. Two of its most pro-American officials, Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi and Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih, appeared in Washington in September. Mahdi, a Shiite, pleaded for more time, saying that Washington could not expect the new government to deliver results on a timetable measured in months. Salih, a Kurd, took a different tack, listing a string of measures he said would be approved by parliament before the end of the year.

In fact, amid the continuing chaos in Baghdad the parliament has finally begun to act: Last week Sunni and Shiite deputies struck a preliminary deal on legislation that would allow the creation of federal regions and set up a committee to consider amendments to the constitution. But Maliki is still resisting forceful steps against Shiite militias; and negotiations with Sunni insurgents have gone nowhere.

If such sluggishness continues, the Baker-Hamilton commission, and with it the consensus in Washington, could be tipped toward the conclusion that the United States can't look to the new political system for solutions. That doesn't mean there would be a precipitous American troop withdrawal; the commission will almost certainly conclude that such a step would be disastrous.

Instead, the time may finally be ripe for some of the ideas that have been doggedly pushed for most of this year by Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, who has been one of his party's most serious and responsible voices on Iraq. In essence, Biden is proposing that the United States enlist its NATO allies, U.N. Security Council members and Iraq's neighbors for an intervention that would be aimed at forcing political and sectarian leaders to leap to the political settlement they are now creeping toward.

The settlement Biden has in mind is the division of Iraq into highly autonomous regions, dominated, respectively, by Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. That solution was the subject of last week's parliamentary deal, which postponed any action until 2008. A new reconstruction aid program would be launched; an international conference would commit Iran, Syria and other neighbors to a nonaggression pact. International peacekeepers would be recruited to patrol cities such as Baghdad. Meanwhile, most U.S. troops would be withdrawn by the end of next year, except for a residual force that could intervene against al-Qaeda.

It's easy to find holes in this strategy, as with any other plan for Iraq. To begin with, Iraqis simply may not be capable of jumping to a settlement. Perhaps only the pain of an extended civil war will get them there. But Biden's basic idea -- of an external political intervention backed by an international alliance -- is the one big option the Bush administration hasn't tried. It wouldn't be surprising if Baker -- master orchestrator of the Plaza agreement and the Madrid conference -- finds it compelling.

In Afghanistan, US Troops Tackle Aid Projects - And Skepticism (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

MIRDISH VILLAGE, AFGHANISTAN

The white-bearded Afghan police chief is not pleased with his village "force" of 15 rag-tag cops. They have no radios, just two AK-47 assault rifles, and a single pistol with 9mm ammunition that jams.

DOJ_NMG_0072718

Afghan officials have also not paid police salaries for months in this remote eastern Afghanistan province of Nuristan on the Pakistan border. An officer is said to be collecting funds now - the proverbial "check is in the mail" - but the delay is hampering US plans to start police training this week.

"Of course it's a good idea to train," chief Nur Mohamed tells the US Military Police platoon leader, as they meet under a rock overhang. "The day they pay us, we will be there."

Money talks in Afghanistan, particularly in this undeveloped region. Whether training local police or getting tips on insurgent positions, success for US forces depends on fulfilling promises of aid and reconstruction. That's the logic behind a new fight-and-build strategy that arms the US military with millions of dollars to spend on projects to convince Afghans, one village at a time, of the benefits of opposing Taliban-led militants.

But obstacles abound here. In the wilds of Nuristan, sheer rock cliffs and mountain run-off rivers leave few options for roads. US Army convoys have been attacked nearly every time they set out in recent weeks. The terrain not only makes ambushes easier but also frustrates logistics, like getting money and supplies flowing to Mr. Mohamed's police.

Mohamed tells the MP that his unit only patrols a few hundred yards down the road to the graveyard - "where you were ambushed the other day."

"The [insurgents] couldn't come here, but we see a lot in the mountains, and they [are armed with] everything," says Mohamed. "That is why we are so afraid. How could we attack them?"

"It's been pretty frustrating," the MP, 1st Lt. Candace Mathis from Rome, N.Y., says later. "It's hard because they do not have the food, ammunition, and blankets - all the stuff they need to be successful. All I can do is pat them on the back and say security is important." US Army takes up infrastructure

So far, the Army has signed more than a dozen contracts in a string of villages. Work has begun on popular road building, water pipe schemes, and micro-hydro projects to bring electricity.

So when troops join the police chief and mullah for a visit to Mirdish village, there is a cautious welcome, and even gratitude. More information about militant movements is coming to the Americans from such villagers. More elders want projects for their areas.

"We like you Americans here, and want to work with you," the police chief tells the MP, before adding a warning. "We appreciate when you take care of us. But when you fire [into valleys] with women and children, they are so scared."

While officers deem these to be positive signs, the US strategy is long-term, and envisions keeping militants on the run throughout a cold winter - depriving them of shelter in the villages - as progressing projects convince people to side with the government.

But there have also been two high-profile killings in this district in the past month, of one cooperating elder and a border police chief, both claimed by the Taliban.

The Islamist militia has historically had little presence in Nuristan, but use it as a route to Kabul from Pakistan and an out-of-the-way area for training grounds. The murders have shocked and intimidated elders, and the 200 fledgling police recruits.

"In counterinsurgency, you can't lead with a rifle," says Lt. Col. Mike Howard, who commands the 3rd Squadron 71st Cavalry from Fort Drum, N.Y., in Nuristan. "You must lead with actions, with reconstruction."

"The elders have bet on reconstruction, and ending this stupid fighting," says Colonel Howard, who is on his third Afghan tour. "You've got to come and stay, and plop down in the middle of [insurgent territory], and make them choose to work with you, or fight you, or leave."

Nuristan's extreme isolation once earned it the name "land of infidels" because it was the last Afghan region to accept Islam, a little more than 100 years ago. Two enemies: insurgents, skepticism

US forces are fighting two enemies here: the insurgents, and local skepticism that they will stay and deliver on promises of projects that will improve their lives. For two years, one elder carried a letter and business card from a US State Department official - and his unfulfilled promise to build a road.

The 3-71 Cavalry has so far approved $1.33 million worth of projects, contracted $966,000 of that, and disbursed some $250,000 in the long-neglected Kamdesh District alone.

DOJ_NMG_0072719

It is one element of the US Army's 3rd Brigade Combat Team, that is spread across 19 forward bases and several outposts in eastern Afghanistan. It is fielding 13 Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs) which include two civilian engineers each, civil affairs personnel, and military police, in areas under US control. Road project opened new paths

An initial $200,000 road project to Kamdesh - though tangled because of an Afghan contractor from a distant city - whetted local appetites for more work. Building a five-classroom school building in Naray, a basic $23,000 effort, prompted more local requests and a better welcome across the district.

"They don't trust anybody," says an Afghan-American translator named Pali, who visits villages with US patrols and PRT teams.

She remembers the first visit to Mandagal village, when "people were so afraid of the Americans, and women and children were crying. They told us: 'We thought you were just like the Russians' " who occupied Afghanistan during the 1980s, says Pali. "I told them: 'the Americans are different.' " In Mirdish over the weekend, children trailed the soldiers, laughing, and watched from high rooftops.

"The only thing to convince them is to build something and pay people. They are sick and tired of insurgents," says Pali. "They say: 'For heaven's sake, if you are here to build for us - promise and do it. If we see one or two projects, all Nuristan is with you.' "

Though still in its early stages, the US effort is sparking a violent reaction. Before moving into the district last July, officers held meetings and killed a goat with elders, and signed contracts.

But forward bases were attacked daily for weeks. The first 30 days at Kamdesh outpost, as construction got under way, no one took up the US offer to hire base guards for $153 per month. Last week they reached their goal of 60 guards, requiring just two critera that recruits be at least 18 years of age, and have a rifle. But many have aged rifles, or appear too young to grow beards, or both.

Radio chatter indicated that insurgents planned to "attack [Americans] like the Russians." Then insurgents switched to going after convoys on the single-lane dirt road that winds along the river - and invites ambush.

In the past month, this unit at Kamdesh has earned eight Purple Hearts. One soldier lost a hand to a rocket-propelled grenade round - the only one to make a direct hit out of 30, says Capt. Matt Gooding, commander of Alpha Troop, 3-71 Cav, which is building Kamdesh outpost.

The unit moved here from Helmand Province in the south, where the fighting was intense, but conducted in a by-the-book manner across a desert battlefield.

"In Helmand, you knew when you cleaned house; you knew when you had a good day," says Capt. Gooding. "I don't feel that here, and it's frustrating."

But this unit has become adept at fending off an attack for an hour, then they "transform - you can see it in their faces," says Gooding, when they continue on to a village visit. But still the attacks continue. Insurgents in the dark

On Saturday night last week - during a storm and with no moonlight at all - three groups of 10 to 15 men moved toward the Gowardesh outpost, but were spotted and hit with US mortars and dispersed.

A few days before that, officers called in a 2,000-pound bomb 10 minutes after an ambush. For days after, insurgent radio traffic all but stopped.

"I haven't attacked a thing up here, but I killed a lot of bad guys because they can't bear me being here, putting in water pipe," says Howard, of the frequent ambushes. "Now if [soldiers] go into a village, and enter every home and go through their underwear, who has the high ground then?"

But the Taliban is making its mark. On Aug. 29, a well-known elder from Gowardesh village, Haji Younis, was kidnapped, tortured, and dumped near the Pakistan border. He had signed a US Army contract three days before, and was on the road to get it ratified by the sub-governor when he was abducted.

A note pinned to his clothes said: "Don't work with coalition forces. This will happen to you." It was signed in the name of Mullah Omar, the fugitive Taliban leader.

"Haji Younis was a friend of mine," says Howard. "But his killing backfired. Instead of being intimidated, people were outraged."

DOJ_NMG_0072720

A blood feud between families has now erupted, a tradition in Nuristan. Such feuds can last for decades, and often end in further revenge bloodshed.

Ahmad Shah has been another victim. A colonel in the border police, he was killed by a roadside bomb on Sept. 13. The Taliban claimed responsibility, sending "shock waves" that "completely intimidated" the untrained police force, which one US officer says has gone from "extremely awful to just bad." Counterinsurgency a 15 year project

"Realistically, it will take three to five years to be where we want to be with the police," says Col. John "Mick" Nicholson, who commands the 3rd BCT. "This is a counterinsurgency; it's going to take 15 years.... What we're looking for is buy-in."

Some results may be emerging, judging by the number of roadside bombs discovered and turned into US or Afghan forces for cash. Only two of 21 on the main Kamdesh road have exploded, US officers say.

Elders have come to this outpost four times in a week, asking for projects. And Afghan police - green as they are, out in this wilderness - have been passing on tips about the insurgent presence.

"I see indications that we are being successful," Lt. Col. Anthony Feagin, the Kamdesh PRT commander, tells his projects team. "But we've got to make sure we don't make any tactical blunders."

Backstory: A Softer Side Of The Marines (CSM)

By Mary Beth Mccauley

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

BETHESDA, MD.

Marine Staff Sgt. Rudy Perez isn't due to get off duty until midnight, but by 7:30 this evening, his day feels complete.

"I see the weight lifted," says Sergeant Perez, watching a sedate but glowing reunion of wounded Cpl.Brian Smith and his family at the National Naval Medical Center.

Here, thanks to Perez and his staff, who carry out a rich interpretation of the fiercely loyal Marine Corp's tradition of caring for its own, the war in Iraq is already a world away for the newly arrived marine. Seriously injured by a roadside bomb in Fallujah, Iraq, days earlier, his arm heavily bandaged, Corporal Smith rests with his family in the womblike fifth floor hospital lounge.

National Naval is where marines most seriously wounded in Iraq are treated. Here, in one of the military's most emotionally gripping assignments, says Perez, "It's our responsibility to take care of the family as if it was our own family."

Perez's liaison unit reunites the wounded with their families and orchestrates all nonmedical aspects of their stay.

Smith's arrival Aug. 29 by medical transport bus marked the end of a long journey. He came in one of three weekly medical airlifts to nearby Andrews Air Force Base from Landstuhl, Germany, where he'd been stabilized. He'd already had two surgeries to repair the "shark bite" arm wounds that left him near death, "You wanted to go ahead and cry tears of happiness," Smith says of his arrival. "But I'm a marine. I can't cry." He calls the liaison unit "the softer side of the Marines."

The 18-strong all-reserve unit serves as a "five-star concierge service" for patients and families, explains Lt. Col. John Worman. Typically there are 20 to 30 in-patient casualties, and they stay an average of four to six weeks. More than 1,500 have been treated here since the beginning of the war, says Ellen Crown, hospital spokeswoman.

Upon hearing of Smith's expected arrival, Perez and his men went to work - making plane reservations for the family, meeting their flight, taking their bags, driving them to hotel rooms, settling them in before bringing them to the hospital. There, the liaison unit briefed the family on the marine's condition before his arrival, and were available round-the-clock for the rest of his stay.

The liaison unit also serves as a clearinghouse for the many offers of assistance to wounded vets. They stock donated paperbacks, CDs, videos, snacks, clothing, and toiletries. They explain benefits and answer questions about pay. They offer everything from Gatorade to a friendly shoulder to streams of family members.

Unit members have arranged a bedside wedding, a citizens' swearing in, a video-conference introduction of a newborn to a hospitalized father. They've managed to ask the wife of a higher-ranking patient to obey regulations and get out of his bed.

They've learned to give the signature "high and tight" haircut, which, when a patient requests it, they take as a signal of sure recovery. They've learned how to deflect, on behalf of a "sleeping" patient, an offer of a visit from a well-meaning celebrity. "This is not a petting zoo," explains Lance Cpl. Carlos Lopes.

DOJ_NMG_0072721

Wounded in 2005, Corporal Lopes is part of a contingent of wounded vets helping out as they receive their own outpatient treatment. Liaison work distracts him from worries about his "guys" back in Iraq, and helps him find the sleep that had eluded him. Here, he gowns up visitors, finds takers for donated baseball tickets, sees each patient several times a day, and visits marines transferred to nearby Walter Reed Army Hospital for prostheses. In free moments, he studies criminal justice online.

"We've been taught that there's nothing that can't be done today," explains Lopes, quoting from a deep vein of Marine Corps truisms.

Cindy Smith, the new patient's mother, appreciates the small kindnesses: "They bring us to the hotel, but they walk us right up to the room." Corporal Smith's daughter has to start school, so Mrs. Smith will take her home to Maine. Meanwhile, liaisons will care for the wounded vet's infant son, while his wife, Jennifer, visits her husband.

The Smith family was "an easy one," says Perez. Smith was a "walk off" - an unexpected delight for everyone who gathered at the flag-lined lobby of Building 10 to welcome his arrival.

There are much more emotionally difficult cases to negotiate. The hospital specializes in head-trauma care, and many of the Marines arrive seriously injured, or unconscious, their conditions shocking even to families who have been prepared ahead of time.

Divorce is another common complication for the liaison job. It can fill the already emotional reunions with rancor and blame. There's the marine's mom who's not talking to his dad, the marine's wife in the same room with his girlfriend, the one parent who favored military service and the other who didn't. Marines who meet families at the airport tend to be on the receiving end of anger, but know not to take it personally. "You go 'yes, ma'am; no, sir.' You treat them like you would treat your own parents," says Sgt. Jason Becerril.

The marines here seem to consider the popu-lar "oppose the war but support the troops" sentiment ridiculous, though they're too polite to come right out and say so. Largely, pro or con feelings about the war itself seem to be left at the gate.

"Up here they seem to be focused on their son's health," says Colonel Worman. The officer, whose brother died in Iraq in 2005, says that Elisabeth Kubler-Ross's writing on the stages of grief have helped him deal with families of the injured. But mostly, he relies on his instincts and experience.

So, too, does Master Sgt. Terrell "Top" Jones, a sardonic, tough-guy sort, whose office decor features both the salty and the sacred. His most memorable request was from a father, not a practicing Catholic, who sought a godfather to step forward so his dying son could be baptized. Sergeant Jones, a Catholic, volunteered. The patient died three days later.

"What school teaches you that?" Jones asks bluntly.

First impressions - neat, direct, polite, and thoughtful - mean something here.

"We represent the Marine Corps," says Jones, of the attention to detail. In the end, what his unit proffers to families is the very identity of the Corps.

"I had heard about that 'band of brothers' thing, and I thought it was stupid," admits Mrs. Smith. But now she has joined the brotherhood, as - at her son's request - the Smiths have become surrogate kin to the marine who was injured alongside him, but whose family can't come to Bethesda. "I can understand the bond now."

Down the hall on this late-August night, Wally Howard, of Orlando, Fla., and his wife, have been standing vigil for their son round-the-clock since mid-July.Lance Cpl. Patrick W. Howard, wounded by insurgent mortar fire July 18, remains bedridden, with a seemingly endless list of internal injuries and fractures. His parents haven't left the Bethesda base since the day they arrived, relying on the liaison unit completely.

"If it weren't for the way we've been treated in here, we wouldn't be able to do what we're doing," says Wally Howard.

His marine's most recent request: a haircut.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Qwest Communications Judge Approves Settlement With Shareholders In Suit (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072722

A judge gave final approval to a $400 million settlement of a consolidated shareholder lawsuit that accused Qwest Communications International Inc. of civil fraud in connection with a multibillion-dollar accounting scandal. The settlement, announced in November 2005, covers Qwest and most former executives, except former Chief Executive Officer Joe Nacchio and former Chief Financial Officer Robert Woodruff. Qwest, a telephone-service provider based in Denver, will pay the money into a fund to compensate shareholders. U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn in Denver stayed action on the remaining claims against Messrs. Woodruff and Nacchio until spring after Mr. Nacchio's trial on criminal charges is scheduled to conclude. Mr. Nacchio has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts of insider trading. The Securities and Exchange Commission has said fraud occurred at Qwest in April 1999 to March 2002, which allowed the company to improperly report about $3 billion in revenue that later was restated. The shareholder lawsuit alleged that Qwest, and former officers and board members, concealed information about the revenue.

Fastow A Key For Plaintiffs In Bank Suits (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Andrew S. Fastow is telling all, naming names, and the lawyers suing Enron's former banks on behalf of investors say that his words could lead to billions of dollars in fresh settlements.

Mr. Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, was sentenced last week to six years in jail for stealing from Enron and devising schemes to deceive investors about the energy company's true financial condition. In his last weeks of freedom, he spent long days giving plaintiffs' lawyers his account of the role that banks played in helping Enron disguise how much debt and how little cash it had.

Lawyers have already won settlements for $7.3 billion of the $40 billion investors claim they lost in Enron's collapse. Most of that money has come from banks, like J. P. Morgan Chase, Bank of America, Citigroup and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. Seven other banks have not settled.

Until now, the plaintiffs' lawyers have had to rely primarily on documents to try to prove that banks played a central role in Enron's false accounting. But Mr. Fastow, the Enron executive who worked most closely with the banks, has been explaining the motives for many of Enron's bank dealings, putting them in context and recounting conversations with top bank officials, according to two plaintiffs' lawyers and Mr. Fastow's civil defense lawyer, Craig Smyser.

It remains to be seen if assistance from Mr. Fastow will prove convincing in a courtroom and be a help to the plaintiffs. Nevertheless, the information that Mr. Fastow has provided so far has given a new burst of confidence to lawyers suing Enron that they can force the remaining banks in the case to settle claims or prevail at trial, if necessary.

Those lawyers say that Mr. Fastow has provided an insider's perspective and a road map of many of the bank transactions that investors assert were a large part of the Enron fraud. The transactions allowed Enron to experience its explosive growth in the late 1990's before its sudden collapse in December 2001.

Mr. Fastow, 44, originally decided to cooperate with the civil lawyers in part to try to reduce his own prison sentence. But he has agreed to give a full deposition over the next few weeks. If a judge does not decide otherwise, the deposition will take place in prison or a detention center.

In interviews over the weekend, Mr. Smyser and lawyers suing the banks said that the banks were already expressing concern over a 25-page declaration that Mr. Fastow turned over to the plaintiffs' lawyers before he was sentenced. In it, he said he viewed certain banks as "problem solvers" that Enron turned to when it needed to resolve its financial problems. Those banks designed complex financial structures that helped Enron meet its financial reporting targets, Mr. Fastow wrote.

Mark Herr, a spokesman for Merrill Lynch, said that Mr. Fastow's declaration was "produced at a time when he was seeking a more lenient sentence" and "should be seen for what it is: a series of unproved and stale claims that have not been tested in open court or been subject to cross-examination." Merrill Lynch, one of the banks named in the investor suits, was identified by Mr. Fastow as a "problem solver."

William S. Lerach, the lead lawyer representing investors suing Enron and the banks, said that the declaration was "just the tip of the iceberg" of what Mr. Fastow has been telling the civil lawyers.

Mr. Smyser said Sunday that there had been a flurry of correspondence and phone calls between him and the banks' lawyers. "They want to know what is coming down the pipe, and they have an indication from Andy's declaration that it isn't going to be pleasant," he said. "I suspect it is their worst nightmare."

Despite truckloads of documents from Enron and the banks, and millions of dollars spent on the case so far, civil lawyers had struggled to learn much of anything from the banks' own employees. Plaintiffs' lawyers took 175 depositions from bank officials over the last 18 months, most of them running 15 hours long. Yet nearly all of those officials either exercised their Fifth Amendment right to not testify or said they did not recall anything relevant, according to two lawyers involved in the case.

That finally began to change when lawyers for the plaintiffs first sat down with Mr. Fastow in late August in a conference room at Mr. Smyser's downtown Houston office. After that initial 90-minute meeting, the civil lawyers set up a series of six meetings in September totaling almost 40 hours, two lawyers involved in the meetings said.

Each meeting focused on a different set of banks, including Barclays, Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse First Boston, Deutsche Bank, Royal Bank of Canada, Royal Bank of Scotland and Toronto-Dominion. One meeting focused exclusively on LJM, the off-the-books financing structure that Mr. Fastow set up to help Enron hide its debt and buttress its earnings. Before the meetings, lawyers sent binders — some nine inches thick — for Mr. Fastow and his lawyer to study.

Mr. Fastow was generally patient and friendly, the lawyers said. But he sometimes grew impatient at having to repeatedly explain how certain transactions worked, they said. On the morning of Sept. 18, Mr. Fastow became upset upon learning that Judge Kenneth Hoyt had sentenced David W. Delainey, a former Enron executive, to 30 months in prison for one count of insider trading, reducing his sentence by only 90 days. Most legal experts had expected Mr. Delainey to receive probation for his extensive cooperation in helping the government convict Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Just minutes after learning of Mr. Delainey's fate, Mr. Fastow stared at a lawyer in the conference room and said, "I'm done, my fate is sealed," according to a lawyer who was there.

Some plaintiffs' lawyers grew worried that Mr. Fastow would walk out of the meeting, seeing little personal benefit from continuing to cooperate with the civil lawyers. But he kept his agreement to help them. And the judge eventually did reduce his sentence, seeming to say, in effect, that Mr. Fastow and his family had suffered enough; his wife, Lea, had served one year in jail for falsifying a tax return related to one of Mr. Fastow's schemes to skim money from the company.

Civil lawyers said they had been impressed with Mr. Fastow's recall of specific transactions with the banks. Mr. Fastow cited four conversations, for example, related to an electricity trade done with Merrill Lynch in 1999 to help Enron meets its earnings numbers. He has supported the plaintiffs' position that e-mail messages show that Enron made a verbal agreement with Merrill to get the bank out of the deal in June of 2000 and would pay the bank $17 million for doing the transaction, the civil lawyers said. Merrill Lynch has repeatedly denied that there was any agreement to unwind the trade.

But information Mr. Fastow can provide about Royal Bank of Scotland and others may prove to be the most valuable to the plaintiffs, Mr. Lerach said. Mr. Fastow has told plaintiffs' lawyers that verbal assurances that he gave to Royal Bank of Scotland and other banks were considered guarantees that the banks' equity investments would be repaid. A spokesman for Royal Bank of Scotland did not respond to calls and e-mail messages Friday and over the weekend.

Mr. Fastow's deposition will take an estimated 10 days, plus more than two weeks of preparation, said one lawyer involved in the case. Some 80 lawyers will probably to want to attend. The plaintiffs' lawyers have requested that Judge Hoyt let Mr. Fastow give his deposition soon, before he enters prison, and have asked that he be allowed day passes to give his testimony at law offices in downtown Houston.

Hours in front of a microphone being peppered with questions might be a relief for Mr. Fastow. He is currently in solitary confinement in a Houston detention center, awaiting assignment to a prison. His cell is so filthy that Mr. Fastow, dressed in an orange jumpsuit, has taken to doing pushups with his feet on the bed and his hands on the sink, said Mr. Smyser, who last visited him on Saturday.

Drama In The Boardroom (WSJ)

By JOANN S. LUBLIN And ERIN WHITE

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0072724

Corporate directors, pressed to become more vocal following the scandals of the Enron era, are throwing their weight around more, rubber-stamping management less -- and roiling many once-clubby boardrooms.

At General Motors Corp., Jerome York, a representative of investor Kirk Kerkorian, joined the board in February and is pushing GM to weigh an alliance with Japan's Nissan Motor Co. and France's Renault SA. Unhappy representatives of the Chandler family on the Tribune Co. board have forced the media company to consider big strategic moves, including a breakup of the company. At H.J. Heinz Co., investor Nelson Peltz captured two board seats after urging Heinz to cut costs and boost marketing of its core ketchup brand. Heinz accelerated cuts and announced a restructuring that wasn't too different from Mr. Peltz's plan. He attends his first board meeting next month.

Few boards, though, have matched the degree of all-out war achieved at Hewlett-Packard Co., where investigations into boardroom leaks mushroomed to include spying on directors, executives and journalists. The divisions were rooted partly in disputes among three independent directors, including Patricia Dunn, until recently H-P's chairman. Extreme though that situation may be, it does highlight the pitfalls that may await a board whose directors are fiercely independent of management and, at times, antagonistic toward one another.

Propelled by changes in stock-exchange rules and the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate-reform law, more independent directors have more leadership positions on boards and meet more often without management. Adding to the mix are several other forces, including mergers that have left a legacy of distrust, forceful investors who have won board seats through persuasion or proxy fights and directors' fears of personal liability for corporate misdeeds.

Friction is inevitable in such circumstances, directors and board watchers say. "With the emphasis on board governance, you certainly are seeing directors unwilling to go along with the CEO and the consensus" of other directors, observes Stephen Hardis, outside chairman of insurance giant Marsh & McLennan Cos. and a member of six other boards. "They say, 'I can't just go along to get along.' "

Adds William George, former chief executive of Medtronic Inc. and a director at three public companies: "I think we're correcting the imbalance that existed five years ago....It's unhealthy when boards become more of a rubber stamp to management."

The roster of potentially fractious corporate boards seems to grow by the week. There have been 80 proxy contests for board seats in 2006, more than double the 29 such fights in all of 2004, according to estimates by FactSet Research Systems Inc., of Norwalk, Conn. About 62% of this year's challengers have succeeded, up from 41% two years ago.

At ImClone Systems Inc., investor Carl Icahn and three allies won board seats last month after threatening a proxy fight. His first day on the board, Mr. Icahn demanded that Chairman David Kies resign. Mr. Kies was re-elected at a board meeting that lasted five hours. Last week, Mr. Icahn, who owns almost 14% of ImClone, proposed ousting six of the company's 12 directors. Mr. Kies says Mr. Icahn is trying to seize control of the company without paying a premium to shareholders.

At Blockbuster Inc., meanwhile, Mr. Icahn and two allies last year won board seats after a bitter proxy fight. Mr. Icahn pushed through a 70%, one-year cut in the annual retainer paid to directors, to $15,000 from $50,000, over some board members' objections. Mr. Icahn initially had only two allies on the seven-member board. But with careful lobbying, he says, a dissident minority can persuade other directors to "eventually see it your way....It's human nature. You talk to people. Board members start seeing the other side."

Historically, split votes have been rare in U.S. boardrooms; at many companies, open disagreement during discussions borders on heresy. That is changing. At Valeant Pharmaceuticals International, a Costa Mesa, Calif., drug company with a turbulent past, directors value their independence so highly that they encourage members to cast dissenting votes.

"We've developed a culture where we're comfortable" with nonunanimous decisions, because "we respect each other," says Richard Koppes, a director and an attorney for Jones Day in San Francisco. Board meetings last longer than they used to, he adds. "There have been times when people change their minds. And at times, we agree to disagree."

Last year, Valeant directors amended an approved executive-pay plan after some directors voiced concerns by casting dissenting votes, according to a person close to the situation.

Formerly known as ICN Pharmaceuticals Inc., Valeant in 2002 ousted its chief executive, Milan Panic, after he lost a fight for control of the nine-member board. Mr. Panic, a Serbian-born immigrant who served briefly as prime minister of Yugoslavia, refused to relinquish his directorship before his term expired. During the first board meeting of the revamped ICN board, "you could cut the tensions with a knife," recalls Mr. Koppes, one of the newly elected directors.

Before leaving the board in 2003, Mr. Panic repeatedly cast dissenting votes. That made for a difficult period, Mr. Koppes says, but he adds that Mr. Panic's opposition "caused people to think" about the importance of dissenting votes. Now, when a dissent is cast, Mr. Koppes says, "that means there has been a full debate."

Through a spokesman, Mr. Panic says Valeant "has been terribly managed" since his departure. "All they have done is cost jobs and hundreds of millions of dollars in shareholder value and operating losses," the spokesman says.

Fears of boardroom divisions have proved groundless, in some cases. At Marsh, former U.S. Attorney Zachary W. Carter joined the board in 2004 with the backing of four big public-employee pension funds. Mr. Hardis says he initially worried that boardroom collegiality might suffer. But Mr. Carter says he "made it clear that I saw my responsibilities as representing all investors and not just one group."

A few months later, Mr. Carter turned out to be a big asset for Marsh, after New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer filed a lawsuit accusing Marsh's insurance-brokerage unit of bid rigging. Mr. Carter, a friend of Mr. Spitzer, helped arrange a critical meeting between Mr. Spitzer and four independent directors. Jeffrey W. Greenberg, Marsh's chairman and CEO, soon quit, and Marsh reached an $850 million settlement in January 2005.

Worried about increased boardroom discord, more directors are seeking help with handling disagreements, reports David A. Nadler, chairman of Mercer Delta Consulting, a New York firm that advises boards and CEOs. During the past few years, he says, he has seen greater interest from board members keen to examine "the critical issue of how do we work together with each other and with management."

Experts say that some argument can be healthy but warn that boards must learn to manage disagreement constructively or risk becoming dysfunctional, as H-P's board did. An increasingly popular tactic is the use of board peer evaluations, Mr. Nadler says. "Four or five years ago, [such evaluations were] almost unheard of," but now some 10% to 15% of major boards use them, he says. Some problems directors encounter with peers include inadequate preparation for meetings, asking too few questions, asking too many unhelpful questions -- or leaking information to employees or the news media.

Charles Elson, director of the John L. Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware and a director at three public companies, says discussions need to be frank, but disagreements "shouldn't devolve into the personal." Lead directors, chairmen and committee chairman are important in helping reach a consensus. One tactic is to adjourn for a few days. "Give people a day or two to rethink things," Mr. Elson says. "Don't have a hasty vote."

Boardroom veterans say diplomacy can overcome many disputes. Raymond Troubh, who serves on six public company boards, recalls how the lead independent director at one company resolved a disagreement a couple of years ago regarding the renomination of another director. He declines to identify the company. The lead director spoke with directors individually and summarized each camp's position without the heated rhetoric. In the end, the director was renominated unanimously.

Silicon Valley's Outsiders: In-House Lawyers? (WSJ)

By Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

In the past two decades, in-house corporate lawyers have grown in clout and stature at many U.S. companies. But that trend hasn't fully taken hold in Silicon Valley, some lawyers say.

Lately, two scandals -- Hewlett-Packard Co.'s board-leak investigation and the backdating of stock options -- are shining a light on the role of in-house lawyers at Silicon Valley technology companies.

Those situations each present different facts. But lawyers inside and outside the valley say in-house lawyers at technology companies sometimes lack the respect the position commands elsewhere. One indication: Some big Silicon Valley companies don't have general counsel -- the title typically conferred on top in-house attorneys.

At H-P, longtime General Counsel Ann Baskins resigned Thursday, hours before a congressional hearing on an H-P investigation into press leaks that included potentially illegal tactics to obtain private phone records. Former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn said she relied upon Ms. Baskins's judgment about the propriety of the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0072726

Ms. Baskins's lawyers said she acted legally and ethically. Meanwhile, more than two dozen Silicon Valley companies are under scrutiny for past stock-option grants that may have enriched executives and violated accounting rules.

Despite some changes, general counsel in Silicon Valley are still sometimes "seen as a blockage to the execution" of the company's plans, says Scott Bohannon, general manager of the General Counsel Roundtable, a Washington research organization.

As an in-house lawyer in the valley, "you've got one hand tied behind your back," said Mark Michael, general counsel of computer-networking-equipment maker 3Com Corp. from 1986 until 2003. "You have to do the job, but you're just not empowered or funded." For instance, Mr. Michael says he struggled unsuccessfully for years to upgrade his department's technology.

A 3Com spokesman said, "I can't speak for Mr. Michael's tenure here, but we feel our current GC, Neal Goldman, has broad access to the CEO and board, and has ample resources to do his job."

To some, the status of in-house lawyers in the valley reflects the relative youth of an industry that worships technical innovation. "No" -- the message in-house lawyers often have to deliver -- isn't the message some driven entrepreneurs want to hear.

Silicon Valley's most influential attorneys have traditionally been outside lawyers, such as Larry Sonsini, who counsel young companies on venture funding, mergers and acquisitions and stock offerings. Mr. Sonsini, chairman of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, is H-P's outside counsel and was on the board of Brocade Communications Systems Inc., where two former executives have been indicted on criminal-fraud charges. The former executives deny the charges.

By comparison, in-house lawyers sometimes play second fiddle. "It's still not uncommon to see outside counsel ignore the internal counsel," said Donald Keller, a partner in Orrick Herrington & Sutcliffe's Menlo Park, Calif., office. Some in-house lawyers command attention from other executives, Mr. Keller said, but often they are "regarded as a necessary evil."

A similar arrangement prevailed at most U.S. companies for generations. In-house lawyers farmed out tough issues to outside counsel. Inside corporations, where power typically flows to those who generate revenue, the general counsel's office was often viewed as a mere cost center.

In the past 20 years, however, general counsel have won a stronger voice with senior executives and directors. One key figure in that development was Benjamin Heineman Jr., the top lawyer at General Electric Co. from 1987 to 2005. Mr. Heineman recruited high-powered legal talent. Many of his protégés went on to become strong and respected top lawyers elsewhere, including Maura Abeln Smith at International Paper Co. and Jeffrey B. Kindler at McDonald's Corp. and Pfizer Inc. Mr. Kindler was named Pfizer's chief executive in July.

Some Silicon Valley general counsel do have reputations for leading strong departments and wielding influence within their companies, including Bruce Sewell at Intel Corp., Mark Chandler at Cisco Systems Inc. and Thomas McCoy at Advanced Micro Devices Inc., whose formal title is vice president of legal affairs.

Joseph Grundfest, a former member of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission who now teaches at Stanford Law School, said Silicon Valley's in-house lawyers are no stronger or weaker than in other industries. In the wake of corporate scandals, Mr. Grundfest says, "pressures on general counsel are up in Silicon Valley, but they're up at nontech companies too."

Some big Silicon Valley companies don't have general counsel. Cypress Semiconductor Corp., which has a $2.5 billion market capitalization, doesn't have a general counsel; its two staff lawyers report to the head of new product development. Novellus Systems Inc., a maker of semiconductor-manufacturing equipment with a market capitalization of $3.4 billion, hasn't had a general counsel in at least a year, though a spokeswoman says the company is looking to hire one.

"It's shocking to me that any public company would exist without a general counsel," said Richard Koppes, a lawyer at Jones Day in San Francisco and the former general counsel at the California Public Employees' Retirement System, one of the nation's largest public-pension funds. Mr. Koppes says he knows of one former general counsel at a Silicon Valley company who resigned because senior executives wouldn't crack down on behavior he considered unethical.

Anne Jordan, former general counsel at software maker PeopleSoft Inc., said thinly staffed Silicon Valley legal departments often are hard-pressed to provide adequate oversight or to change the way a company monitors itself. "You tend to [go along] with how things are [already] being done," said Ms. Jordan, who left PeopleSoft in 2004, shortly before the company was acquired by Oracle Corp.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Republican Leaders Scramble To Contain Mark Foley Fallout (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Pummeled by Democrats and their own self-doubts, Republicans worked to get ahead of the Mark Foley page scandal, with the White House moving toward a criminal investigation that might take some heat off the majority party.

In back-to-back letters released last night, Speaker Dennis Hastert formally asked both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to begin inquiries, and the Illinois Republican said the investigations should look at both Mr. Foley's conduct and how some of the most sexually explicit messages were kept secret for as long as three years.

"There is going to be, I'm sure, a criminal investigation into the particulars of this case," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said on CNN's "Late Edition."

But House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) demanded that the House Ethics Committee begin its own inquiry and take sworn testimony from Republican leaders about what they knew of the Florida congressman's improper advances to teenage male pages in emails and suggestive instant messages.

"Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," Ms. Pelosi wrote in a letter to the ethics committee.

Coming just weeks before midterm elections, Mr. Foley's resignation Friday and the ensuing scandal aren't well-timed for Republican fortunes. As lawmakers left Washington over the weekend to campaign, the news soured a political mood already strained by divisions between the House and Senate leadership and a failure to complete major domestic legislation.

A Host of Bills Left Unfinished

Defense, port and homeland-security bills passed in the final hours, along with new restrictions on Internet gambling. But unfinished were a host of domestic spending bills and tax-break extensions, as well as energy and immigration legislation.

With the Latino vote being courted by both parties, one of the last measures committed more than $1 billion to build more fencing along the Mexican border and tacitly blessed buying prescription drugs from Canada -- but not Mexico.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to capture the House; the threat to the majority is that the Foley matter will reawaken doubts about Republican failure to deal more aggressively with scandals. Legislation to tighten lobbying and ethics rules was among measures left undone, and while the leadership says there is little voter interest in such issues, sexual advances to teenage boys is another matter.

A number of individual Democratic challengers called on Republican incumbents to return money raised by Mr. Foley. For example, in New Mexico, where state Attorney General Patricia Madrid is running against Rep. Heather Wilson, a news release from Ms. Madrid's campaign read, "Wilson has $6,000 in dirty money from congressman who made improper advances to underage boy." Republican incumbents facing tough races in states such as Connecticut were outspoken that their party leaders must be held accountable.

Leaders deny any attempt at a coverup and expressed surprise and anger at learning last week the full scope of Mr. Foley's advances. But Republicans now say they made a serious error last fall, when the first warnings of potential trouble emerged, by not informing Michigan Rep. Dale Kildee, the lead House Democrat on the six-member board that oversees the page program.

Private Warning

That board, which includes three members of Congress as well as professional officers such as the House clerk, was set up in its current form after sex scandals involving lawmakers and House pages in the mid-1980s. But rather than call a board meeting, Rep. John Shimkus (R., Ill.), the chairman, went to Mr. Foley and warned him privately against what were described by Republican lawmakers as nonsexual, but "overly friendly" emails to a former page.

DOJ_NMG_0072728

Jeff Trandahl, who was then the House clerk, has yet to comment publicly on the matter, but according to Mr. Shimkus's account, Mr. Trandahl accompanied him when he met with Mr. Foley.

Left out of the loop was Mr. Kildee, a former seminarian who isn't a partisan figure in the House. Mr. Kildee said Mr. Shimkus told him last week he felt "broken hearted" about the matter. "Absolutely there should have been a page board meeting," Mr. Kildee said.

"It is made up of a cross section of members and our role is to make sure these children have a safe environment," Mr. Kildee said.

Republican leaders issued a joint statement Saturday describing Mr. Foley's actions as an "obscene breach of trust" and saying his resignation "must be followed by the full weight of the criminal justice system." In his letter to Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Hastert said media reports, including those earlier by ABC News, indicate the most explicit exchanges actually predate the email exchanges last year, which began around August 2005.

The early communications, "of which no one in the House leadership was aware of to my knowledge, reportedly were sent sometime in 2003," Mr. Hastert told the attorney general.

The speaker said there should be a twofold investigation, of the messages first, but also of the fact that there "are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

"I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert Asks Justice To Investigate Foley Exchanges (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 2, 2006

By Laura Litvan and Jay Newton-Small

Oct. 1 (Bloomberg) -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert asked the Justice Department to investigate Representative Mark Foley's exchanged of sexually explicit messages with an underage employee of Congress.

Today's request by Hastert follows calls from Democrats for a full inquiry into Foley's actions and those of Republican leaders, who learned months ago that the Florida Republican was communicating by e-mail with at least one teenage congressional page and kept the matter under wraps. Foley resigned Sept. 29 after ABC New asked him about graphic messages he exchanged with another page.

``These sexually explicit communications warrant a criminal referral," Hastert said in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that was released by the speaker's office.

Foley, 52, was a member of the House Ways and Means Committee and co-chairman of the House's Missing and Exploited Children Caucus. Republicans now may struggle to hold onto his seat in what has been a strongly Republican district in central Florida. They also are defending two others, in Ohio and Texas, where the Republican incumbent declined to run because of ethics scandals.

Congressional Seat

Democrats, who need to gain 15 seats in the Nov. 7 elections to take control of the House, seized on the scandal. Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid earlier in the day urged Gonzalez to investigate Foley's actions and those of Republican leaders, who he said ignored warnings about the Florida representative ``to preserve a congressional seat this election year."

Asked about Reid's request, Justice Department spokeswoman Donna Sellers, citing department policy, said she couldn't comment on whether the case is under investigation.

Representative Sherrod Brown of Ohio, who is running to unseat Republican Senator Mike DeWine in November, called for Hastert to resign as House speaker. Republican leaders have ``forfeited any public trust," he said on NBC's ``Meet the Press" program.

Critics focused on the issue of what and when Republican leaders knew about the e-mails. Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Karen Finney questioned ``whether there was an attempt to cover up criminal activity involving a minor to keep it from coming to light before Election Day."

Timeline

Hastert's spokesman, Ron Bonjean, said the speaker was in his home district in Illinois today. The Foley scandal hasn't endangered Hastert's hold on his job as speaker, Bonjean said.

``The speaker is working hard with his Republican colleagues to maintain the House of Representatives and serves at the pleasure of the House Republican Conference," Bonjean said.

Republican leaders over the past two days have issued a series of statements about Foley's contacts with the pages and the sequence of events.

Representative Tom Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said in a statement yesterday that Representative Rodney Alexander told him months ago about exchanges with a page who was from Alexander's native Louisiana. Reynolds said he didn't know the exact content of the messages and informed Hastert.

The speaker's office said in a statement yesterday that Hastert doesn't recall Reynolds telling him earlier this year about the matter but has ``no reason to dispute" Reynolds.

Hastert's letter to Gonzalez notes that ``there are two different and distinct communications at issue here." The letter says he was made aware of an e-mail ``determined to be `overly friendly' by Representative Alexander's office but was not sexual in nature."

Sequence

House Majority Leader John Boehner told the Washington Post Sept. 29 that when he learned of Foley's e-mails in the late spring he immediately told Hastert, who appeared to be aware of the problem already. Boehner contacted the newspaper again hours later and said he wasn't sure he'd spoken with Hastert, the Post reported.

Hastert's office said yesterday that an aide to the speaker met with Alexander's chief of staff in the fall of 2005 to discuss the matter. The aide informed the clerk of the House, the statement said.

Hastert's staff said that the matter was brought to Reynolds's attention in the spring of this year.

``Despite the fact that I had not seen the e-mails in question, and Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds said in his statement.

Congressional pages come from around the country to spend their high school junior year working as messengers and taking special classes.

Dan Bartlett, one of President George W. Bush's top advisers, called the allegation ``shocking" and said the president was unaware of the matter until it was revealed publicly last week.

While endorsing a criminal investigation of Foley's conduct, the White House counselor said Republican leaders are acting appropriately by disclosing what they knew of the matter and seeking a congressional investigation.

``That's the best place for it to handled," Bartlett said on CNN's ``Late Edition" program.

Democratic Representative Jane Harman of California said that may not be enough.

``There's been a Republican investigation, for 24 hours, of Republican activity," she said on the ``Fox News Sunday" program. ``I just don't think that that is adequate."

According to e-mails posted on the Internet by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a non-profit watchdog group, Foley, a six-term House veteran, asked an unidentified male page for a picture and what he wanted for his birthday. ``This freaked me out," the page wrote when forwarding the e- mails to someone else.

ABC News said the network obtained excerpts of instant messages provided by former pages who said Foley made references to sex acts and made comments about their bodies.

FBI Looks At Foley's E-mails To Teens (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 2, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday to investigate former congressman Mark Foley's communications with teenage boys who worked as House pages. The FBI is “conducting an assessment to determine whether any federal laws were broken,” bureau spokesman Richard Kolko said.

DOJ_NMG_0072730

Hastert has said he knew about non-sexual e-mails that Foley, 52, a Florida Republican, sent to a 16-year-old former page, first reported by ABC News on Thursday. The speaker said he did not know about allegedly more explicit communications. Foley resigned Friday after the network asked him for comment.

The e-mails and instant messages have not been independently verified by USA TODAY and were not mentioned by Foley in his resignation letter.

On Sunday, Hastert asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to investigate Foley's communications with current and former pages and find out whether anyone knew about but did not report them.

Democrats, meanwhile, demanded a House investigation to determine whether Republican leaders covered up Foley's actions.

House Republicans stood by Hastert and the GOP leadership for now. "If it is found that any member of Congress or staff willingly participated in a coverup of Mr. Foley's actions, that individual should resign immediately," said Rep. Rob Simmons, R-Conn.

Foley, co-chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, helped write a law signed by President Bush in July that toughened prison sentences for sex offenders. He told USA TODAY earlier this year the bill was needed because of online child exploitation. Referring to online predators, he said: "We're going to make your life a living hell."

The political stir is the latest setback for Republicans, whose House majority is threatened in next month's elections. They already are battling Bush's low poll ratings and concerns about the war in Iraq.

Foley is the fourth House Republican forced out by ethics problems in the past year. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California resigned in November after pleading guilty to accepting $2.4 million in bribes. Former majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas was indicted on state campaign finance violations and resigned in June. Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio has agreed to plead guilty to charges of corruption and is not seeking re-election.

"It's not as if Republicans didn't have enough problems," said independent political analyst Stuart Rothenberg.

Two sets of communications are in question. Hastert said that in fall 2005, his office looked into e-mails Foley sent last year to a 16-year-old boy, in which Foley asked for a photo. "Sexually explicit" instant messages dating back to 2003 just came to light, the speaker said Sunday, citing media reports.

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi called on the House ethics committee Sunday to question GOP leaders under oath. "They chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," she said.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said GOP leaders "showed caution." Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., said the issue could backfire "if Republicans knew what was going on and allowed it to happen."

Review Of Messages Sent By Congressman Begins (NYT)

By Carl Hulse And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — Law enforcement officials said Sunday that the F.B.I. had begun a preliminary inquiry into whether former Representative Mark Foley broke any federal laws when he reportedly exchanged sexually explicit e-mail messages with under-age Congressional pages as leaders of both parties demanded new inquiries.

Officials described the F.B.I. action as a review of the evidence and relevant statutes to determine whether to open a full investigation, though one appeared likely.

At the same time, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert asked the Justice Department on Sunday not only to investigate Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican who resigned on Friday after ABC News confronted him with the e-mail messages, but also to determine who possessed the messages that have touched off a furor weeks before the November elections.

"Since the communications appear to have existed for three years, there should be an investigation into the extent there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities," the letter from Mr. Hastert to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said.

DOJ_NMG_0072731

Top Democrats in the House and the Senate also demanded investigations, and Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the Democratic leader, called on Republican leaders to be questioned under oath by the ethics committee about their handling of the case.

Republicans leaders — including Representatives John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, and Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the party's Congressional campaign committee — acknowledged this weekend that they had been aware for months of e-mail traffic between Mr. Foley and a 16-year-old Louisiana boy. Mr. Reynolds said he had also told Mr. Hastert, though Mr. Hastert said he did not remember the conversation. Several other high-level aides also knew of the e-mail.

The initial messages, though not overtly sexual, alarmed the boy's parents and led to Mr. Foley's being questioned by the clerk of the House and the Republican chairman of the board that oversees the page program. Mr. Foley told them the communications were innocent. They directed him to break off contact and then apparently dropped the matter, saying the parents did not want to take other action.

Ms. Pelosi accused Republicans of putting Mr. Foley's political welfare ahead of the page's in a letter she sent to the ethics panel, which had received a call for an investigation approved by the House on Friday.

"Since that resolution unanimously passed, Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," Ms. Pelosi said, asking that the inquiry be initiated within 10 days.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, also called for an investigation by the Justice Department. "The allegations against Congressman Foley are repugnant, but equally as bad is the possibility that Republican leaders in the House of Representatives knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a Congressional seat this election year," Mr. Reid said. The public deserves "a full accounting for this despicable episode," he added.

In his letter to Mr. Gonzales, Mr. Hastert drew a line between what he described as "two different and distinct communications at issue here" — the e-mail messages to the Louisiana boy that Republicans considered "overfriendly," and the more intimate messages that surfaced later and that leaders say they never saw.

Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Ms. Pelosi, said Mr. Hastert seemed "more concerned by who revealed the Republican leadership's cover-up of Mr. Foley's Internet stalking" than about the pages.

Mr. Hastert also wrote Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida asking for an investigation by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. The authorities there, both local and state, said on Sunday that they had not begun one so far.

Garry Wilson, chief deputy sheriff in St. Lucie County, said his office would not try to search Mr. Foley's condominium on Hutchinson Island unless a complaint was filed against him in the county or unless state or federal law enforcement directed the sheriff's office to do so.

In Washington, the clerk of the House has taken responsibility for Mr. Foley's Congressional office, and the locks have been changed. Associates of Mr. Foley said he was apparently in seclusion in Florida.

For a third straight day, fallout surrounding Mr. Foley's resignation worried the weary ranks of Congressional Republicans. As representatives begin the final month of campaigning before the midterm elections, several Republican advisers said on Sunday that they feared that the scandal over the e-mail messages threatened to complicate their efforts. If nothing else, they said, it provides another reason for voters to be displeased with Congress.

"Its been a time bomb from Day 1," said a Republican strategist who is close to the party's Congressional leaders and the White House and who was granted anonymity to speak freely about internal party concerns. "Now, it's sad for the whole House."

The Democratic National Committee seized on the scandal, sending out a scathing statement that raised pointed questions about Mr. Hastert and other Republican leaders. In bold red type, the dispatch asked: "What did Coach H and his buddies know and when did they know it?"

It was a rare instance in this fierce political season that Republicans were not quick to respond. The Republican National Committee has not commented on the scandal, and nearly a dozen Republican members of Congress either declined to be interviewed or did not return telephone calls about the matter on Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0072732

In some competitive House races across the country, Democrats have already started making an issue of Mr. Foley's resignation. On Sunday, Diane Farrell, who is challenging Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said voters should hold Republicans accountable in November for the scandal.

"That the Republican House leadership apparently knew of this situation but took no action is yet another example of why this leadership must change, Ms. Farrell said, issuing a statement one day after Mr. Shays denounced the actions of Mr. Foley.

In New Mexico, Patricia Madrid called on her Republican opponent, Representative Heather A. Wilson, to return campaign contributions from Mr. Foley. Hours later, Ms. Wilson responded that she would donate the $8,000 she had received to charity.

Mr. Foley, who served on the House Ways and Means Committee, was a prolific fund-raiser. His campaign account had a balance of $2.7 million at the end of August, according to reports filed with the Federal Election Commission.

Carl Forti, the communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said Sunday that the committee would gladly accept Mr. Foley's money or part of it to devote to House races. Mr. Foley already gave $100,000 to the committee in July, campaign records show, as part of the party's Battleground Program, to which members are asked to contribute.

"The money is in the control of Mr. Foley," Mr. Forti said. "Whatever he decides to do with it is up to him."

FBI To Examine Foley's E-Mails (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The FBI announced last night that it is looking into whether former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.) broke federal law by sending inappropriate e-mails and instant messages to teenage House pages.

The announcement came hours after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert asked for a Justice Department investigation into not only Foley's actions but also Congress's handling of the matter once it learned of the contacts.

In his letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Hastert (R-Ill.) acknowledged that some of Foley's most sexually explicit instant messages were sent to former House pages in 2003. That was two years before lawmakers say they learned of a more ambiguous 2005 e-mail that led only to a quiet warning to Foley to leave pages alone.

Foley, 52, abruptly resigned Friday, and Democrats have since been hammering Hastert and other GOP leaders. They have accused Republicans of covering up the matter and allowing Foley to remain as co-chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus instead of launching an inquiry and possibly uncovering the raunchier communications.

As the scandal broke, Hastert contended he learned of concerns about Foley only last week. But after Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) said Saturday that he had notified Hastert months ago of Foley's e-mails to a 16-year-old boy, the speaker did not dispute his colleague, and Hastert's office acknowledged that some aides knew last year that Foley had been ordered to cease contact with the youth.

Republican leaders continued to insist yesterday that it was understandable that the "over-friendly" Internet e-mails they had seen did not set off alarm bells. But one House GOP leadership aide, speaking on the condition of anonymity for fear of losing his job, conceded that Republicans had erred in not notifying the three-member, bipartisan panel that oversees the page system. Instead, they left it to the panel chairman, Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), to confront Foley.

Also yesterday, a former House page said that at a 2003 page reunion, he saw sexually suggestive e-mails Foley had sent to another former page. Patrick McDonald, 21, now a senior at Ohio State University, said he eventually learned of "three or four" pages from his 2001-2002 class who were sent such messages.

He said he remembered saying at the reunion, "If this gets out, it will destroy him."

House officials have already removed Foley's nameplate from his Cannon Office Building door and shut down his House Web site, while in Florida, GOP leaders prepared to meet at an Orlando airport hotel today to select a replacement candidate for the November election.

Foley has said nothing since announcing his resignation. Yesterday, a statement purportedly sent by Foley to news organizations, including The Washington Post, said he has entered an alcohol-treatment facility in Florida. The Post could not confirm the statement's authenticity, and none of Foley's former aides has responded to messages since his resignation.

DOJ_NMG_0072733

In his letter to Gonzales, Hastert said Foley's electronic messages crossed state lines, so "there should be a complete investigation and prosecution of any federal laws that have been violated."

FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko declined to elaborate on his announcement of the agency's investigation of Foley. A law enforcement official who requested anonymity so he could discuss an ongoing case said the probe will be handled by the FBI's Cyber Division, and could involve agents from the Washington or Miami field offices.

Hastert also wrote that, because some of the more sexually explicit instant messages were written in 2003, "there should be an investigation into the extent there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

The speaker asked that the probe extend to "all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they Members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress." He said that "no one in the House Leadership was aware, to my knowledge" of the explicit messages from 2003 until ABC News reported on them last week.

In one instant-message exchange with a high school boy, ABC News reported, Foley made repeated references to sex acts and body parts.

Former page Matthew Loraditch said yesterday that he has known for years about the "creepy" messages three 2002 classmates received from Foley. He said Foley sent them after the boys had finished the House program. Each began innocuously but took a turn in tone, said Loraditch, a senior at Towson University.

"They became explicit and similar to what we are seeing on the Web sites right now," said Loraditch, 21, who runs the U.S. House Page Alumni Association's Internet message board. Those who received them "didn't do anything beside telling other pages about it."

Foley was known as an exceedingly friendly House member to young pages, most of whom are 16- and 17-year-old high school juniors who come to Washington for an intensive, year-long civics lesson. Unlike most House members, he memorized their names and talked politics with them during lulls in late-night sessions. Foley was the only House member to attend the Class of 2002's graduation, according to McDonald, and he wore a tuxedo.

McDonald and Loraditch said they received no improper messages from Foley. Loraditch said he had viewed several "cut-and-paste excerpts" of messages Foley sent to one of the three. "Some went along with it, others cut it off," Loraditch said. "I'm pretty sure none met with him."

None of the three former pages is yet willing to step forward, according to McDonald and Loraditch.

Loraditch said no one wanted to report Foley for fear of damaging his job prospects.

"That's part of your concern about coming forward," Loraditch said. "You take down a Congress member, and you can't end up trying to do something later."

McDonald remembers Foley encouraging pages who expressed an interest in politics and inviting them to his district for his own campaigning. McDonald was so fond of Foley that he almost refused to believe the objectionable messages when he learned of them in 2003.

"There is a part of us that all want to be told lies," he said. "We want to be told, 'That's not true.' I wanted to believe that Foley was the guy we always knew he was: He just loved pages."

"This weekend," McDonald said, "there's no more lying to yourself."

Hastert's letter to Gonzales was the culmination of a day-long evolution of the Republican strategy toward dealing with the scandal.

On yesterday morning's "This Week" on ABC, White House counselor Dan Bartlett defended the House GOP leadership directing the investigation into how the scandal was handled.

"The leadership appear to be very aggressive in pursuing this investigation, and I think that's the best place is for the leadership to determine the way forward," Bartlett said.

But by midday, on CNN's "Late Edition," Bartlett had joined calls by Democrats and some Republicans for a criminal investigation of the matter. "If you take the allegations at face value, I think there would have to be at least a preliminary look to see if there's any breaking of criminal law," he said.

Hours later, Hastert called for the Justice Department investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0072734

The changes in course were in keeping with a Republican plan to stay ahead of Democratic attacks and to show a willingness to let impartial investigators pursue the matter. On Friday night, when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) took the House floor to demand an investigation by the ethics committee, GOP leaders quickly agreed and the motion passed unanimously.

Yesterday, Democrats kept up the pressure. Pelosi applauded the FBI announcement and called on the Republican leadership to quickly investigate "the cover up of Mr. Foley's behavior."

And Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said the allegations against Foley "are repugnant, but equally as bad is the possibility that Republican leaders in the House of Representatives knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a congressional seat this election year."

Hastert Asks For Inquiry Of Foley (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 2, 2006

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert yesterday requested a criminal investigation of former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, who resigned Friday amid accusations that he attempted to seduce a teenage congressional page.

An FBI spokesman last night confirmed the bureau was "conducting an assessment" of the Foley case.

"I hereby request that the Department of Justice conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated federal law," Mr. Hastert wrote in the letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, sent after similar calls yesterday from the nation's two leading Democrats and the White House.

Mr. Hastert also requested an investigation into whether anyone had "specific knowledge" of the sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any current or former House pages.

"I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress," Mr. Hastert wrote.

Mr. Hastert also wrote to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to ask for a state investigation "to determine to what extent any of [Mr. Foley's] actions violated Florida law."

Meanwhile, yesterday, Republican leaders said they expect state Rep. Joe Negron of Stuart, Fla., to be named to replace Mr. Foley as the Republican candidate in the House race for the 16th Congressional District when the state party's 37-member executive board meets today in Orlando.

Mr. Foley, Florida Republican, was chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children before resigning Friday after he was accused of sending inappropriate e-mails and sexually explicit instant messages over the Internet to teenage boys working as congressional pages.

Democrats have harshly criticized Republican leadership in the wake of last week's revelations.

"The children, their parents, the public, and our colleagues must be assured that such abhorrent behavior is not tolerated and will never happen again," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, wrote yesterday to leaders of the House ethics committee, reiterating that the panel must start work "within 10 days."

"The American people have a right to feel confident that their congressional leaders are committed not just to the best interest of the nation as a whole, but also to the safety of the young people who every year travel to Washington to work on Capitol Hill," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett, appearing yesterday on ABC's "This Week," said President Bush was not aware of the accusations until Mr. Foley resigned and defended the response of the House Republican leadership.

Other Democrats, including Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, who has said he would run for majority leader if Democrats win control of the House in November, went further than Mr. Reid and Mrs. Pelosi.

"I just cannot believe that they allowed this to happen and just told him, 'OK, stay away from this kid,' "Mr. Murtha said on ABC yesterday. "It really makes me nervous that they looked like they tried to cover it up."

DOJ_NMG_0072735

The scandal caused a weekend dispute among Republicans. Mr. Hastert, Illinois Republican, at first said he learned only last week about the Foley e-mails, but Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican, said Saturday that he had told Mr. Hastert about the matter months ago.

Mr. Hastert's office later responded that the speaker had been unaware that Mr. Foley's messages to the boys were anything more than "over-friendly."

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich yesterday defended the response of Republican leaders. Mr. Gingrich, Georgia Republican, said that House leaders had been aware only of e-mails sent by Mr. Foley. Those e-mails reportedly did not include the sexually suggestive material contained in instant-message exchanges disclosed this week.

"There was nothing sexual in those [e-mails]. They had him counseled. They had the head of the page program, [Illinois Republican Rep. John] Shimkus, talk to [Mr. Foley] very directly. And I think they thought it was over," Mr. Gingrich said on "Fox News Sunday."

"The newest incident only surfaced when ABC News interviewed Foley, and he resigned within two hours, or I think the House leaders would have moved to expel him."

Mr. Hastert made a similar point in his letter last night to Florida's governor.

"As I am sure you are aware, there are two different and distinct communications at issue here," the House speaker wrote to Jeb Bush, in requesting an investigation of possible state law violations by Mr. Foley. Mr. Hastert distinguished between the "over-friendly" e-mails to one teenager and "sexually explicit instant messages which Mr. Foley reportedly sent another former page or pages."

FBI Looking Into Foley E-mail Scandal (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington And Agencies

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

The FBI is assessing whether Mark Foley, a six-term Florida Republican, broke any laws when he sent allegedly sexually explicit e-mails to a male teenage congressional page.

Leaders of both parties on Sunday demanded full-scale investigations into another untimely scandal for the Republicans.

Dennis Hastert, speaker of the House of Representatives, at the weekend sent a letter to Alberto Gonzales, the attorney general, requesting a Justice Department investigation of Mr Foley's conduct with current and former House pages.

"Since the communications involved interstate communications there should be a complete investigation and prosecution of federal laws that have been violated," Rep Hastert said on Sunday.

The Republican leader said his office had known for a year about what he called an "over-friendly" e-mail between Mr Foley - who resigned on Friday - and a 16-year-old male page, but had not been told about any sexually explicit content.

"I just cannot believe that they allowed this to happen and just told him, OK, stay away from this kid," Rep John Murtha of Pennsylvania said on ABC's "This Week." "It really makes me nervous that they looked like they tried to cover it up."

On Sunday, Democrats called for a full inquiry into the scanal as well as Republican leaders who kept the matter "under wraps."

Nancy Pelosi, House Democratic leader, said Republican leaders should be questioned under oath on how much they knew of Mr Foley's e-mails.

Harry Reid, Senate Democratic leader, said "the alleged crimes are far outside the scope of any congressional committee and the attorney general should open a full-scale investigation immediately,"

A scandal could weaken the Republicans ahead of next month's midterm election in which they could lose control of Congress.

The 52-year-old Foley was chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children, and the author of the key sexual predator provisions of the Adam Walsh Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006, which President George W. Bush signed in July.

House Republicans and the White House were clearly trying at the weekend to distance themselves from the scandal.

DOJ_NMG_0072736

Dan Bartlett, White House counselor, said he thought the House Republican leaders have been “very forthcoming” and that the White House learned of the matter “when the American people learned.”

Scandal In Congress: The Political Fallout Of Rep. Foley's Resignation (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON

The scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley (R) of Florida, who abruptly resigned his seat Friday, has engulfed the Republican leadership of the House of Representatives, adding an explosive issue to the pile of woes facing the GOP in its tough battle to retain control of Congress.

Mr. Foley quit Congress after he was confronted with evidence that he had sent sexually explicit electronic messages to former teenage House pages. Foley had already been accused earlier of sending what Republicans call "overfriendly" e-mails last year to another former page, a teenage boy from Louisiana. Members of the House GOP leadership acknowledge they knew about the less-explicit e-mails months ago and say they were handling the issue quietly, at the request of the boy's family.

Republican leaders say they did not know about the more-explicit messages until last week. But critics charge that at the first sign of possible trouble earlier this year, when the leaders learned of the e-mail traffic between Foley and the Louisiana boy, the GOP leadership should have acted more forcefully against Foley. Another black eye for GOP Adding to the black eye for the GOP, which calls itself the party of family values, is the fact that Foley had co-chaired the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, and had sponsored numerous bills aimed at protecting children from predators.

"It's a disaster" for the Republicans, says Larry Sabato, a political analyst at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. "This could be the tipping point," he adds, referring to the 15-seat net gain that Democrats need to win control of the House.

Not only will the Republicans have a hard time holding onto Foley's seat, the scandal may also endanger Rep. Tom Reynolds (R) of New York, head of the GOP's House campaign committee. Mr. Reynolds released a statement on Saturday saying he had been informed of the existence of the e-mails between Foley and the Louisiana boy by the House member for whom the boy had paged, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R) of Louisiana, but that he had not seen the e-mails in question.

"Mr. Alexander told me that the parents didn't want the matter pursued, and I told the speaker of the conversation Mr. Alexander had with me," Reynolds continued.

He also said Alexander took the matter to the clerk of the House, and that an investigation was conducted by the clerk and Rep. John Shimkus (R) of Illinois, head of the House Page Board. Pages are high school students who work for members of Congress and attend a special school on Capitol Hill. Inappropriate e-mails

After Alexander learned of the e-mail exchange between Foley and Alexander's former page, Foley was ordered to stop contacting the boy. The e-mails, while not overtly sexual, made the boy uncomfortable. In one, Foley asked the boy to send him a picture of himself and asked him what he wanted for his birthday. The teenager called the e-mails "sick."

While many of the other House members aware of the fall 2005 e-mails - including Alexander, speaker Dennis Hastert (R) of Illinois, and majority leader John Boehner (R) of Ohio - are not seen by political handicappers as endangered for reelection by the scandal, Reynolds may be different. Though holding a safe Republican seat in a normal election year, Reynolds could be hurt in a year where the top of the Republican ticket in New York - the candidates for governor and Senate - is weak this year, and could suppress GOP turnout in that state. The page scandal may suppress turnout further. Democratic Party response

The Democratic Party is reportedly considering a quick ad campaign focusing on family values. Of all the scandals hurting the Republicans this fall - three GOP members have already been indicted for corruption - the page scandal is the easiest to understand. Few issues grab voters with children more than a scandal involving a member of Congress and an underage child, and the appearance of a coverup.

In recent weeks, the Republicans' prospects for keeping control of the House appeared to have brightened somewhat, as Bush's job approvals had grown to 40 percent (still not high, but heading up) and the price of gas had declined.

DOJ_NMG_0072737

But the continuing bad news out of Iraq - plus stories on reporter Bob Woodward's new book, and the latest national intelligence estimate painting a negative picture on terrorism and Iraq - plays badly for the Republicans. And now the Foley scandal adds to the challenge.

"It has significant potential to add to the Republicans' already substantial woes," says nonpartisan political analyst Stu Rothenberg. "As this issue gets discussed, and people point fingers at one another ... it starts to look like they're not managing institution very well."

In Florida's 16th congressional district, GOP chairman Sid Dinerstein is not willing to concede defeat in the newly cast battle for the seat. On Monday, the executive board of the state GOP will meet to vote for a replacement for Foley on the ballot - expected to be popular state Rep. Joe Negron.

But Foley's name will remain on the ballot, and all votes cast for him will go to the new candidate. The local GOP will have to mount a major campaign to explain that to voters.

"It's gone from clearly being a safe seat to a seat where we're going to have to work very hard to win," says Mr. Dinerstein.

Former Pages Describe Foley As Caring Ally (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — In the hierarchy of Congress, the high school students who serve as Congressional pages fall somewhere near the bottom, seemingly invisible as they scurry through the hallways of the Capitol ferrying messages to powerful lawmakers who often fail to give them a second glance.

In that rarefied world, Representative Mark Foley, the silver-haired Republican from Florida, stood out.

He took pains to befriend the 16- and 17-year-old aides, several former pages said in interviews on Sunday. He chatted with them on the House floor, they said, sent handwritten notes and urged them to keep in touch when they left Washington for their hometowns.

In 2002, he even stood up on the floor of the House, his eyes welling with tears, and commended the young men and women for their year of service. In his speech, Mr. Foley mentioned several of the high school students by name, describing a handwritten note to celebrate one young man's graduation and a lunch with another at Morton's steak house.

Ashley Gallo, a 21-year-old former page who is now a senior at Western Michigan University, said on Sunday that many of her friends had viewed Mr. Foley as one of the few lawmakers who made a real effort to reach out to young people.

"You didn't have a lot of interaction with the members because most of them treated you like a kid, but he was pretty friendly," said Ms. Gallo, who served as a page in 2001. "He would talk to people," she said.

"He would say, 'Here's my e-mail address if you want to keep in touch.' I don't think anyone thought anything of it. They saw him as a mentor or a reference."

Mr. Foley's resignation on Friday, following the disclosure of his sexually explicit Internet and cellphone messages to pages, left many former pages shaken. And on Sunday, they burned up the phone lines and sent e-mail messages flying as they reached out to their old friends who remain tight-knit years after leaving Capitol Hill.

Patrick McDonald, 21, a senior at Ohio State University, said he took Mr. Foley up on his invitation to keep in touch and sent him an e-mail message asking about internship opportunities two years after he completed his work as a page in 2002. He said that he kept up a casual e-mail conversation — chatting about the 2004 presidential election, among other things — with Mr. Foley for several months and that it never became inappropriate.

"If a congressman was talking to you, it was the best thing in the world," Mr. McDonald said. "And he made himself known to the pages in the first couple of weeks, befriending us, asking us how we were doing. He was one of the cool congressmen. He was willing to chill out with us."

But despite Mr. Foley's warm demeanor, Mr. McDonald and another former page said they later became aware that the lawmaker might have a darker side. Mr. McDonald said he learned that Mr. Foley had sexually explicit Internet conversations with several pages who had left the program. "I was disgusted, but I was not surprised when these revelations started circulating," he said.

Congressional pages come to Washington from across the country, sponsored by their local senator or representative, in a highly competitive program that attracts thousands of applicants each year.

Many describe it as one of the most formative experiences of their lives, giving them a rare, insider's view of the inner workings of power. Former pages have set up alumni associations and message boards, and exchange e-mail messages and attend reunions to keep the memories of their days in Congress alive.

They describe living in an intensely supervised and sheltered world during their time in Washington. The 72 pages who serve in the House of Representatives are paid a stipend. They share rooms in a two-story, red brick dormitory just blocks from the Capitol and have a 10 p.m. curfew on weeknights and a midnight curfew on weekends.

Pages start classes at 6:45 a.m, and work in the House of Representatives later, answering telephones, delivering documents and running errands for lawmakers. Every night, the former pages said, the dormitory supervisors checked to make sure every page was there on time.

James Kotecki, 20, who was a page in the spring semester of 2003, said his orientation included a video on sexual harassment. He said he did not remember any formal rules against fraternization, however, and added that the young pages enjoyed the rare opportunities to socialize with the lawmakers. He said he met Mr. Foley only in passing, but remembered him as "a nice guy."

"Pages are kind of very, very low on the totem pole on the Hill," said Mr. Kotecki, now a senior at Georgetown University. "Anytime a member is nice it's fantastic because often members don't give pages the time of day."

Raymond Schillinger, 20, also a Georgetown student, echoed those thoughts. He worked for Mr. Foley this spring as an intern and said the congressman treated the young staff very well.

"He was very affable, always friendly with the staff, but never over friendly, nothing suggestive," Mr. Schillinger said.

Matthew Loraditch, who worked as a page with Ms. Gallo and Mr. McDonald in 2001 and 2002, said a supervisor had once casually mentioned that Mr. Foley "was odd" and that he later saw sexually explicit text messages that Mr. Foley had sent to two former pages after they left the program.

But Mr. Loraditch said he was never warned by program supervisors to stay away from him. "He was friendly," said Mr. Loraditch, who maintains a Web site for alumni and attends Towson University in Maryland. "He would talk to us more than some other members would."

To this day, Mr. Loraditch still remembers the speech Mr. Foley gave to the pages in 2002. The genial lawmaker stood on the floor of the House and noted that several pages were weeping as he spoke.

"You all have proven without a doubt that you are not only courageous Americans but wonderful young people," Mr. Foley said on June 6, 2002. "I salute you and I thank you, and I hope you will join me, too, in saluting everyone in the page program that has made this year a resounding, phenomenal learning experience and success for you. God bless you all."

Fla. Constituents 'disgusted' By Accusations Against Foley (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, October 2, 2006

LAKE WORTH, Fla. — Mark Foley's former constituents shifted their anger Sunday from the disgraced Republican to House GOP leaders, who knew for months about inappropriate e-mails between Foley and at least one teenage page.

Foley resigned Friday after being questioned by ABC News about alleged sexually explicit instant messages. A day earlier, the network reported that Foley sent e-mails to a 16-year-old boy, a former page.

The content of the e-mails and instant messages have not been independently verified by USA TODAY. Foley did not refer to them when he resigned but said he was "deeply sorry."

On Sunday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., called on the Justice Department and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to investigate.

Foley's former constituents in the 16th Congressional District called Sunday on House GOP leaders to step down. "It's no longer a party of one. It's a party of many," said Sondra Stateman, 45, a health care administrator from West Boynton. "They should resign, too."

DOJ_NMG_0072739

Beverly Pepe, 67, of Lake Worth, drew a comparison to the Roman Catholic Church's scandals. “That's the same as when the church knew about all those priests molesting the boys, and they just kept moving them from church to church,” she said.

Florida Republican leaders postponed until Tuesday a vote to name a replacement for Foley because of the Yom Kippur religious holiday.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the House Democratic campaign committee, said Democratic nominee Tim Mahoney will be moved to the group's “red to blue” list of candidates considered strong enough to take GOP-held seats. That means Mahoney will get the committee's financial and strategic support.

Under Florida election laws, Foley's name must remain on the ballot. The party can replace him with another candidate, but voters must punch in Foley's name if they want to vote for that replacement.

Even Republicans recognize how hard that will be for some. “It's not an impossible task but certainly a daunting challenge,” said Carl Domino, a state representative. “How is anyone going to be able to get people to punch ‘Mark Foley’?”

Lorelle Haynes, a lifelong Republican who voted for Foley, predicted fellow Republican voters cannot be convinced that a vote for Foley really is not. “They'll be disgusted.”

Haynes' comments were echoed throughout Foley's former district, a collection of counties that stretches from Stuart on the east coast to Port Charlotte on the west.

Deborah Garson is a lifelong Democrat but said she had respected Foley since his days on the Lake Worth city commission.

“But it's very upsetting to me, being a mother and a grandmother, that he would do this,” she said. “There's just no excuse for that.”

Among the churches Foley would visit in his district was New Macedonia Missionary Baptist Church, where Bishop Thomas Masters struggled to explain his feelings. “People come to the church with all kinds of situations going on in their lives: suicides, drug addictions, all kinds of sin,” Masters said, explaining that he tries to help people confess and embrace religion. After pausing, he added: “Sometimes that happens, and sometimes it doesn't.”

Hastert Requests Criminal Probe Of Foley (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 2, 2006

House Speaker Dennis Hastert requested Sunday that the Justice Department conduct an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's electronic messages to teenage boys — a lurid scandal that has put House Republicans in political peril.

"As Speaker of the House, I hereby request that the Department of Justice conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated federal law," Hastert, R-Ill., wrote in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The White House and Democratic leaders in Congress also called Sunday for a criminal probe. White House counselor Dan Bartlett called the allegations against Foley shocking, but said President Bush hadn't learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a 16-year-old boy and instant messages to other boys before the news broke last week.

"There is going to be, I'm sure, a criminal investigation into the particulars of this case," Bartlett said. "We need to make sure that the page system is one in which children come up here and can work and make sure that they are protected."

Foley, R-Fla., quit Congress on Friday after the disclosure of the e-mails he sent to a former congressional page and sexually suggestive instant messages he sent to other high school pages.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada called the Foley case "repugnant, but equally as bad is the possibility that Republican leaders in the House of Representatives knew there was a problem and ignored it to preserve a congressional seat this election year."

Reid said the case should be handled outside Congress.

"Under laws that Congressman Foley helped write, soliciting sex from a minor online is a federal crime," Reid said. "The alleged crimes here are far outside the scope of any congressional committee, and the attorney general should open a full-scale investigation immediately."

DOJ_NMG_0072740

In his letter to Gonzales on Sunday, Hastert asked the Justice Department to investigate "who had specific knowledge of the content of any sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any former or current House pages and what actions such individuals took, if any, to provide them to law enforcement."

The scope of the investigation, Hastert wrote, should include "any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert also sent a letter to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush on Sunday requesting that he "direct the Florida Department of Law Enforcement to conduct an investigation of Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages."

Hastert maintained at first that he had learned only last week about the e-mails. But Rep. Thomas Reynolds, head of the House Republican election effort, said Saturday he had told Hastert months ago about concerns Foley sent inappropriate messages to a teenage boy. Reynolds, R-N.Y., is under attack from Democrats who say he did too little to protect the boy.

Hastert acknowledged over the weekend that his aides had, in fact, referred the matter to the House clerk and to the congressman who was chairman of the board that oversees the page program. Hastert's office said, however, it had not known the e-mails were anything more than "over-friendly."

Majority Republicans engineered a House vote Friday that refers the Foley matter to the House ethics committee, but lets that panel decide whether there should even be an investigation.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the House Democratic leader, pressed the committee on Sunday to begin investigating and make a preliminary report within 10 days. She demanded to know who knew of the messages, whether Foley had other contacts with pages and when the Republican leadership was notified of Foley's conduct.

"Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," she wrote.

Congressional pages, a staple of Washington politics since the 1820s, are high school students who serve as temporary gofers in the House and Senate. The program nearly ended in the early 1980s due to alleged sexual misconduct and drug use.

Republican leaders say it is their duty to ensure House pages' safety, and are now creating a toll-free hot line for pages and their families to call to confidentially report any incidents. They also will consider adopting new rules on communications between lawmakers and pages.

House Democrats said that wasn't enough.

"This should be investigated objectively. I think the Democratic leadership should have been told 10 months ago," said Rep. Jane Harman of California, top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee. "I gather that basically nothing was done except that Foley was warned."

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., said the House ethics committee should conclude its work on the Foley case before the November elections, so that voters can "hold people accountable." Doing so, he said, might help restore public confidence, since already "the reputation of Congress under the Republican leadership is lower than used car salesmen."

Foley, who is 52 and single, was co-chairman of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus. In a statement Friday, he said, "I am deeply sorry and I apologize for letting down my family and the people of Florida I have had the privilege to represent."

Harman was on "Fox News Sunday," Murtha appeared on ABC's "This Week" and Bartlett spoke on ABC's "This Week, CNN's "Late Edition" and CBS' "Face the Nation."

The Wrong Message (NSWK)

By Evan Thomas And Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

Mark Foley, a six-term Republican congressman from Florida, championed the protection of children from sexual predators. Chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children, he often spoke out about the need to catch pedophiles. In July, he attended a signing ceremony at the White House for the Child Protection and Safety Act of 2006. "We track library books better than we do sexual predators," he had argued in support of the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0072741

It took some time, but last week Foley himself was tracked down. Confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit messages he had exchanged with 16- and 17-year-old congressional pages, Foley abruptly resigned his seat. (He did not protest his innocence; whether he committed a crime is unclear.) Politicians and preachers crusading against sin while sinning themselves is an old morality play. But the politics of Foley's downfall are messy and intriguing, coming just weeks before hotly contested congressional elections. The Democrats accused the Republicans of trying to cover up Foley's indiscretions until after Election Day, while the Republicans accused the Democrats of leaking the story just in time to cost the GOP a crucial seat.

An energetic, capable politician, Foley appeared to be well matched to his prosperous Palm Beach district. His sexuality did not seem to be an issue with voters. In Washington he made little effort to hide his sexual orientation, and neither his colleagues nor his staff seemed to worry that he might be a predator. Gregarious and fun-loving, he was known for hosting raucous parties and making off-color jokes. "All of his colleagues knew" that Foley was gay, said a former aide, who asked for anonymity discussing Foley's personal life. "It was the worst-kept secret in Washington."

Radical gay groups sometimes "out" closeted right-wingers, but Foley was insulated against charges of hypocrisy because he voted against a congressional ban on gay marriage. (Last week Democrats were careful to say that the issue was not his sexuality but potentially criminal behavior toward minors.) Foley's sexuality may have inhibited his political ambitions, however. In 2003, he briefly ran for the Senate before dropping out, against the urgings of some party leaders who wanted him to stay in the race. He held a press conference to denounce rumors that he was gay, without confirming or denying them.

Foley's sexual leanings were also well known, or at least suspected, by a particularly vulnerable group on Capitol Hill. Every year Congress hires about 100 pages, who can be seen in their distinctive blue uniforms scurrying through the halls, running errands for lawmakers. The pages have been embroiled in earlier sex scandals. In 1983, a pair of congressmen admitted to sexual relations with underage pages (one with a girl, one with a boy). After that, the pages were housed in a dormitory and fairly closely chaperoned. A former female page, who asked not to be identified to protect her privacy, told NEWSWEEK that she and other pages had regularly seen Foley stop and talk to pages on the House floor and in the cloakroom, lingering with them and asking them to describe their experiences in Congress. "We just gradually figured out he was flirting with the guys," said the page. "It made a lot of the guys uneasy. He was kind of creepy."

In late 2005, one of the pages, a young man from Louisiana, went to an aide to his congressman, Rodney Alexander. The page had received some e-mails from Foley that, the boy said, "freaked me out." Alexander went to Republican Party leaders, and Foley was summoned to see GOP Congressman John Shimkus, the chairman of the House Page Board. The e-mails between Foley and the page were subject to interpretation—Foley had asked for a photograph of the boy, talked about going to the gym and asked if he was OK after Hurricane Katrina. Foley insisted that he was acting only as the boy's "mentor." Shimkus warned Foley to be "especially mindful of his conduct" with the pages. The boy's parents did not want to pursue the matter.

That might have been the end of it, but rumors and copies of the messages began to rattle around newsrooms in Florida and Washington, possibly fed by Foley's political opponents. Last Thursday night ABC News broke the story. That seemed to open the Internet floodgates. The next night ABC posted a follow-up on its Web site, showing instant messages between Foley and congressional pages that were far more sexually explicit. Many more, and much seamier, message exchanges began to pour in to ABC. Some were mildly crude. "Do I make you a little horny?" Foley is said to have asked one page. Others show Foley, under the signer Maf54, engaged in graphic Internet sex with minors, ABC reported. During one session a page instant-messages Maf54, "brb [be right back] ... my mom is yelling." ABC confronted Foley with a batch of these messages, and within hours he had penned a one-sentence resignation note. Foley issued a statement saying that he was "deeply sorry" for letting down his family and the voters, but made no reference to any e-mails. It is not known if he is under any kind of criminal investigation.

The politics heated up right away. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi took the floor to demand an investigation. Her Democratic colleagues instantly began agitating to know what the Republican leadership had known about Foley and when it had known it. The GOP leadership did not help its cause by putting out garbled or conflicting accounts, though there was no proof of any kind of deliberate cover-up. Late Saturday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner and Majority Whip Roy Blunt issued a statement calling for a criminal investigation. But some Republicans were also curious about the timing of the revelations. Foley's district is strongly Republican, but he had faced a serious challenger, Tim Mahoney. The GOP can pick a new candidate, but it may be too late to get Foley's name off the ballot, which could cost the Republicans a seat. The struggle for control of the House may be so close, with a 15-seat swing hanging in the balance, that a single seat can make a real difference.

While congressmen caught in a sex scandal is nothing new, the way the story broke shows the power of Web technology to influence politics. Few people may have even been aware that instant messages can be saved and copied, but they have turned out to be a powerful weapon. Before the Internet, a story like Foley's might have kicked around for months, with conflicting accounts, and possibly never surfaced. Once the existence of the e-mails became known, Foley was swept away within hours.

Democrats See A Chance To Turn The Tables (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 1 — In their efforts to keep their party in power, Republican leaders have not hesitated to hit the Democrats hard when it comes to the issue of protecting children.

The strategy was on display in Indiana, where the National Republican Congressional Committee recently ran a series of television spots showing a man accused of child molesting who was inadvertently released under the watch of Brad Ellsworth, a county sheriff and a Democratic candidate for Congress.

Now, Democrats are suddenly seeing an opportunity to turn the tables, questioning the actions of Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, the chairman of the Congressional committee, and other top Republicans who have acknowledged that they had been aware for months of e-mail exchanges between Representative Mark Foley, a Florida Republican, and a former teenage page.

In a statement issued over the weekend, Mr. Reynolds said that when he first learned of the issue, he personally brought it to the attention of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. Republican leaders have described the e-mail messages that initially came to their attention as "over-friendly" and said that they were not sexually explicit, like the messages between Mr. Foley and other pages that were disclosed later.

But Democrats are accusing Republican leaders of keeping silent about Mr. Foley and allowing him to remain as chairman of the House Caucus on Missing and Exploited Children until the disclosure on Friday of the more sexually explicit e-mail messages. Carl Forti, a spokesman for Mr. Reynolds, defended the actions of Republicans, emphasizing that there was nothing overtly sexual about the e-mail messages they had initially seen. He also defended the advertisements sponsored by the Republican House campaign committee.

The Democrats, Mr. Forti said, are "trying to take advantage of a very tragic and wrong situation."

After years of defending themselves against Republican charges that they are soft on crime and generally out of step with the nation's values, Democrats are criticizing Republicans on one of their core issues. While commercials and mailings attacking Democrats as weak on issues like child protection appear to occur only sporadically, Democrats contend that it is a tactic that Republicans fall back on regularly.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said concerns about the Republican leadership's handling of the accusations made their campaign attacks on Democrats seem hypocritical.

Not all rank-and-file Republicans have been happy with the efforts of party strategists to feature the issue of sexual predator legislation in campaign commercials.

In a closely watched race to fill a Congressional vacancy in San Diego this past June, the Republican candidate, Brian P. Bilbray, protested when the National Republican Congressional Committee ran an advertisement attacking the Democratic candidate, Francine Busby, a local school board member, for praising an elementary school teacher who was subsequently accused of trying to obtain child pornography.

The advertisement grew out of a newspaper article in 2004, when Ms. Busby was asked her reaction to reports that an elementary school teacher in her district had been arrested for trying to obtain child pornography. Ms. Busby said she was stunned and noted that she had always found the teacher to be dedicated and supportive of his students.

After the spot began running, Mr. Bilbray expressed displeasure with it and, referring to national Republicans, said he "would sure prefer that they keep the message positive."

In 2004, protecting children against lurking threats was a theme with the Republican House committee running advertisements against several Democratic candidates in Texas, Kansas and Indiana, accusing them of being out of step with "family values" because the candidates would "allow the sale of violent and sexually explicit video games and movies to our children."

That theme has resurfaced this year. In the contest for Nevada's Third Congressional District seat, the Republican incumbent, Representative Jon Porter, is running a spot that notes his work to crack down on pedophiles.

"As parents, we need to know that our schools are not hiring teachers that are sexual predators," Mr. Porter says in the advertisement, which was paid for in part by the Congressional committee. "That's why I wrote a law in Congress that gives our local school districts the information they need to ensure that sexual predators are not teaching our children."

And in mailings sent in recent months to voters in Pennsylvania's Eighth Congressional District, the Republican incumbent, Representative Michael G. Fitzpatrick, criticized the Democratic challenger, Patrick Murphy, who had raised objections to legislation seeking to protect children from online predators that Mr. Fitzpatrick proposed. Democrats said Mr. Fitzpatrick distorted the position of Mr. Murphy, who they said did not believe Mr. Fitzpatrick's measure went far enough.

Since the revelations of Mr. Foley's behavior, Democrats have been particularly forceful in singling out Mr. Reynolds, whom they see as an architect of Republican attacks against them. Mr Reynolds is facing a challenge from Jack Davis, a wealthy businessman who has vowed to spend at least $2 million of his own money in the contest and whose campaign has seized upon the Foley episode to attack Mr. Reynolds.

FBI To Look At Foley's Actions (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — As pressure mounted on Republicans over their handling of the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley, the FBI said Sunday that it had begun a preliminary inquiry to determine whether the disgraced Florida lawmaker had violated federal law by sending sexually explicit instant messages to at least one teenager who had served as a congressional page.

The FBI's brief statement confirming the inquiry came shortly after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) sent a letter to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales asking the Justice Department to examine "Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated federal law."

Hastert — who has been battling accusations that House Republicans inadequately handled concerns that Foley had sent inappropriate though not overtly sexual e-mails last year to another former page — also asked Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to see whether state laws had been broken.

But the Republicans' effort to distance the party from Foley may be complicated by his close ties with the party's campaign operation.

Foley's longtime chief of staff is now a senior aide to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee is leading the effort to maintain the GOP majority in the House. In addition, Foley's campaign committee gave $100,000 to the NRCC this summer, campaign finance records show.

Seizing on the campaign donation, which put Foley among the GOP committee's bigger donors, the Democratic National Committee stepped up its accusations that Reynolds and other Republican leaders were more interested in protecting Foley than investigating potential misconduct.

"Why did Republican congressional leaders choose not to ask the critical questions about the nature and full extent of Congressman Foley's criminal actions involving minors at the time they first learned about it?" Democratic Party Communications Director Karen Finney said Sunday.

Foley, a six-term Republican who was co-chair of the Congressional Missing and Exploited Children's Caucus, resigned his seat Friday after ABC News questioned him about the sexually explicit instant messages he reportedly sent three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0072744

House Republican leaders have been under pressure since then to explain what they knew about Foley's behavior and when they knew it. They acknowledged Saturday that they had known for some time of Foley's "over-friendly" e-mails, sent to a 16-year-old Louisiana boy, but said they had not known of the sexually explicit earlier messages before last week.

In the fall of 2005, the 16-year-old, who had finished a term as a page that year sponsored by Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), complained to a staffer in Alexander's office after receiving a series of e-mails from Foley. In them, the congressman asked for a photo and talked to the teenager about another boy being "in great shape."

After hearing from the teen and his parents, Alexander's staffers discussed their concerns with their counterparts in Hastert's office. As a result, the House clerk and the congressman in charge of the House Page Board met with Foley, who told them that his relationship with the boy was that of a mentor. They instructed him to cease his contacts with the boy.

Earlier this year, Alexander also discussed the matter with Reynolds and with House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). Reynolds has said that he discussed it with Hastert, though the House speaker has said he has no recollection of the conversation but has no reason to doubt Reynolds.

In his letter to Gonzales, released several hours after Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) had demanded a Justice Department investigation, Hastert said the House clerk and the head of the Page Board had believed their private meeting with Foley "resolved the situation."

But the revelation of the sexually explicit instant messages — sent, Hastert said, to "another former page or pages" — warranted criminal referral for two reasons: to determine whether Foley had violated federal laws on interstate communications, and to discover whether "there are persons who knew or had possession of these messages but did not report them to the appropriate authorities."

Given that the instant messages were sent in 2003, Hastert said, "I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress."

Hastert's efforts did not quell the political storm gathering around the GOP, however.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) on Sunday called on GOP House leaders to explain their actions under oath before the House Ethics Committee.

The Democratic National Committee noted Sunday that Foley's contribution, which the NRCC reported receiving on Aug. 7, came after Reynolds had acknowledged having learned about the Louisiana page's complaint.

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the campaign donation had no impact on how Reynolds handled the matter, explaining that Reynolds told Hastert about the problem as soon as he learned about the e-mails.

"This is nothing more than pure politics at its worst," Forti said, dismissing the Democratic charge that Reynolds should have done more.

"Even to insinuate that is ridiculous."

Forti said Reynolds had not known about the explicit instant messages, in which Foley discussed sexual matters with at least one other former page.

But Reynolds did work closely with someone who knew Foley well.

Kirk Fordham, a veteran Republican legislative staffer who has worked on Capitol Hill for much of the last 17 years, served as Foley's chief of staff from 1995 to 2004. Fordham also managed Foley's first campaign for Congress, in 1994.

In 2005, Fordham went to work for DCI Group, a leading GOP political strategy group. The same year, he became Reynolds' chief of staff.

Fordham could not be reached for comment Sunday.

Forti said Sunday he did not know whether Reynolds and Fordham had discussed Foley after Reynolds was told of the page's complaint.

FBI Begins Look At Foley's Contact With Teens (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - The FBI is looking at whether former Florida Rep. Mark Foley's computer exchanges with underage House pages broke any laws, an FBI spokesman said late Sunday.

The agency is "conducting an assessment to determine if there has been any violation of federal law," the FBI's Stephen Kodak said.

Under fire from Democrats, House Speaker Dennis Hastert also asked Sunday that U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales -- and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement -- look into the case.

On Friday ABC News had released a series of sexually explicit instant messaging sessions between Foley and what it said were underage pages -- high schoolers who serve as messengers in the House and Senate.

Hastert's letters to Gonzales and Gov. Jeb Bush say the sexually explicit instant messages between Foley and pages ``warrant a criminal referral."

Hastert notes the messages were "reportedly generated three years ago" and "it is important to know who may have had the communications and why they were not given to prosecutors before now. ``I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter -- be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress," he wrote.

His letter drew a sharp distinction between the instant messaging sessions -- which Hastert said he was never made aware of -- and e-mails between Foley and a former House page, which top GOP leaders saw in 2005. Foley was told to cease contact with the page. Hastert noted that the same e-mails were viewed by editors at The St. Petersburg Times, which reviewed them, considered them "friendly chit chat" and declined to run a story.

Miami Herald Executive Editor Tom Fiedler said Sunday the newspaper also saw the same e-mails and ``didn't feel there was sufficient clarity in the e-mails to warrant a story.

"We determined after discussion among several senior editors, including myself, that the content of the messages was too ambiguous to lead to a news story," Fiedler said.

The call for a criminal investigation came as Democrats signaled that they plan to use the Republican House leaders' response to reports of the e-mails sent by Foley as an issue in the pivotal November election.

Foley, a Palm Beach County Republican, gave no reason for leaving but said he was "deeply sorry" and resigned Friday after the subsequent, sexually explicit instant messages were disclosed by ABC News.

Earlier Sunday, Democrats in both chambers, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California, called for investigations. Democrats also seized on Ohio Republican Sen. Mike DeWine's reluctance at a televised debate Sunday to say that House leaders who knew about the e-mails Foley sent to the 16-year-old House page should resign immediately.

DeWine decried Foley's behavior and called for a "full investigation," but declined to say that House leadership step down if they knew about the e-mails.

"I think you have to look and see what they knew and what they did about it," DeWine said during the debate on NBC's Meet the Press. ``I would want to know what they did about it. And, you know, this is reprehensible."

Minutes after the debate ended between DeWine and Democratic Rep. Sherrod Brown, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent out a press release saying DeWine ``refuses to hold GOP leaders accountable over the Foley scandal."

Over the weekend Republicans sought to defend their handling of the matter, with Hastert providing what his office called a "preliminary" report of when House leaders were alerted to the situation and how they handled it.

Hastert's office said Saturday his office was contacted last fall by a staff member in the office of Louisiana Republican Rep. Rodney Alexander, where the page once worked. The boy said in an e-mail to Alexander's office that the computer exchange with Foley "freaked him out" and was ``sick . . . sick . . . sick."

Hastert's office said the clerk of the House was assured the nature of the exchange was not of a sexual nature, although it was characterized as "overly friendly." The e-mails are chatty and at one point Foley asks the teen to send him a ``pic."

The House clerk and Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., head of the page board, asked Foley about the e-mail and told Foley to ``immediately cease any communication with the young man."

Hastert's office underscored that he did not know of the sexually explicit instant messages until ABC News posted them on its website Friday. "In fact, no one was ever made aware of any sexually explicit e-mail or text messages at any time," Hastert's office said.

The scandal comes just a month before the GOP tries to hold onto its majority in the House and Senate in the wake of an increasingly unpopular war in Iraq and declining poll numbers for the Republican-led Congress that gave President Bush the go-ahead.

White House special counsel Dan Bartlett said the Bush administration didn't know anything about the Foley matter until it broke open Friday.

"We're going to get to the bottom of this, the leadership is, and that's very important because we need to make sure the page system is one in which children can come up here and work and make sure they are protected," Bartlett said on CNN's Late Edition.

FBI Launches Foley Investigation (ST)

SPTimes, October 2, 2006

FBI launches Foley investigation The House speaker also calls for inquiries by the Department of Justice and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. By ANITA KUMAR, Times Staff Writer

Published October 1, 2006

WASHINGTON — The FBI said Sunday that it had launched an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit Internet communications with teenage boys.

The announcement came after House Speaker Dennis Hastert called for criminal inquiries by both the Department of Justice and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement.

In letters sent Sunday to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Hastert asked for an investigation into "Mr. Foley's conduct with current and former House pages to determine to what extent any of his actions violated … law."

Foley, 52, a Republican from the West Palm Beach area, abruptly resigned Friday after the public disclosure of e-mails and instant messages between him and former congressional pages that Hastert now says went back at least three years.

The scandal has left House Republican leaders fending off charges that they knew about Foley's behavior for months but failed to disclose it.

It comes just weeks before the critical midterm election in which Democrats have their best chance in a dozen years to take control of the House.

Democratic leaders praised the federal inquiry but continued to call for a separate investigation by the House Ethics Committee into what they are calling a Republican cover-up.

"Republican leaders have admitted to knowing about Mr. Foley's outrageous behavior for six months to a year, and they chose to cover it up rather than to protect these children," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said.

Several House leaders including Hastert, Majority Leader John Boehner and Rep. Tom Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee, have said in recent days that they knew for months about some of Foley's correspondence. They said they knew about one "over-friendly" e-mail exchange Foley had with a 16-year-old page from Louisiana but not the sexually explicit instant messages later publicized by ABC News.

To bolster his argument, Hastert refers to an editor's note published on the St. Petersburg Times Web site Saturday that explains that the newspaper received copies of some of the e-mails to the Louisiana page in November 2005, but characterized them as "friendly chit-chat" and chose not to print a story about them after speaking to Foley.

But on Sunday night, St. Peterburg Times editors rebutted his statements.

"The speaker is inaccurate. Our decision not to publish last fall was not based on an explanation from Rep. Foley,'' managing editor Stephen Buckley said.

"We didn't publish because the Louisiana teenager's parents did not want to pursue the issue, and because, despite our best efforts, we weren't able to track down any pages who had received inappropriate e-mails from the congressman. We didn't know about any sexually explicit exchanges between Rep. Foley and any former pages until the instant messages became public on Friday."

Hastert also asked federal and state authorities to look into "who had specific knowledge of the content of any sexually explicit communications between Mr. Foley and any former or current House pages and what actions such individuals took, if any, to provide them to law enforcement.

"I request that the scope of your investigation include any and all individuals who may have been aware of this matter — be they members of Congress, employees of the House of Representatives, or anyone outside the Congress," he wrote in his letter.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko confirmed Sunday night that the FBI is "conducting an assessment to see if there's been a violation of federal law."

Agents from the cyber division are looking into the text of the messages, how many e-mails were sent and which computers were used.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett called the allegations against Foley shocking, but said President Bush hadn't learned of Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a 16-year-old boy and instant messages to other boys before the news broke last week.

"We need to make sure that the page system is one in which children come up here and can work and make sure that they are protected," Bartlett said on a Sunday morning talk show.

Gov. Bush's communications director Alia Faraj said that FDLE had already been cooperating with FBI and federal officials before late Sunday and had been told to expect Hastert's letter.

"The FBI is lead and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement is coordinating," Faraj said. "If it becomes necessary for the state to have a separate investigation, we will do so at the appropriate time."

Laws Involving Contact With Minors Allow Prosecutors A Broad Range Of Discretion (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

The decision by Representative Mark Foley of Florida to resign after the disclosure of his sexually explicit e-mail and text messaging exchanges with Congressional pages has been followed by a flood of demands from his former Congressional colleagues — Republicans and Democrats alike — that he face "the full weight of the criminal justice system."

Legal experts consulted yesterday said that weight could be considerable.

Though the messages made public to date stopped short of soliciting sex or proposing an assignation, some were quite graphic and asked for descriptions of intimate actions. Several states, including Florida, have laws that make it a crime to transmit communication harmful to minors over the Internet.

In the past, legal experts said, prosecutors have exercised a great deal of discretion in deciding whether to pursue such cases. In the absence of physical contact, said Douglas A. Berman, a law professor at Ohio State University, some prosecutors reviewing e-mail messages like Mr. Foley's "could say, 'This is really gross, I need to take a shower,' but not charge" the sender with a crime.

But Professor Berman added, "There are cases in which people have done stuff that is not significantly worse and have had the book thrown at them."

Earlier this year, for instance, the Arizona Supreme Court upheld a 200-year sentence for a former Phoenix high school teacher convicted of possessing child pornography. The teacher, Morton R. Berger, was not charged with transmitting pornography or with having unlawful contact with minors.

Marjorie Heins, a fellow at the Brennan Center for Justice and the founder of the Free Expression Policy Project, said that prosecutors almost certainly had the legal tools to pursue Mr. Foley if they were inclined to do so.

"I wouldn't be surprised," Ms. Heins said, "if someone could get him criminally under a number of state laws, whether they involve the Internet or not, that prohibit unlawful contact with minors."

But legal experts cautioned that any case against Mr. Foley would involve difficult jurisdictional and constitutional questions. At least three jurisdictions may be implicated: Washington and Florida, where Mr. Foley worked; the federal system; and perhaps other states, as information about contacts with pages emerges.

DOJ_NMG_0072748

Courts have taken varying positions about whether they have the power to hear cases involving communications originating in other states. And laws regulating speech on the Internet have often faced First Amendment challenges.

A Florida law makes it a third-degree felony, punishable by up to five years in prison, to transmit "material harmful to minors by electronic device." The law defines the material broadly to include descriptions of "nudity, sexual conduct, or sexual excitement." There is an exception for materials with serious literary, artistic, scientific and political value. The e-mail messages disclosed to date appear to fail that test, though they may have serious political value in a different sense.

And Mr. Foley is not the only person who could possibly face prosecution, Professor Berman said. "If there were people who knew about him or protected him," he said, "some sort of complicity or conspiracy charge is certainly viable."

Federal prosecutors have issued a subpoena for copies of financial disclosure statements filed by Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican candidate for state attorney general, from 1998 to 2005, when she was the Westchester County district attorney, a person familiar with the subpoena said yesterday.

The request for the documents, which contain details of Ms. Pirro's personal finances, is the latest in a series of developments that have roiled her campaign. On Wednesday, Ms. Pirro disclosed that she was the subject of a federal investigation into whether she illegally recorded her husband's conversations on the family's boat last year to determine whether he was having an affair.

The New York Post, which reported on the subpoena yesterday, said it came from a federal grand jury in Manhattan.

A person familiar with the subpoena said yesterday that it was delivered late Friday afternoon to the Westchester County Board of Ethics and gave county officials until Wednesday to respond.

The subpoena asked for disclosure reports from 1998 to 2005 and for the instructions given to Ms. Pirro to use in filling out the reports, according to the person, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the highly politicized nature of the case.

The reports ask officials to disclose bank accounts, stock transactions, real estate holdings, memberships on corporate boards and significant stock ownership. It was not clear why the disclosure statements were being sought.

Paul Shechtman, Ms. Pirro's lawyer, said, "In my conversations with the government, they have given no indication that the investigation involves anything else than Jeanine's talking about eavesdropping."

He added, "The only thing that I can guess is that the financial disclosure statements are being sought to ascertain whether Jeanine claimed an ownership interest in the boat."

Ms. Pirro has acknowledged that she had private investigators follow her husband, Albert J. Pirro Jr., and that she spoke with Bernard B. Kerik, the former New York City police commissioner, about possibly taping Mr. Pirro. She has said she never carried out the idea.

Yesterday, Ms. Pirro attended a campaign rally and a Columbus Day parade on Staten Island, but did not take questions from reporters.

In a written statement released by her campaign, Ms. Pirro repeated her criticism of leaks that she said were intended to smear her campaign. She called again for the Justice Department to appoint a special prosecutor to review her case. And she lashed out again at Elliott B. Jacobson, an assistant United States attorney who Ms. Pirro says has a "partisan political agenda." Mr. Jacobson helped convict Ms. Pirro's husband of tax evasion in 2000; he served 11 months in prison.

"Today's leak to The New York Post really comes as no surprise," Ms. Pirro said in the statement. "As long as Elliott Jacobson remains at the head of this case, continuing leaks are unfortunately predictable. In fact, no one will be surprised if there are more leaks before the end of the week."

In calling for a special prosecutor, she added: "I know there is only one way this case will end; I will be cleared. The only question is whether I will be cleared before Election Day or after Election Day."

DOJ_NMG_0072749

Michael J. Garcia, who supervises Mr. Jacobson as the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York, said in a statement last week, "We do not take politics into account in deciding either the subject matter or timing of our investigations."

A spokesman for Mr. Garcia said in a statement yesterday: "Because the investigation is ongoing, we are not going to comment further. We stand by the statement we issued last Wednesday."

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department in Washington declined to comment on the matter yesterday.

Lobbyists: Sports Tickets And Springsteen—The E-Mail Trail (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Holly Bailey, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 2, 2006

The folks around Karl Rove are on the hot seat again. The White House has launched an internal ethics inquiry into one Rove aide in response to new e-mails showing that Rove's office had far more extensive conduct with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff than previously acknowledged. The e-mails, obtained by a House committee, show that Rove's executive assistant, Susan Ralston, may have violated a White House ban on accepting gifts worth more than $20 from lobbyists. At the same time, Ralston—who previously worked for Abramoff—was helping the lobbyist and his associates set up meetings with Rove and providing them with inside info about presidential appointments and White House decision making, including at least one matter relating to a business deal in Iraq for an Abramoff client, the e-mails show. Ralston also discussed future business opportunities with Abramoff, such as her plan to help him capitalize on the "rush to get lucrative government contracts" being awarded by the Department of Homeland Security—another possible breach of ethics rules.

The e-mails show Ralston peppering Abramoff with requests for small perks and favors. "Can we get the row A seats for the 12/22 Caps game?" she asked Abramoff in a Dec. 22, 2001, e-mail about an upcoming Washington Capitals hockey game. "Need 4 for O's on 8/23 and 4 for Springsteen if possible," she wrote the lobbyist on July 26, 2002. Ralston's lawyer declined to comment. A former associate said Ralston may argue that though she apparently never paid for any of the tickets, she did not violate the ethics rules because of an exemption for officials who have a "pre-existing" and personal relationship with the lobbyist. "She was not looking at [Abramoff] as a lobbyist," said the former associate, who asked not to be identified because of political sensitivities. "She was looking at him as a friend."

The e-mails show Rove's then chief political deputy, Ken Mehlman, now chairman of the Republican National Committee, had his own repeated contacts with Abramoff—in stark contrast to previous public statements. According to the new records, Abramoff and his associates turned to Mehlman in their bid to obtain $16.3 million in federal funds from the Justice Department to build a jail for the Mississippi Band of Choctaws, an Abramoff client. In one e-mail, Abramoff associate Tony Rudy described to Abramoff a meeting he had with Mehlman about the subject. "Mehlman said he would take care of this," Rudy wrote. "He was a rock star." After Justice later approved funding for the Choctaw jail, another Abramoff associate e-mailed a colleague: "Those guys should get anything they want for the rest of the time they're in office ... Opening Day tickets, Skins v. Giants, oriental massages, hookers, whatever ... " Mehlman denied any wrongdoing. "The job of the political director is to meet with interested parties—in some cases, political supporters—and hear them out," he said Friday. Of the events described in the report, Mehlman said, "It was all stuff that was aboveboard. All stuff that was appropriate." Rove himself apparently knew the rules: when Abramoff offered skybox tickets to an NCAA basketball game, he wrote a check for them.

Still, the game gave Abramoff a chance to discuss other matters with Rove. After being e-mailed by an old friend who was a militant Israeli settler, Abramoff responded: "I was sitting with Karl Rove, Bush's top advisor, at the NCAA basketball game, discussing Israel when [your] email came in. I showed it to him. It seems that the President was very sad to have to come out negatively regarding Israel but that they needed to mollify the Arabs for the upcoming war on Iraq. That did not seem to work anyway. Bush seems to love Sharon and Israel, and thinks Arabfat [sic] is nothing but a liar. I thought I'd pass that on."

Leveraging The Lobbyist Scandal (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, October 2, 2006

For a congressional candidate, a presidential visit during campaign season is a sought-after opportunity reserved for those who really need it. So midterm watchers were surprised to hear that President George W. Bush would travel to northeastern

DOJ_NMG_0072750

California this week to raise an estimated $500,000 for Republican incumbent Representative John Doolittle. Doolittle hasn't won less than 60% of the vote since 1992, and Republicans outnumber Democrats 48% to 30% in his district. So why spend valuable time and fund-raising muscle on a man who should be a sure thing? One simple answer: Jack Abramoff.

Conventional wisdom holds that the Abramoff lobbying scandal that engulfed Washington a year ago has fizzled. Nothing like the 60 court cases some predicted have materialized. Democrats, beset by their own ethics scandals in West Virginia and Louisiana, have all but abandoned attempts to nationalize corruption as an issue. Even last week's revelation that Abramoff had 82 contacts with Bush adviser Karl Rove registered barely a blip on the capital's political seismograph.

But the scandal did knock two powerful Republicans out of Congress over the past year, putting both their seats in play. At the same time, Democrats are finding that in a handful of districts like Doolittle's, their opponents' ties to Abramoff are helping them raise money and close poll numbers, forcing expensive countermeasures like the Bush visit. And with races tightening across the country, a handful of districts may be enough. The Abramoff factor has put up to five seats in play for Democrats in a contest in which 15 would give them control of the House.

One of the seats most likely to flip is that of former House majority leader Tom DeLay, who stepped down a year ago amid revelations of his ties to Abramoff. Although DeLay dropped out of his House race after the primary last April, it was too late to get his name off the ballot. Now the Democratic candidate Nick Lampson is the favorite of most oddsmakers to beat the late-starting G.O.P. write-in candidate Shelley Sekula-Gibbs. In southeastern Ohio, former House Administration Committee chairman Bob Ney is retiring after pleading guilty last month to trading favors for campaign contributions from Abramoff. But his handpicked replacement, Joy Padgett, can't shake the taint of scandal. Ney's solidly Republican district favored Bush by 14 percentage points in 2004 but is now polling anywhere from 2% to 14% in favor of Democrat Zack Space.

G.O.P. incumbents are safer, but some are still worried. In Arizona, Representative J.D. Hayworth is up against a popular local official, Harry Mitchell, whose first TV ad last week led with charges that Hayworth took $100,000 from Abramoff and his clients. "This guy's going to be all Abramoff all the time," says Hayworth. "But it's just not going to work." Or maybe it will. The Democrats claim Mitchell leads Hayworth by 3%, but the Republicans have Hayworth ahead by 14%.

As for Doolittle, his opponent Charlie Brown is a retired 26-year Air Force veteran whose campaign consists largely of charges that Doolittle and his wife, who worked for Abramoff, are lining their pockets at constituents' expense. Doolittle's spokesman Richard Robinson admits he faces a "tough challenge." All the same, Democrats in Washington at first paid Brown no attention. "They told me, 'We're only going to believe it if you can raise money in the district and if you do a poll that shows you're in the running,'" Brown says. He says he promptly raised $600,000 and commissioned a poll that showed him closing to within 2 points of Doolittle. Now Brown says the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has agreed to send him a check. He's still a long shot. But says Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report: "If it weren't for the Abramoff scandal, we wouldn't even be talking about these races."

BRONX BIGS IN PROBE (NYPOST)

By MURRAY WEISS And DAVID SEIFMAN

The New York Post, October 2, 2006

October 2, 2006 -- The feds are probing two Bronx political powerhouses and their roles in lucrative real-estate dealings in the borough, The Post has learned.

Sources said the FBI is investigating the dealings of Bronx Democratic leader José Rivera and Stanley Schlein, the longtime lawyer for the party and a well-known figure in local politics.

Schlein served as a lobbyist for the New York Yankees, which enlisted most of the city's political establishment, including Rivera, on its side to push through plans for a new $1 billion ballpark.

The federal probe doesn't currently include the new Yankee Stadium project, but sources said the deal likely will be examined.

About a month ago, an agent from the bureau's Public Corruption Unit quizzed Ellington Taylor, 62, who until his recent retirement had served as Rivera's driver for more than two decades.

Sources said a Manhattan federal grand jury has issued subpoenas for government and business records.

The sources wouldn't provide any other details.

Schlein expressed shock when contacted by The Post yesterday, saying there is no basis for an investigation.

"I'm absolutely befuddled," he said. "I'm at a complete loss."

Schlein said he's been involved in only two major Bronx land-use projects in recent years, both in well-documented public roles.

One was the Yankee Stadium deal. He said he also served as an unpaid advocate for the Bloomberg administration when it sought approval of a $1.5 billion water-filtration plant underneath Van Cortlandt Park, which Rivera also championed.

As part of the deal, The Bronx is receiving $240 million to renovate its parks.

After the FBI visited Taylor, Schlein said the driver called him and he contacted Rivera.

Rivera couldn't be reached for comment.

But Schlein said he and Rivera have no business relationship and Rivera is not involved with any developers.

FBI officials declined comment.

Rivera is a former city councilman whose son, Joel, now serves as the council majority leader and whose daughter, Naomi, is an assemblywoman from the borough.

Schlein has served as an adviser to a wide range of politicians, from Al Sharpton to Fernando Ferrer.

The Chaos Behind California Executions (LAT)

By Maura Dolan And Henry Weinstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

SAN JOSE — "Operational Procedure No. 770," the state's name for execution by lethal injection, is performed in a dark, cramped room by men and women who know little, if anything, about the deadly drugs they inject under extreme stress.

Thousands of pages of depositions and four days of testimony last week in a federal courtroom here provided the most intimate portrait yet of a state's lethal injection methods.

Witnesses depicted executions by lethal injection — long considered a more humane alternative to the gas chamber or the electric chair — as almost haphazard events, and medical experts on both sides could not rule out the possibility that one or more inmates had been conscious and experienced an excruciating sensation of drowning or strangulation before death.

Describing the pressure executioners feel and the surreal atmosphere in which they work, one executioner explained: "There's no other place in the world that you're asked to start an IV for that purpose."

U.S. District Court Judge Jeremy Fogel, who presided over the trial here, is now reviewing the testimony and records to determine if the state can continue to perform lethal injection executions or if it should revise procedures to ensure the condemned don't suffer cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Constitution. The litigation was brought by Michael Morales, condemned for the 1981 murder of Terri Winchell, 17, a high school student from Lodi.

Morales, like inmates in several other states who have also challenged lethal injection, claims prisoners may not be anesthetized properly before receiving a muscle-paralyzing drug that would mask any suffering before a third, heart-stopping chemical kills them. His witnesses insisted that trained medical personnel are needed to ensure a humane execution.

The testimony of dueling doctors and pharmacologists underscored the incongruity of using a medical procedure to produce a decidedly nonmedical result.

Witnesses for both sides stumbled when discussing the condemned, frequently referring to an inmate as "the patient."

Lawyers for the state defended the work of the executioners, stressing it was much less complicated than medicine. An execution, after all, is supposed to be punishment, the attorneys reminded the court.

When anesthesia is administered in a hospital setting, "you have two objectives — one to render the patient unconscious, and two, to make sure you don't kill him," said senior Assistant Atty. Gen. Dane Gillette, the lead lawyer for the state. "That is not at all the objective of a lethal injection execution."

All California executions take place at San Quentin prison north of San Francisco. The condemned is strapped on a gurney in a small, mint-green room that for decades served as the gas chamber.

After the IVs are set up, the chamber's heavy, solid steel door is shut and locked, and the inmate is left alone. A prison employee leans into the door to seal it, an apparent holdover from the days when the prison had to ensure toxic gas would not escape.

The execution team retires to an adjacent room, where members insert the execution drugs by syringe into IV lines that run through the wall and into the inmate's arms.

That anteroom is often packed with state officials, prosecutors and other government visitors. There were "so many people in that room you didn't even know who they were" and why they were there, Dr. Donald Calvo, a prison doctor, testified in a deposition.

Former San Quentin Warden Steven W. Ornoski said that during one execution, "I don't believe I could move from my spot much, if any." He once had to tell someone to leave. It was a doctor.

A nurse working in the jammed room said she had to pass syringes to an outstretched hand whose owner she could not see. The same nurse said she did not know the origins of a document with instructions for the drugs. She had simply found it "in the gas chamber."

To prevent the executioners from being seen or identified by witnesses, their room is illuminated only by a red light. A doctor who filled out execution records said the room was so dark he had to use a flashlight to see what he was writing.

The IV bags hang from ducts so high that it would be impossible to determine if everything was working properly, testified Dr. Mark Heath, a Columbia University anesthesiologist and expert witness for Morales. A member of the execution team said in a deposition that she believed "the janitor" helped set the bags.

The executioners are chosen from among a group of volunteer prison workers. Though several have had medical training as registered nurses, background screening appears to have been minimal.

A prison employee was chosen as team leader even though he had missed months of work and had been under care for post-traumatic stress caused, he said in his deposition, by "my years of working in the prison system." That executioner, who was taking antidepressants, also had been disciplined for a drunk driving conviction.

Testimony suggested lax oversight of the drugs issued at San Quentin for executions. A witness testified that bottles of the barbiturate anesthetic taken for practice sessions were not opened, but there was no evidence they were returned.

Fogel wanted to know whether the anesthetic could be used as a recreational drug. Witnesses for the state and Morales disagreed.

Lawyers testified about witnessing executions, one in California and the others in North Carolina, which has a lethal injection procedure similar to California's.

Heather Jarvis recalled watching North Carolina capital prisoner Edward Hartman, 38, wheeled into the execution chamber on a gurney, covered from neck to toe by a white sheet.

"I saw Eddie's eyes close, and I thought to myself, 'Here we go. This is it.' Almost immediately his eyes opened again, not fully, more than halfway up but not completely. His eyes remained open for the entire execution."

She said his throat began to throb and pulsate like a lizard's, and his chest heaved and strained so violently she thought he would fall off the gurney.

"Then he became still, and his eyes finally did close."

After reviewing evidence about lethal injection, Fogel earlier this year ordered California to either have a doctor present at executions or instead give the inmate only a massive, fatal dose of anesthesia without the other drugs.

The state chose to go with the doctor option, hiring two anesthesiologists but assuring them they would be mere observers.

Dr. Robert Singler, a Napa anesthesiologist, reluctantly agreed to join the team at the request of a friend, Darc Keller, who works for the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. Singler testified in court that he believed the state's methods would ensure a humane execution.

The other doctor, identified as "Anesthesiologist 2," was to play a lesser role. He said in a deposition he agreed to be present only after he was assured he would have "nothing" to do.

"What do you mean by 'nothing'?" he said he asked.

"You would have no responsibilities," he quoted Keller as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0072753

Anesthesiologist 2 said he even received permission from the warden to stand in a room off the anteroom during the execution so he would not have to watch it.

On the night Morales was to die, the two anesthesiologists learned that an appeals court had ruled they would have to intervene if problems arose during the execution. Both Singler and Anesthesiologist 2 refused, saying they were bound by the physician's obligation to do no harm.

Morales, who had been stripped of his possessions and moved to a special cell, learned several hours later that his appointment for Operational Procedure No. 770 had been postponed.

GRAND-MA THEFT (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, October 2, 2006

September 30, 2006 -- The feds busted seven members of a Lower Manhattan boiler-room operation that allegedly raked in $6.7 million in just six months - bilking many elderly victims out of their life savings.

The FBI rousted the alleged scammers from their beds early yesterday morning, charging them with wire and mail fraud for cold-calling victims and using high-pressure tactics to squeeze cash out of 230 investors in a foreign currency scam from 2002 to 2003.

In convincing potential investors to cough up their cash, the cold-callers - operating out of the fraudulent firm Holston, Young, Parker and Assoc. at 130 William St. - falsely claimed their client lists included CEOs of Fortune 500 companies and numerous celebrities.

A total of 11 ring members were charged in an indictment unsealed in Manhattan federal court, including Boris Shuster, 34, Larry Shuster, Alexander Dzedets, 31, and Victor Altman, 38, Boris Tager, David Lozovsky, Adam Lichtenbaum, Edward Sharov, and Vincent Armato, who allegedly operated and managed Holston as a boiler-room operation.

Victims throughout the U.S. initially received bogus monthly financial statements reporting 5 percent growth on their investments over the first several months, according to Andrew Arena, chief of the FBI's criminal division in New York.

All the while, the alleged scam artists were secretly sending cash from the operation overseas to Cyprus and Russia.

After approximately six months, investors were sent letters saying that 90 percent of their money had been lost after a year of unprecedented market losses, authorities said.

"It was basically a flat-out boiler-room operation," Arena said. "Over a six month period, they were able to generate $6.7 million. They grab the money, close the company down and they're gone."

Seven men were arrested in New York yesterday and an eighth man was nabbed in Croatia.

"Unfortunately, by far the majority of victims in these scams turn out to be the elderly," Arena said. "They get confused. They fall for the hard sell. They invest their money."

The cold-callers used false names and lied about the company's history, claiming to manage $10 million to $30 million in clients' money.

Holston advertised itself as having offices in London, Zurich and Tokyo.

The wire and mail fraud charges carry a maximum sentence of 20 years.

IN BRIEF (NSDY)

By ROBERT E. KESSLER;SUSAN HARRIGAN

Long Island Newsday, September 30, 2006

FBI CHARGES MEN WITH FOREX FRAUD. FBI agents arrested seven men Friday, including four from Forest Hills, on charges of running a boiler-room scheme that defrauded 200 investors out of $6.5 million, officials said. An eighth defendant in the scheme, which promised high returns through currency exchange - the so-called Forex market - was arrested recently in Croatia, according to Michael Garcia, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District. The head of the FBI's New York Criminal Division, Andrew Arena, said some victims lost their life savings. Victims' money was not invested in the Forex market, but moved to accounts in Russia and Cyprus for the profit of the defendants, Arena said. The defendants operated from an office on William Street in Manhattan from 2002 to 2003, under the name of Holston, Young, Parker & Associates, officials said. Officials identified the leader as Boris Schuster, 34 - who also uses the name Robert Schuster - of Forest Hills. The seven were charged Friday morning with conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud. Federal officials said they are seeking the extradition from Croatia of the eighth, Alexander "Shasha" Dzedets, 31, a resident of Canada. - ROBERT E. KESSLER

FUEL PRICES REVIVE CONSUMERS. U.S. consumer spending slipped in August, but falling gasoline prices elevated shoppers' moods by September, according to reports Friday. Inflation-adjusted spending in August fell by 0.1 percent, the first decline since a 0.3 percent drop in September 2005, according to the U.S. Commerce Department. The University of Michigan's consumer sentiment index rose to 85.4 in September, up from 82.0 in August. Consumer prices outside food and energy rose 0.2 percent in August.

STATE BANCORP LOSES APPEAL. State Bancorp Inc. said Friday the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York denied its motion to overturn a January 2006 jury verdict that the company has said could cost it $44 million dollars after taxes. The New Hyde Park-based holding company for State Bank of Long Island said it is "fully reserved" for the matter and plans to appeal the decision to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. - SUSAN HARRIGAN

Con Men Held In Boiler-room Scheme (BOS/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, October 2, 2006

NEW YORK --A team of con men posing as senior vice presidents of an international Wall Street investment firm cheated about 230 people nationwide out of more than $6.5 million, authorities said Friday.

Seven suspects were awaiting arraignment in federal court in Manhattan on mail and wire fraud charges after being arrested at their homes early Friday by the FBI. Another suspect was in custody in Croatia; three were at large.

One of the men was wearing a Curious George T-shirt as FBI agents led him to court in handcuffs.

Many victims were elderly people who "fell for the hard sell," said Andrew Arena, head of the criminal division of the FBI's New York office. Some lost their life savings.

The phony firm of Holston, Young, Parker & Associates had an actual lower Manhattan address, but also claimed to have offices in London, Zurich and Tokyo that didn't exist, an indictment said.

In 2002 and 2003, the defendants, most of Russian descent, operated "a 'boiler room' with Holston cold-callers and brokers making numerous unsolicited telephone calls on a daily basis and using high-pressure tactics," the court papers said. The victims were told their money would be pooled to make large trades on the foreign currency exchange market.

The callers used false names and identified themselves as senior vice presidents to dupe potential investors into thinking they were speaking to "a senior level, experienced employee," the indictment said. One defendant falsely claimed that the firm's clients included celebrities and CEOs of Fortune 500 companies.

Investors initially got bimonthly statements showing 5 percent increases in their investments, unaware most of their money was being diverted to bank accounts in Russian and Cyprus, the FBI said. By the time a final statement arrived showing 90 percent losses, the suspects had closed their doors.

According to the indictment, the unidentified victims included a resident of El Reno, Okla., who invested $1,000; one from Conneaut, Ohio, who invested $5,000; and another from Williamsburg, Va., who invested $10,000.

If convicted, the defendants face up to 20 years in prison.

888 Poised To Suspend US Business (FT)

By Roger Blitz In London

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

888 Holdings, one of the biggest companies in the $12bn online gambling industry, is expected to suspend indefinitely business from US customers on Monday.

The move comes as the sector braces itself for a massive reaction from investors to the dramatic US decision to tighten its anti-gambling laws. People close to 888 said they believed the company would issue a statement to the London Stock Exchange accepting that the passing of the bill in the US Senate on Friday would have a “material” detrimental impact on its business.

DOJ_NMG_0072755

The bill prohibits US gamblers from using credit cards, cheques and electronic fund transfers to make online wagers, and throws the high-risk industry – already damaged by the impact of arrests of executives on US soil – into turmoil. One person in the industry said the bill was an attempt to "strangle the industry through the banks".

PartyGaming, the biggest online gambling company, said it was "evaluating the situation".

SportingBet – whose former chairman Peter Dicks returned to the UK on Saturday after a New York court refused to extradite him to Louisiana, where he faced a charge of "gambling by computer" – was believed to be preparing a statement for the stock exchange, but is expected to wait to assess the impact of the bill.

888, which relies on the US for half its profits, was said to be in the process of deciding to make a clean break with the US, paying back gambling deposits paid by customers when they registered on the company's websites.

But trading on Monday is likely to hit the sector hard as investors, who have been waiting for the outcome of the Senate bill, get their first chance to respond to its passing. "It's going to be pretty devastating," said one adviser to a sector company.

12 Men Face Federal Child Porn Charges (BUFFNEWS)

By T.J. PIGNATARO, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo News, September 29, 2006

A dozen men, including eight from Western New York, are facing federal child pornography charges here under a national initiative targeting those who sexually exploit children, the FBI and U.S. Department of Justice announced Thursday.

Those charged face a variety of offenses including possessing, transporting or distributing child pornography. The crimes range from possessing images of child pornography downloaded from the Internet to the production of child pornography during sexually abusive acts, authorities said.

"These are monsters that prey upon our innocent children," said Laurie J. Bennett, special agent in charge of the Buffalo Field Office of the FBI.

U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn said Internet child pornography is a continuing act of child abuse committed by those who not only produce the images but also possess and exchange them. "[The children] are being abused time and time and time again because the picture is not destroyed," he said.

Bennett said the Buffalo office was one of the first 13 offices nationwide to institute the Innocent Images National Initiative to target those involved in the online sexual exploitation of children. Since 2002, more than 400 arrests have been made, she said.

The dozen federal cases announced in the roundup Thursday included the following individuals: Richard Bozmoff, 39, of Warren, Ohio; Bruce Bremer, 49, of Buffalo; Vincent A. Carney, 44, of North Tonawanda; Allen F. Dise, 47, of Albion; Richard Harrold, no age listed, of North Carolina; Richard Lamphere, 34, of California; Edward Keef, 37, of the Town of Tonawanda; Nathan Littlefield, 32, of Massachusetts; Thomas Powers, 47, of Lockport; Hans Sterzelbach, 64, of Grand Island; William J. Swiat, 21, of Cheektowaga; and Lloyd Thomas, 58, of Akron.

Most face sentences of up to 20 years in prison. Others face up to 10 or 30 years, depending on their crimes.

Dise, a former Buffalo News employee in the editorial graphics department, initially came to the attention of law enforcement authorities in February when he provided a co-worker with what he thought was a blank compact disk. The disk was found, however, to contain sexually explicit images of young girls. The FBI reported Dise had more that 100 images believed to be child pornography. His case was referred to federal authorities for prosecution. Dise faces up to 10 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and lifetime supervision.

His attorney, Mark J. Mahoney, said he was "very disappointed" that authorities are pursuing Dise's case federally, rather than by a state prosecution. He said Dise faces a much longer potential prison term because the case is being pursued federally.

"If he was a producer of child pornography, I could understand this decision," Mahoney said. "But [prosecutors] know there is no indication that he did anything but look at pictures that were free for him to obtain over the Internet."

Bozmoff, a 17-year Army veteran who ran a private consulting business, pleaded guilty Thursday to transporting child pornography and faces five to 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and lifetime supervision.

Bozmoff sent several videos of prepubescent children engaged in sexual conduct to undercover FBI agents and admitted to possessing more than 300 images on his computer, including some of minors under age 12 and others depicting sexual acts "readily capable of inflicting pain upon the children," authorities reported.

Both Flynn and Bennett encouraged parents, teachers and the public to learn more about the sexual exploitation of children in order to protect children from predators, and urged them to contact the FBI with any information at 856-7800. The FBI will hold a free Cyber Safety community forum at 7 p.m. Thursday in the University at Buffalo Center for the Arts.

Man To Be Arraigned On Child Porn Charges (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

A Brea man has been arrested on suspicion of possessing child pornography, officials said Friday.

Theodore Allen Jedinak, 55, was in federal custody in Santa Ana and set to be arraigned Monday after authorities found numerous pornographic images and videos of minors on his home computer, according to the FBI.

The material came to the bureau's attention, an agency statement said, after Jedinak engaged in the "initial stages" of a relationship with an unidentified individual he met online. After being shown multiple videos of minors engaged in sex acts, the statement said, the individual called Brea police, who contacted federal officials.

Jedinak was taken into custody this week at a relative's home in Chino.

Illinois Man Sentenced For Molesting Teen (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 2, 2006

MISSOULA, Mont. - An Illinois man was sentenced to five years in prison after pleading guilty to interstate transportation of a minor and engaging a boy in a relationship that included sexually explicit Internet communication.

Stephen Quinn, 45, of Harwood Heights, Ill., was sentenced Friday by U.S. District Judge Donald Molloy.

The FBI began investigating Quinn in 2005, about two years after he made contact with the boy in a gay chat room on the Internet.

Prosecutors said that in July 2004, Quinn traveled to Montana and engaged in sexual activity with the boy, then 16. The next month, Quinn flew the juvenile to Illinois and then drove him to Wisconsin, where they attended a concert and engaged in sexual activity.

Wisconsin's legal age of consent is 18 and Illinois' is 17.

Prosecutors said that in October 2004, Quinn visited the juvenile in Montana and purchased several items for him, including alcohol.

On May 6, 2005, Quinn called the juvenile's mother to say the boy had been luring older men on the Internet for sex. Eleven days later, Quinn spoke with the boy's mother in a conversation recorded by the FBI.

The FBI also obtained threatening e-mails, text messages and recorded phone calls from Quinn to the boy.

Augustine's Husband Charged In Her Death (RGJ)

By RAY HAGAR And MARTHA BELLISLE, RENO GAZETTE-JOURNAL

Reno Gazette-Journal, October 2, 2006

Reno police arrested critical-care nurse Chaz Higgs on Friday in Hampton, Va., on a warrant charging him with first-degree murder in the death of his wife, former State Controller Kathy Augustine.

The arrest was made after police received a toxicology report from the FBI indicating the presence of succinylcholine, a powerful paralyzing drug, in her urine. The drug paralyzes muscles in the body within several minutes, including the muscles used for breathing, according to medical experts.

Police also used as evidence a phone call from a nurse who said Higgs allegedly told her on July 7 that accused Reno murder suspect Darren Mack had been "stupid" to have killed his wife the way he allegedly did, and said if he wanted to kill someone, he would use the undetectable drug succinylcholine.

DOJ_NMG_0072757

Augustine, 50, was taken to Washoe Medical Center the next day after Higgs said she had suffered a massive heart attack in their Reno home. He said the heart attack was brought on from the stress of political campaigning. Augustine, the only Nevada constitutional office ever to be impeached and convicted, was running as a Republican for state treasurer.

Augustine died three days later at the hospital, now called Renown Regional Medical Center.

"It's like losing my mother a second time," Augustine's daughter, Dallas, said. "I'm very angry at the fact that she could be standing here with us today if this had not happened."

Some members of Augustine's family called for the death penalty if Higgs is found guilty.

"I realize that this has to go to a jury, but clearly in my mind, he has killed my sister," said Phil Alfano of Turlock, Calif., Kathy Augustine's brother.

Augustine's stepson, Greg Augustine of Thousand Oaks, Calif., said he is considering asking Clark County officials to perform an autopsy on the body of Augustine's former husband, Charles Augustine, because of the toxicology results.

Higgs, who worked at Carson Tahoe Regional Medical Center at the time of his wife's death, was the critical-care nurse for Charles Augustine in Las Vegas when he died of a stroke in 2003 at the age of 63.

Kathy Augustine and Higgs were married about three weeks after Charles Augustine's death.

"It would be irresponsible of me not to look into the option that he (Higgs) played a part in my father's death," Greg Augustine said. "He (Charles Augustine) was a good guy and he didn't deserve that."

Contributing to police suspicions was a call just after Augustine's death from a traveling nurse who had worked with Higgs at Carson Tahoe Hospital on July 7, according to the arrest warrant affidavit filed by Reno homicide Detective David Jenkins.

She said Higgs had referred to Mack "" a Reno pawn shop owner charged with fatally stabbing his estranged wife, Charla, in June "" and said that Mack was "stupid" to allegedly kill her "in the manner he had. He said if he wanted to kill someone, he would use the drug succinylcholine," the affidavit said.

"Mr. Higgs allegedly told her that he was currently having marital difficulties with his wife and that he intended on ending his relationship with her," the affidavit said.

The nurse did not think twice about the remarks until learning that Augustine was found unconscious in her home, Jenkins said.

Dr. Ellen Clark, who performed an autopsy on Augustine, reported that "she did find evidence of a suspicious needle injection injury on Ms. Augustine's buttock and that the medical records generated during Ms. Augustine's treatment and hospitalization did not account for that injection site," the affidavit said.

Reno police Lt. Jon Catalano said a search of Augustine's home after her death did not find succinylcholine or any syringes containing the drug. But police did find a drug that was similar to the paralyzing agent.

Higgs can waive his extradition to Nevada, and he can return quickly, Catalano said. Or he can fight extradition, and it would take about 10 days for a governor's warrant, he said.

Family members were suspicious of Higgs soon after Kathy Augustine died, they said.

"We were suspicious from day one," said Augustine's cousin, Dion Gazzaruso, of Sylmar, Calif.

Higgs tried to slit his wrists three days after his wife's death at their home in Las Vegas. Higgs did not attend his wife's funeral the day after his attempted suicide or her subsequent memorial service in Carson City.

Higgs never returned to work at Carson Tahoe Medical Center after Augustine's death, a hospital spokeswoman said. While employed at Carson Tahoe Medical Center, Higgs would have had access to succinylcholine, a spokeswoman said.

Higgs left Nevada to live with his father and stepmother in Hampton, Va., after Augustine's death. The FBI met Higgs on Friday as he pulled into his brother's driveway in Hampton, Va., and held him until local law enforcement officials arrived for the arrest, Catalano said. Two Reno police detectives flew out to Virginia to assist in the arrest, Catalano said.

Dallas Augustine called authorities to help Higgs after finding him following his suicide attempt.

"I found him and at that point was standing by my belief of innocent until proven guilty," she said, adding, "But now we have conclusive evidence to go on."

Augustine's brother said he hopes Higgs confesses to murder.

DOJ_NMG_0072758

"I may be naive in wishing this, but I hope Chaz comes clean and spares us the additional grief of going through a trial and spares my parents that grief," said Alfano, who is a high school principal in Modesto, Calif.

The Nevada Assembly impeached Augustine in August of 2004 for using state staff for her 2002 re-election bid. The state Senate convicted her and censured her on one violation. She was acquitted of using a state computer and staff to help her campaign. She kept her job as controller but was fined $15,000 by the state Ethics Commission.

Augustine's name remained on the primary election ballot because state officials did not have time to remove it after her death for the Aug. 15 election. Augustine received 18.64 percent of the votes in the primary, or 26,391 votes statewide. After her death, she was endorsed by two conservative groups, Liberty Watch of Nevada and the Citizen Outreach political action committee.

If Augustine had won the primary, the Nevada Republican Party would have been allowed to choose a new candidate, according to the Nevada Secretary of State's Office.

DEATH OF NEVADA CONTROLLER: Husband Arrested (LVRJ)

By BRIAN HAYNES, GLENN PUIT And ED VOGEL, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, October 2, 2006

Authorities say powerful paralyzing drug was administered to kill Augustine in July

Chaz Higgs spoke of committing the perfect crime.

If he wanted to kill somebody, he told a fellow nurse in July, he would use a paralyzing drug that he believed would go undetected after death, according to a police report.

The next morning his wife, state Controller Kathy Augustine, was rushed to a Reno hospital. She never regained consciousness, and three days later she was dead.

Higgs, 42, a critical care nurse at Carson-Tahoe Hospital, told police and media that Augustine had suffered a heart attack. But it wasn't long before the whispers started.

The couple's relationship was on the rocks, and she was talking about divorce, people said. He didn't seem to grieve like a loving husband would. She was in perfect health.

The whispers didn't stop until Friday, when authorities arrested Higgs in Hampton, Va., on charges of first-degree murder in Augustine's death.

Reno police said Augustine died after being injected with succinylcholine, a powerful muscle relaxant and paralyzing agent often used in hospitals to temporarily paralyze a patient so a breathing tube can be inserted into the windpipe.

It was the same drug Higgs had mentioned to his co-worker, police said, one that has been frequently used by medical workers to commit murder.

For Phil Alfano, Augustine's brother, the arrest confirmed suspicions that had been simmering since Augustine was hospitalized.

"You know how it is with a relative," he said. "You don't want to say things. But things with him bothered me."

The arrest also renewed interest in the death of Augustine's former husband of 17 years, Charles Augustine, who died in 2003 at Sunrise Hospital and Medical Center. Higgs had taken care of Charles Augustine at the hospital, and three weeks after he died Higgs and Kathy Augustine married in Hawaii.

Clark County District Attorney David Roger said Friday evening he had been in contact with both Washoe County authorities and Las Vegas homicide investigators regarding the Augustine case and in particular, the fate of her former husband. He said he will meet with Las Vegas police Monday to discuss whether the body of Charles Augustine should be exhumed.

Greg Augustine, Kathy Augustine's 36-year-old stepson, has hired Las Vegas lawyer Dominic Gentile to ask authorities to investigate his father's death. Greg Augustine had said he wanted his father's body exhumed if investigators found foul play in his stepmother's death.

"It would be irresponsible for me not to do this for Dad," he said. "He did suffer a stroke, but he was getting better."

Dr. Cyril Wecht, one of the nation's most respected medical examiners, said he believes Charles Augustine's body must be exhumed and screened for succinylcholine.

"I think they've got to in light of the facts of this case," Wecht said. "I would."

Kathy Augustine seemed to be in perfect health before she was rushed to Washoe Medical Center the morning of July 8.

Higgs had called 911 about 6:30 a.m. from the couple's Reno home. He told police he had found Augustine in bed, unconscious and not breathing.

At a news conference, Higgs told reporters that Augustine had suffered a heart attack.

But during Augustine's autopsy, medical examiners found no evidence of heart disease that could trigger a sudden heart attack. They did find a mysterious needle mark on her buttocks that could not be explained, according to a Reno police report.

As suspicions about Higgs grew in the days following Augustine's death, he proclaimed his innocence.

"I loved this woman who died, and now there is all this (expletive) coming up," Higgs told the Review-Journal. "It is just crazy for people to assume I had something to do with it. I asked for the autopsy. I want to clear it up. My wife was a healthy 50-year-old woman who dropped dead. I want to find out what happened. People don't know what went on in our home. She was frazzled and stressed out."

A day after speaking with the newspaper, Higgs slashed his wrists in the Las Vegas home he had shared with Augustine. He was released from a local hospital later that day and didn't make another public statement. He also did not attend her funeral the next day.

Meanwhile authorities sent Augustine's urine sample to the FBI forensic lab in Quantico, Va., for analysis. Among the substances the lab began looking for was succinylcholine, the substance Higgs had mentioned to a fellow nurse the day before Augustine lost consciousness, police said.

The nurse called Reno police the day Augustine died and relayed the conversation with Higgs.

The nurse said Higgs mentioned Darren Mack, who is charged with shooting his wife to death and shooting a family court judge in Reno, the police report said.

Higgs called Mack "stupid" and said he would use succinylcholine if he wanted to kill someone because it was undetectable after death, the report said. Higgs also told the nurse he was having marital problems and planned to end the relationship, according to the report.

The nurse's tip was key because succinylcholine isn't usually included in routine toxicology tests, and only specialized labs can detect it. Investigators would have to suspect its use and order a specific toxicology test to detect it in the blood or urine, Wecht said.

"You have to be thinking of it and looking for it, or it's not going to show," Wecht said.

Succinylcholine is commonly used in the operating room, but if someone is given succinylcholine and they are not given a mechanism to breathe -- such as a breathing tube -- then the patient can die, said Las Vegas anesthesiologist John Brouwers.

"You have to breathe for them," Brouwers said. "The breathing muscles become paralyzed, and you can't breathe for yourself."

Succinylcholine is a controlled drug, meaning you can't just get it anywhere. It is usually found only in a medical or hospital setting.

If an individual is given the drug without an accompanying barbiturate or anesthetic, he or she would remain conscious and unable to communicate while dying.

Reno police received the FBI's test results on Wednesday. They confirmed the presence of succinylcholine in Augustine's urine.

Police got an arrest warrant for Higgs the same day and sent two detectives to Hampton, Va., where Higgs had been visiting relatives for about a month, Reno police Lt. Jon Catalano said.

Authorities sealed the warrant because they didn't want Higgs to learn of it, he said.

"We believed Chaz was a flight risk and, based on what happened in Las Vegas, a suicide risk," Catalano said.

FBI agents staked out Higgs' brother's house Friday and arrested him about 2:50 p.m. Pacific Daylight Time when he pulled into the driveway, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0072760

Higgs was booked into the local jail, where he awaits an extradition hearing before he can be transported to Northern Nevada.

A Navy veteran, Higgs had no criminal record but twice filed for personal bankruptcy when he lived in the East. He has a 10-year-old daughter from a previous marriage.

Augustine's daughter, Dallas Augustine, said Higgs' arrest "brought up the whole grieving process all over again."

"Two months ago I was faced with my mom's death, and that was completely devastating. Now I have to deal with the fact that my stepfather is being charged with her murder," she said during a brief statement to the media outside her mother's Las Vegas home.

Greg Augustine said he and other family members had been "cautiously suspicious" that Higgs was responsible for his stepmother's death and didn't believe she died from a stress-related illness.

She might have been in the middle of a political campaign for state treasurer, but she had survived being the only elected official to be impeached in Nevada. In November 2004, the Assembly unanimously impeached Augustine on charges she used her office staff and equipment for her re-election campaign.

She was censured but allowed to keep her office.

She was running for treasurer this year because term limits prevented her from running again for controller.

Alfano, Kathy Augustine's brother, said the family wonders what motive Higgs might have had to kill his wife.

"It is a question we all are asking," said Alfano, a Modesto, Calif., high school principal. "We can't get inside his head. I am confident it all will come out."

Alfano, who is the administrator of Augustine's estate, said her homes in Reno and Las Vegas, as well as a $500,000 annuity, were left to Dallas Augustine.

Higgs only received the couple's motor vehicles and some sports equipment, he said.

Alfano said Augustine drew up her will in 2004 and Higgs might not have known that he would receive little when she died.

He said Augustine did not have a $1 million insurance policy, which some media outlets have reported.

"Their relationship seemed strange to us from the very beginning," Alfano said. "My hope is he does the right thing and owns up to his crime. I hope he spares my family additional grief."

Dallas Augustine said she had no reason to suspect Higgs until Friday.

"I was firm with my believing that everyone is innocent until proven guilty, and now we have the evidence to go on," she said.

"Now he can rot."

Late Nevada Controller's Husband Charged With Her Murder (AP)

By Scott Sonner, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, September 29, 2006

RENO, Nev. (AP) - The husband of the late Nevada Controller Kathy Augustine was arrested in Virginia on Friday on a charge of killing her with an apparent injection of a paralyzing drug.

Chaz Higgs, 42, was arrested in Hampton, Va., on a warrant issued in Reno charging him with first-degree murder, Reno police spokesman Steve Frady said. Higgs apparently was driving there to visit his father and stepmother, who live there, investigators said.

The warrant was issued Wednesday afternoon, just hours after a coroner's autopsy and results of FBI toxicology tests showed evidence of the drug succinylcholine in Augustine's system. Police described the drug as a "very powerful paralytic."

The warrant and test results had been kept secret until Reno police announced Higgs' arrest Friday afternoon.

"It had become a criminal investigation at that point and everything was sealed," Frady told The Associated Press.

Augustine, 50, died at Washoe Medical Center in Reno on July 11, three days after Higgs, a critical care nurse at Carson-Tahoe Regional Medical Center, said he found her unconscious in their Reno home.

DOJ_NMG_0072761

A police affidavit filed in court on Friday states that Higgs had access to the drug and to syringes at his job, and had told another nurse - the day before he called authorities to say that his wife was unconscious - that he would use the drug if he wanted to kill someone because it was undetectable.

According to the affidavit, the coworker said Higgs also stated he was having marital troubles and "intended on ending his relationship" with Augustine.

Higgs told the media that Augustine died of a massive heart attack. But the affidavit says an initial examination "had not revealed evidence of heart disease that would have typically been associated with a sudden and unexpected heart attack."

The document also says a doctor who conducted an autopsy found "a suspicious needle injection injury on Ms. Augustine's buttock."

Three days after Augustine's death, Higgs tried to commit suicide. He was released from a hospital later that day, and didn't attend his wife's funeral the following day.

Augustine's brother, Phil Alfano, said family members had been suspicious of Higgs all along.

"We're saddened but we're not surprised," Alfano said Friday in commenting on Higgs' arrest.

"There were a lot of things that we saw in terms of his behavior during her hospitalization and obviously during the funeral and afterward that made us very suspicious," he told AP.

"At this point we just hope that he does the right thing and cooperates with the police and spares us any additional grief," he said.

"I hope that he rots," Augustine's daughter, Dallas, told AP. She had called authorities to help Higgs after finding him following his suicide attempt.

"I found him and at that point was standing by my belief of innocent until proven guilty," she said, adding, "But now we have conclusive evidence to go on."

"It's like losing my mother a second time," she said. "I'm very angry at the fact that she could be standing here with us today if this had not happened."

Higgs had been the nurse for Augustine's previous husband, Charles Augustine, who died three years ago in Las Vegas. His death certificate says he died of complications from a stroke. Three weeks after her husband's death, Kathy Augustine married Higgs in Hawaii.

Greg Augustine, Kathy Augustine's adult stepson, had said he wanted his father's remains exhumed and an autopsy conducted if the FBI determined Kathy Augustine didn't die of natural causes.

On Friday, Greg Augustine told KVBC-TV, Las Vegas, "It would be irresponsible if I didn't look into my father's death." He added that news of Higgs' arrest "reopened a wound" for his family.

Frady said it would be up to Las Vegas Metro police to reopen the Charles Augustine case. A Metro spokesman had no immediate comment on Friday.

"That would be something our homicide detectives along with detectives from Reno would handle," said Jose Montoya, the department's public information officer.

Frady said a media briefing would be held Monday in Reno to discuss Higgs' arrest. He added that Higgs had been on the East Coast off and on since his wife's funeral.

"The investigators were aware of his locations. That is one of the reasons we moved when we did," he told AP.

FBI agents pulled Higgs over while he was in a vehicle in Hampton on Friday then waited for Hampton police to arrive on scene, Frady said.

"They confirmed the warrant and Hampton police made the arrest. The FBI has been involved for some time. It was a good cooperative effort," Frady said.

Hampton Police Cpl. Allison Good confirmed they arrested Higgs about 6 p.m. She said the FBI had told them he was in the area and described his vehicle. She said she did not know if Higgs was driving or was a passenger or if he was visiting relatives.

Nevada authorities were interviewing Higgs Friday evening, she said.

Higgs has vehemently denied having anything to do with his wife's death. The night before attempting suicide, he told the Las Vegas Review-Journal that he welcomed the police investigation.

"My wife was a healthy 50-year-old woman who dropped dead. I want to find out what happened," Higgs said. at the time. "People don't know what went on in our home. She was frazzled and stressed out."

Investigators said that medical experts told them that the drug found in Augustine's system - pronounced SUCK-suh-COH-leen - paralyzes muscles in the body within several minutes, including the muscles used for breathing. The drug is used in hospital operating rooms, emergency rooms and intensive care units to facilitate placement of breathing tubes in patients, they said.

"It's normally either injected or ingested but the information we have on how she received it has not been made public," Frady said.

Augustine was still alive when Higgs' coworker tipped police to his comments about the drug, according to the affidavit.

Detectives then worked with the Washoe County Coroner's Office and Washoe Medical Center personnel to ensure that biological samples would be available for toxicology testing in the event of her death, Frady said.

Augustine was first elected in 1992 as a Republican state assemblywoman. She became state controller in 1999.

She was impeached by the Assembly and convicted by the Senate for using state equipment on her 2002 campaign, and was censured but not removed from office. Political leaders including Republican Gov. Kenny Guinn called for her to step down, but she refused.

She was running for state treasurer when she died. Elections officials didn't have time to remove her name from last month's primary ballot, creating a potentially embarrassing situation for the state had she won, but Republican voters chose Las Vegas businessman Mark DeStefano.

Injection Killed Nev. Controller, Police Say (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

The official's husband is charged with murder. Her death had been blamed on heart attack.

The husband of late Nevada State Controller Kathy Augustine was arrested Friday and charged with murdering her by injecting her with a paralytic drug, Reno police said, the latest in a series of wild developments that has riveted the state.

Chaz Higgs, 42, a bodybuilder turned nurse, was arrested near his father and stepmother's home in Hampton, Va., said Reno police spokesman Steve Frady.

A first-degree murder warrant for Higgs' arrest had been issued late Wednesday after an FBI toxicology test found a paralytic drug in Augustine's body.

Augustine, 50, died July 11 from what Higgs, who was a critical-care nurse at Washoe Medical Center in Reno, said was a massive heart attack three days earlier.

But authorities found no evidence of heart disease in an autopsy, and many of her friends and family members had suspected Higgs.

"Ever since this happened, we have been cautiously suspicious of Chaz," said Larry Augustine, the controller's stepson and the son of her second husband, Charles Augustine.

"His explanation didn't make sense," Augustine said by telephone from his brother's home in Thousand Oaks. "This was a healthy, vibrant woman, who actually thrived on the stress of her job."

A release issued by the Reno police said that the drug found in Augustine's body, succinylcholine, "paralyzes muscles in the body within several minutes, including the muscles used for breathing.

"It has no effect on consciousness or pain perception," the release added, "so unless sedatives are also introduced, an individual given succinylcholine will be paralyzed and awake while they are dying."

Augustine, a onetime flight attendant who became an assemblywoman and state senator from Las Vegas and then controller, was censured by the Legislature after her 2004 impeachment and conviction for using state resources to campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0072763

Resisting calls from the governor and other fellow Republicans to step down, she planned to serve out her term and announced a run this year for state treasurer. In the GOP primary last month, after her death, she received more than 26,000 votes, coming in second.

News of the arrest, Larry Augustine said, was a "punch in the gut" to the family, but it also "confirmed our suspicions."

Charles Augustine died several weeks after he suffered a stroke in 2003. One of his critical care nurses was Higgs.

Charles Augustine's family had believed he was recovering from the stroke and had expressed suspicions about Higgs having had a possible role in the death.

Just three weeks after he died — leaving Kathy Augustine a Las Vegas home and a $1-million life-insurance policy, according to news reports — she took a trip to Hawaii and brought Higgs along. Friends were surprised when she returned and announced their marriage — her third, his fourth.

Higgs had blamed what he termed Augustine's heart attack on the corruption ordeal — a theory offered just before he slit his wrists in an unsuccessful suicide attempt shortly after her death.

He was released from the hospital the same day but did not attend his wife's funeral the following day.

Kathy Augustine's brother, Phil Alfano, told the Associated Press on Friday that family members were "saddened but not surprised" to hear of the arrest.

"There were a lot of things that we saw in terms of his behavior during her hospitalization … that made us very suspicious," Alfano told AP, referring to the three-day period between her sudden collapse at home and her death.

"At this point," Alfano said, "we just hope that he does the right thing and cooperates with police and spares us any additional grief."

Nevada Fugitive Found In Hampton (DPHR)

By Shawn Day 247-4816

Daily Press, October 2, 2006

Police detained Chaz Higgs, who is accused of killing his politician wife, Controller Kathy Augustine.

HAMPTON -- A Nevada man wanted on suspicion of killing his politician wife this summer was arrested Friday evening in Hampton.

Chaz Higgs, 42, had just parked along Cavalier Road and stepped out of a black BMW at about 6 p.m. when Hampton police and FBI officials took him into custody, Hampton Police Cpl. Allison Good said.

Police in Reno, Nev., had issued an arrest warrant late Wednesday for Higgs.

An autopsy and toxicology report performed on his wife, Nevada state Controller Kathy Augustine, revealed a drug in her system when she died in a Reno hospital's intensive care unit July 11.

The drug, succinylcholine, relaxes the muscles - including those used for breathing - and is used in hospitals to help place breathing tubes in patients. The drug's effects can occur within minutes.

Higgs, a critical care nurse, reported that his wife suffered a heart attack at their Reno home on July 8. An autopsy cast doubt on Higgs' report, however, when no signs of heart disease were discovered during the exam.

Police said the 50-year-old Augustine appeared healthy and had no history of heart problems. Investigators also received an anonymous tip that Augustine's death might not have been accidental.

Higgs has denied being involved in his wife's death. He tried to kill himself three days after Augustine died, according to news reports, but was released from the hospital the day before her funeral. He didn't attend the service.

Higgs had been the nurse for Augustine's previous husband, Charles Augustine, who died three years ago in Las Vegas.

His death certificate says he died of complications from a stroke.

Three weeks after her husband's death, Kathy Augustine married Higgs in Hawaii.

A controversial figure in Nevada politics, Augustine, a Republican, was running for state treasurer when she died. She became state controller, or chief fiscal officer, in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0072764

She was later impeached - and convicted - for using state equipment during her 2002 re-election campaign. Her punishment included a censure, and Republican leaders called on her to resign but she refused.

Steve Frady, a spokesman for Reno Police Department, said Friday that investigators from his department had been working with the FBI and Hampton police after learning Higgs was visiting family in Hampton.

They also learned the descriptions of vehicles that Higgs might be driving or riding in, which led them to Cavalier Road about 6 p.m., Frady said.

Reno police detectives spent several hours questioning Higgs at Hampton's police headquarters.

Shortly after 9 p.m., police took Higgs to the Hampton City Jail, where he was booked as a fugitive.

Offending The Law (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 2, 2006

CALIFORNIA ALREADY HAS some of the toughest sex-offender laws in the country. Late last month, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed a batch of new ones, including measures increasing prison terms for most convicted offenders and barring them from loitering near schools and parks once they're released. Now comes Proposition 83, known as Jessica's Law, which would duplicate many of those measures while adding several costly and questionable features that would do little to reduce crime. Californians should resist letting fear and emotion trump reason and vote no.

The new state laws strengthen all sentences for child rape to 25-years-to-life, elevate possession of child pornography from a misdemeanor to a felony and extend parole for violent sex felons to 10 years.

Proposition 83 includes nearly identical provisions but goes a few disturbing steps further. It would require registered sex offenders to wear electronic monitoring devices for life, regardless of the offense or the likelihood of recidivism. The proposition would also prohibit ex-offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools, parks and other locations chosen by local governments.

These may sound like effective crime prevention tools, but they wouldn't be. Most evidence shows satellite tracking devices don't reduce sex crimes. The program could cost tens of millions of dollars a year when fully implemented, possibly more. The housing restrictions would make it effectively impossible for parolees to find homes in most California cities, pushing them into rural areas or underground.

The proposition also fails to define just who it would cover. Backers say it would apply only to newly released offenders, but the writing is vague enough that it could retroactively apply to all of California's 90,000 registered sex offenders, increasing the costs of administering the program. Proponents say: Don't worry, the Legislature can clarify the law with a two-thirds vote. But that's an excellent argument for having lawmakers deal with the issue in the first place.

Sex offenders prey on the most innocent and vulnerable among us, and they have rightly been the target of much tough-on-crime legislation. They pose some of the most difficult challenges to an open society. But Proposition 83 isn't the answer.

CIVIL LAW:

Ex-hospital Owner Ordered To Pay $64 Million (CHIT)

By Bruce Japsen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 2, 2006

Judge: Peter Rogan knew of fraud scheme

In one of the largest civil health-care fraud judgments in Chicago history, a federal judge Friday ordered the one-time owner of Edgewater Medical Center to pay more than $60 million for his role in engineering a massive fraud scheme to bilk government health programs.

U.S. District Judge John Darrah ordered Peter Rogan of Valparaiso, Ind., to pay $64.2 million in damages and penalties, saying he had a key role in engineering an elaborate kickback scheme that paid doctors and others to admit patients for unnecessary care from the mid-1990s through 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0072765

"This is the largest civil fraud judgment--not even just health care--in this office," said Linda Wawzenski, deputy chief of the civil division of the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago. "We are pleased with the ruling. The judge found that the government's witnesses were credible, even those that are currently serving jail time, and he found that Mr. Rogan was not credible."

While four doctors and a vice president went to prison in a health-care fraud investigation that led to the shuttering of Edgewater Medical Center in 2002, Rogan faced no criminal charges.

Five who worked at the hospital pleaded guilty for their roles in luring homeless or elderly people and others into the North Side hospital at 5700 N. Ashland Ave. for medical care they did not need.

During the three-week civil trial in April, government attorneys called the case "a long-overdue day of reckoning for Mr. Rogan."

In his 64-page opinion and order Darrah said Rogan knew of the scheme and made efforts to conceal his role, citing conversations Rogan had that were taped by physicians cooperating with the FBI. Rogan told his fellow managers he "smelled a rat" and said he would be on guard when talking to physicians he believed were taping his conversations, the judge's order says.

"The evidence at trial demonstrated that Peter Rogan knowingly and for the purpose of obtaining reimbursement from the government caused Edgewater to submit numerous false claims," Darrah said in his order.

Neither Rogan nor his attorneys, Neil Holmen and Joseph Spiegler of Chicago law firm Winston & Strawn, could be reached Friday night for comment.

In earlier interviews and court proceedings Rogan has refused to take any of the blame for the collapse of a hospital that critics say has cost taxpayers tens of millions and a French bank more than $50 million.

Rogan, 60, quietly turned around Edgewater Medical Center in the early 1990s and, along the way, made himself millions on various deals tied to owning and selling the facility and then maintaining a paid management role with it.

A one-time health-care consultant at the former Ernst & Whinney, later Ernst & Young, Rogan bought Edgewater in 1989 for $1 million plus assumption of nearly $10 million in debt and liabilities. Edgewater's board wanted to get out from under the hospital's troubles and sold it to Rogan, who ran it as his own for-profit hospital for six years.

In 1994 Rogan sold the hospital to California-based, not-for-profit Permian Health Care Inc. for $35 million. Of that, public records show, Rogan got $31 million. In court his lawyers said he got more than $10 million.

Rogan and his lawyers did not deny he made a lot of money. In fact, the lawyers said, because he made so much money he had no reason to be involved with a fraud scheme at the facility.

Judge Orders Ex-hospital Owner To Pay $64.2 Million For Fraud Scheme (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 2, 2006

CHICAGO - A federal judge has ordered the former owner of a now-shuttered Chicago hospital to pay $64.2 million in damages and penalties for his role in a scheme to bilk government health programs.

Peter Rogan was a key player in the fraud at Edgewater Medical Center on Chicago's North Side, U.S. District Judge John Darrah said in a 64-page opinion issued Friday.

"This is the largest civil fraud judgment - not even just health care - in this office," said Linda Wawzenski, deputy chief of the civil division of the U.S. attorney's office in Chicago. "We are pleased with the ruling. The judge found that the government's witnesses were credible, even those that are currently serving jail time, and he found that Mr. Rogan was not credible."

Rogan, 60, did not face criminal charges for the scheme, which paid doctors and others to admit homeless or elderly people for unnecessary care from the mid-1990s through 2000. Four doctors and a vice president went to prison and the hospital closed in 2002.

Rogan, of Valparaiso, Ind., did not immediately return a telephone message Saturday from The Associated Press. His attorneys also did not return calls for comment left after business hours.

Rogan knew of the scheme and tried to conceal his role, Darrah said, citing taped conversations Rogan had with doctors who cooperated with the FBI.

"The evidence at trial demonstrated that Peter Rogan knowingly and for the purpose of obtaining reimbursement from the government caused Edgewater to submit numerous false claims," Darrah said.

Rogan bought Edgewater in 1989 for $1 million plus assumption of nearly $10 million in debt and liabilities. In 1994 he sold the hospital to Permian Health Care Inc. for $35 million.

Rogan's attorneys have argued that because of his wealth, Rogan had no reason to be involved in a fraud scheme.

During a three-week civil trial in April, government attorneys called the case "a long-overdue day of reckoning for Mr. Rogan."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Va. Ban's Reach Is At Center Of Fight (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

Backers of a state constitutional amendment that would ban same-sex marriage contend that the measure wouldn't change life for Virginians, gay or not, one iota.

So why are they asking voters to alter the state's 230-year-old Bill of Rights -- a document that served as a model for the U.S. Bill of Rights -- for the first time in a decade?

Supporters say action is needed to protect the commonwealth's laws against same-sex marriage from state judges who could rule that they are unconstitutional, as happened in Massachusetts in 2003 and in Maryland in January when a circuit court judge ruled that a law banning same-sex marriage was discriminatory.

"Nothing will change," said Del. Robert G. Marshall (R-Prince William), one of the amendment's sponsors. "All this would do is prevent the gay rights crowd from gaining any perceived right to marry by going to the courts."

Opponents of the measure vehemently disagree with the notion that the ballot question simply enshrines the status quo for Virginians. They have largely based their campaign on convincing voters that the amendment could have all sorts of unintended consequences, including jeopardizing contracts between unwed heterosexual couples, threatening safeguards for unmarried victims of domestic violence and hurting Virginia's business climate.

What impact, if any, the proposed amendment would have on the everyday lives of Virginians has become the defining issue in the fight over the measure, which will appear on the Nov. 7 ballot. The debate has split lawmakers, legal scholars and some of the state's highest elected officials as the campaign heads into its final stretch over the next five weeks.

The battle reflects those in other states where similar measures have appeared on the ballot. Since 1998, 20 states have passed constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage. In many of those states, opponents have argued unsuccessfully that the amendments go too far. Several other states are considering measures this fall.

The portion of the Virginia amendment in question states: "This Commonwealth and its political subdivisions shall not create or recognize a legal status for relationships of unmarried individuals that intends to approximate the design, qualities, significance or effects of marriage. Nor shall this Commonwealth or its political subdivisions create or recognize another union, partnership or other legal status to which is assigned the rights, benefits, obligations, qualities, or effects of marriage."

Opponents argue that because current law specifically bans "same-sex" couples from such rights and because the amendment says the state should not "recognize a legal status . . . for unmarried individuals" -- without specifying what kind -- it jeopardizes all relationships. They have released their own legal analysis, signed by more than 100 Virginia lawyers, backing their claims.

"One says same-sex couples, the other says unmarried couples -- they don't mean the same thing," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the Commonwealth Coalition, the organization leading the opposition. "If the General Assembly meant 'same-sex couples' for the constitutional amendment, they would have said 'same-sex couples.' "

Opponents say that the language could ban heterosexual couples from making contracts on health-care decisions and property ownership. Married people get these rights automatically through long-established common law; unwed couples, both gay and heterosexual ones, use legal documents to ensure they can will property to a partner or allow the partner, rather than family members, to make end-of-life decisions.

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), who is against same-sex marriage, said the "broad" wording of the measure could threaten protective orders and additional safeguards for unmarried victims of domestic violence by barring all legal recognition of unmarried family or household members. Kaine has also said the amendment has the potential to hurt the state's business environment because it could stymie a company's efforts to recruit talent.

Supporters, including Virginia Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell (R), who voted for the amendment last year when he was a delegate, say the commonwealth is not in jeopardy of having existing laws invalidated. They argue that the right to enter into a contract isn't exclusive to marriage.

"I can't see how a judge would rule that basic rights such as wills and other contracts can be seen only as marital rights," said Lynne Marie Kohm, a professor of law at Regent University in Virginia Beach.

Nonetheless, several legal experts who have studied similar amendments said that, rather than clarifying legal questions, the measure will raise additional ones and that Virginia is sure to face court challenges.

In Ohio, where a similarly worded constitutional amendment was adopted in 2004, two appellate courts have concluded that it exempts unmarried couples from prosecution under domestic violence laws, while eight other courts have ruled otherwise. The matter is now before the Ohio Supreme Court.

"We don't know how far-reaching this type of amendment would ultimately be interpreted by the court. . . . That's the problem with the way this is worded," said Cheryl Lynn Hepfer, president of the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers and an expert in contractual law. "Often people don't understand the consequences until the courts interpret it. And sometimes it's interpreted more broadly and sometimes less broadly."

Aside from the legal arguments, opponents have also questioned the motivation of the amendment backers, saying that the ballot measure has been designed specifically to help U.S. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) drive conservative voters to the polls to win reelection.

"This is a contrived initiative straight from Karl Rove's playbook," said Del. Brian J. Moran (D-Alexandria). "It has nothing to do with marriage and everything to do with partisan politics."

Republican drafters of the amendment point out that dozens of Democrats in the legislature voted to place it on the ballot.

"Opponents are looking for every single nuance to say why we've put this on the ballot," said Del. John A. Cosgrove (R-Chesapeake), another sponsor of the amendment. "All the brouhaha about unintended consequences and any partisan motivations are just scare tactics."

Former Officer Pleads Guilty (JACKPROG)

Jacksonville (TX) Progress, October 2, 2006

TYLER — Pleading guilty to retaliation against a witness and two counts of violation of civil rights, former Jacksonville Police Officer Larry Pugh and his attorneys asked U.S. Magistrate Judge John Love to accept a plea bargain Thursday at the U.S. Federal Courthouse in Tyler.

Love accepted the plea, and the maximum punishment of 12 years in prison will be recommended at a sentencing likely to be held in 45 to 60 days.

“This is a plea bargain only for his (Pugh’s) three federal charges,” said Pete Galbraith, supervisory senior special agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation during a press conference immediately following the proceedings. “The Cherokee County charges will have to be folded into this.”

Pugh, 33, was originally indicted in 2005 for five counts of violation of civil rights (sexual assault while on duty), and three of the charges were later dismissed. Another violation of civil rights charge was added, along with charges of giving a false statement to an FBI official.

Thursday’s charges included another charge, added in August, after Pugh attempted to drag one of the female witnesses in the case into his vehicle with his belt. The belt broke, allowing the woman to flee and contact JPD.

DOJ_NMG_0072768

Pugh was arrested Aug. 8 for aggravated assault of the woman, which led to the federal retaliation charge (because it was against a witness in a federal case).

Appearing in court, slightly thinner with more hair than his most recent police mug shot in August, Pugh appeared content and observant. Love asked Pugh numerous questions to ensure he understood each court action leading to the final guilty pleas.

"Are you pleading guilty because you are in fact guilty?" Love said.

"Yes Sir," Pugh answered.

According to Pugh he was not forced in any way to accept the plea bargain instead of going to trial in November.

However, Pugh's sister, Linda, and his mother, Jaquita Smith, said Pugh was forced to accept the agreement, which includes the maximum jail time.

"They all had him take the plea for two reasons – his safety and because with a jury he could have gotten 30 years to life for just one charge," Linda said. "There's not a violent bone in his body."

Pugh's mother expressed concern with JPD and the FBI stating the plea occurred "because Jacksonville is just railroading him."

"My son, well you saw his wife, do you think he has any reason to have sex with someone else?" Smith said.

Pugh's wife, Jennifer, and one of the female victims in his case were present at the court proceedings. Jennifer Pugh adhered to the press, but she spoke only briefly. The victim declined comment.

During a press conference at the U.S Department of Defense in Tyler, John Ratcliffe, first assistant U.S. Attorney, and other FBI and law enforcement officials gave a summary of the court proceedings and answered questions.

"More specifically, Mr. Pugh was admitting that on two separate occasions in 2005, while on duty and while in uniform, he forced two different women to have sex with him," Ratcliffe said.

The 12-year prison term includes one year for each civil rights violation and 10 years for the retaliation charge.

"It is unfortunate and sad that someone with law enforcement had betrayed the law. It makes it more difficult for other officers in the area to do their job," Ratcliffe said.

One stipulation in the agreement mentioned the possibility that Pugh not be required to register as a sex offender. However, Cherokee County District Attorney Elmer Beckworth said he believes Pugh may be required by the state to register as a sex offender after he has served his jail time.

Assistant JPD Chief of Police John Page and JPD Detective Travis Cearley were also in attendance. Page said he feels "justice was served."

Page said JPD and the FBI worked together to resolve the case. JPD officials initially investigated the allegations against Pugh, and later contacted FBI.

Pugh joined JPD in January 2003. He was suspended for allegations of misconduct Oct. 21, 2005 and later fired upon his arrest by the FBI in February 2006.

He will remain in custody of U.S. Marshals until his sentencing, Love said.

EX-JACKSONVILLE OFFICER ENTERS PLEA OF GUILTY (TYMT)

By KENNETH DEAN,, Staff Writer

Tyler Morning Telegraph, October 2, 2006

A former Jacksonville police officer accused of violating the civil rights of two women by forcing them to have sex with him while he was on duty, entered a guilty plea in federal court Thursday morning.

The officer's family claims the man is being punished for taking drugs and drug money off Jacksonville streets.

Larry Pugh, 33, pleaded guilty to three counts, including retaliation against one of the female victims, stemming from separate incidents where he allegedly forced women to have sex with him.

"According to evidence introduced by prosecutors, Pugh admitted that on two occasions in 2005, while a Jacksonville police officer, he violated the civil rights of two women by forcing them to have sex with him while he was on duty and in uniform," John Radcliff, U.S. Attorney's Office, said during a Thursday morning press conference.

DOJ_NMG_0072769

Radcliff said in one incident Pugh arrested the woman and then released her after she had sex with him. In the other incident Pugh offered the woman a courtesy ride then took her to a mobile home where he had sex with her then drove her back to her neighborhood.

Pugh also admitted to retaliating against one of the victims because she was cooperating with law enforcement.

"Specifically he admitted that he confronted the woman. Wrapped his belt around her neck and attempted to drag her into his van," Radcliff said. "In doing so the woman suffered physical injuries."

Law enforcement officials said the plea showed the determination of authorities to protect the rights and lives of citizens from officers who use their badge to inflict harm on others.

"No one is above the law and it's unfortunate and sad that someone entrusted to protect the public would use their position to commit a crime against citizens," Radcliff said.

NEW CHARGES

Both Pugh's defense and the U.S. Attorney's Office are recommending a 12-year sentence in the federal system, but that will be left up to the discretion of the judge in the case.

Elmer Beckworth, Cherokee County district attorney, said a grand jury indicted Pugh on state charges Monday, but he would not go into details.

"The indictment is sealed at this time, because we have not arrested him on these charges," he said. "But the grand jury returned a true bill in the indictment we put before them and we will be arresting him soon."

His family said he accepted the plea because defense attorneys were worried a jury might convict him and ask for a tougher sentence.

"He will go in an innocent man and will come out an innocent man," Linda Pugh, the man's sister, said after the plea was entered. "These allegations were made by women who have lengthy criminal records and why their credibility over a police officer was accepted is beyond me."

Ms. Pugh said her brother has four children, ages 5, 3, 2 and 11 months, and that his wife Jennifer is standing by her husband.

"The truth is that he took more drugs and drug money off the streets of Jacksonville, and some in the police department didn't want him doing that," she said. "He was targeted because he was a threat to the Jacksonville drug business."

FBI Special Agent Pete Galbraith said the women were credible and Pugh, by accepting the plea, admitted he committed the acts listed against him.

"We felt the witnesses were credible in this case and we were able to corroborate their statements with evidence," he said. "I am very proud of the courage of these two witnesses in this case, because it's very hard to stand up against someone who is a police officer."

Jacksonville Assistant Police Chief John Page said the plea gave the department and city a chance to heal and move forward.

Page said that when the women reported the incidents to Jacksonville police they began an investigation and took their initial report to the district attorney and the FBI for further assistance in the case.

"We began this investigation and asked for help as it progressed. I think today's events will give the city and the department some closure," he said. "I think with his plea we came to an equitable resolution and the department is moving in a positive direction."

Former Jacksonville Police Officer Admits Forcing Women To Have Sex With Him (LUFDN)

Lufkin Daily News, September 29, 2006

TYLER — U.S. Attorney Matthew D. Orwig announced Thursday that a 33-year-old former Jacksonville police officer has pleaded guilty to civil rights violations and retaliating against a witness.

DOJ_NMG_0072770

Larry M. Pugh admitted to the charges before a U.S. Magistrate Judge in Tyler, according to a press release issued by Orwig's office.

Pugh admitted that on two occasions in 2005, while a Jacksonville police officer, he violated the civil rights of two women by forcing them to have sex with him while he was on duty and in uniform, according to evidence introduced by prosecutors.

In one incident, he had arrested the woman and then released her after she had sex with him. In the other incident, Pugh offered the woman a courtesy ride, then took her to a trailer house where he had sex with her and then returned her to her neighborhood.

Pugh also admitted to retaliating against one of the women for providing information to law enforcement officials. Specifically, he admitted that he confronted the woman, wrapped his belt around her neck and attempted to drag her into his van. In doing so, the woman suffered physical injuries.

In the plea agreement, Pugh and the United States agreed that he should receive a sentence of 12 years in federal prison. He also faces a fine of up to $450,000. A sentencing date has not been set.

The case is being investigated by the FBI, Cherokee County District Attorney's Office and the Jacksonville Police Department. The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorneys Alan Jackson and Wes Rivers.

From Inmate To Mentor, Through Power Of Books (WP)

By Lonnae O'neal Parker

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The young black guys, in baseball caps and shorts, striped polos and slouchy pants, sit in a circle. They have "Letters to a Young Brother" by Hill Harper open on their laps, but the conversation has strayed from book talk to boy talk -- hip-hop, sports, school.

"When I asked, 'Why is everybody white, except the janitors are black?' the teacher sent me to the office," complains 12-year-old Kyle Turner of Columbia, and there are nods and murmurs of assent.

Teachers have it in for us.

"That's rare," counters group leader Reginald "Dwayne" Betts of Clinton. With cocoa skin and a head full of twists, he looks like one of the teenagers, but he's 25. "The thing I'm trying to get us to address is: Sometimes when we've got problems with teachers and people in our lives, sometimes the problem is not with them, it's with us."

He offers his life as parable.

"I had a teacher who honestly, legitimately didn't like me," Betts says. "But I legitimately, honestly was not a likable person."

The boys, ages 11 to 16, nod as they let his words settle around their heads.

In February, nearly a year after he got out of prison, Betts started the YoungMenRead book club at Karibu Books in Bowie because he loves to read. Because he wanted to create a place where it was cool for black boys to hang out, speak up and be smart -- a place he says he never had.

Betts was a 16-year-old honors student and class treasurer at Suitland High School when he carjacked somebody, was charged as an adult and spent more than eight years in prison. He wasn't that bad, he says. He just drifted a bad way, and there simply weren't enough safety nets to head him off -- not enough teachers or organizations, mentors or black men.

Betts knows how easily black boys can live hermetically sealed lives in which guns and drugs and dying are all viable options. And with everything in him, he wants to save them from that mistake, from everything he has been through.Smart but Disruptive

Gloria Hill used to wait every day for her son's teacher from the talented and gifted program to call and say, "Dwayne is trying to take over my class." "This went on until fourth grade," Hill says, when one teacher started making him read whenever he was disruptive. She gave him "Gifted Hands," a biography of surgeon Ben Carson.

Reading kept him quiet, so from then on, teachers and his mother gave him books. On his own, he read cereal boxes and encyclopedia entries on sports heroes. Later it was spiritualist Richard Bach and essayist James Baldwin. Still, nothing fully settled him.

Betts's parents separated when he was a toddler, and he grew up with his mother, a resource specialist with the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. They lived in a Suitland neighborhood of apartments that he says was nice but never truly middle class. "Not everybody had a car," he says. "I knew people who sold drugs."

Hill says Betts was her world. But she had to work, and he was home alone a lot. She didn't date, so he had few adult men in his life. In eighth grade, Betts was suspended four times for being a smart mouth. "What are you worried about?" Betts asked his mother after he was suspended a fifth time for setting off a stink bomb. "Malcolm X had to go to prison to become the man he was meant to be."

Hill says her son thought he could talk his way out of anything.

In ninth grade, Betts entered the gifted program at Suitland High School and did just enough to maintain his 3.0 grade-point average, telling himself, I could always get A's if I wanted.

Instead he was getting high with neighborhood friends after classes. They played ball, cracked jokes, smoked weed. "I lived in a couple of different worlds," Betts says -- his books and his boys. "I wasn't comfortable in my space."

Betts had never been in trouble with police, "but I wasn't fully law-abiding, either." He'd never stolen a car, but he'd ridden in stolen cars. He was an honors student who hung out with guys who made nearly all F's. One friend was shot to death because of a drug rivalry. Betts thought some of his friends might go to prison. "I aspired to college even though I didn't act like it," he says.

Betts says he didn't turn bad suddenly, didn't make some Bigger Thomas, "Native Son," black-boy-got-the-inner-city-blues lurch toward violence and nihilism. No, he just veered off, and nobody caught him. "I guess I didn't set off any alarms in anybody's head," he says.

"We really didn't know that side of him that was slipping away," says Evelyn Carter, Betts's high school literature teacher. "He was too smart, too sharp, too articulate."

Early in his junior year, a favorite teacher went on maternity leave, and then another teacher declined to let him compete on the school's It's Academic team, citing Betts's bad attitude. He spent long days in a reefer cloud and cut his afternoon classes.

In December of that year, he and a friend drove a neighborhood junkie's stolen car to Springfield Mall. They found a man asleep in a car. Betts pointed a borrowed pistol at the window. They took the man's wallet and drove off with his car. The next day, Betts and his friend tried to buy $300 worth of clothes at the Pentagon City mall with the man's stolen credit card. A clerk called security. Police caught them near the Pentagon.

Betts cried after his first court appearance. He was going to miss Christmas. At 16, he was charged as an adult with carjacking, use of a firearm during a felony and attempted robbery. He was the first of his neighborhood friends to go to prison.

For years, he struggled to make sense of how he got where he was, moving between denial and acceptance. Carjacking was simply "in my realm of possible things to do," he says. "It's not like we had this plethora of options, not like I could have gone boating."

"Basically," Betts says, "I did it because I wanted to and because I could and because I didn't think it would define me for the rest of my life."Serving Time

In his first two years in prison, Betts spent nearly a year in isolation for twice assaulting a guard. He saw a guy who'd been beaten to death. He saw people get stabbed. He was scared all the time.

"There was the very real fear of violence," he says. He stayed alert and watched what people did.

After a while, an initial fear of rape was replaced by a more subtle fear, informed by the slow creep of time. He worried about turning into somebody he didn't want to be. Would he stab somebody who threatened him or flirted with him? He got so used to seeing violence that he wondered whether he'd wind up too hard to ever really go home.

He turned again to books. He read everything he could get his hands on, fantasy and philosophy. He wrote his mother every week. He started writing essays.

For the first time, he decided he could be whomever he wanted. "There is no more fear of failure after you've been to prison," he says.

He made friends -- a skateboarder and a 45-year-old white former Marine who called him "the antithesis" because he worked in the law library -- and always had a book. He had his first serious conversation with a black man older than 35. He got a reputation for being smart, which brought him a measure of respect -- which gave him a space. He taught himself Spanish by studying five hours a day, six days a week.

"I didn't want to sit around and waste eight years," Betts says. He read poetry books and tried his hand at it. "I guess I got good," he says, smiling.

I come from a bullet in an unfired .45, tofu scrambled with garlic and purple onion slices, and every day the small muscles in my finger threatened to pull a trigger, slight and curved like my woman's eyelashes

-- Dwayne Betts

The Book Club

In March 2005, Betts was released from prison with little idea of what he wanted to do. He'd completed high school in prison, so he applied to Prince George's Community College.

A few months later, he met Yao Glover, co-owner of Karibu Books. Within seconds, it was clear to Glover that "the way he was dialoguing with literature was different."

Glover told Betts that he should work for him and followed up with a call. In June 2005, Betts was hired as an assistant manager at Karibu in Bowie. "I got three felonies, and this guy is letting me make $3,000 deposits," Betts marvels.

That August, he started community college and made straight A's. In his second semester, he was accepted into the honors academy, which comes with automatic admission and partial scholarships to the University of Maryland and American University, and a full scholarship to Howard University. He got straight A's that semester, too.

He became a manager at Karibu in January. He got the idea for a book club for black boys and started telling everyone who came in the store. For the first meeting, he bought 20 books, copies of "Bronx Masquerade" by Nikki Grimes and "The Legend of Buddy Bush" by Sheila P. Moses. Eight boys showed up. Since then, attendance has varied from four to 20 youths, and titles have included "Life in Prison" by Crips co-founder Stanley "Tookie" Williams, who was later executed, and the Pulitzer Prize-winning "Fences" by August Wilson.

"Young people don't read because they don't see other people they can associate with being cool reading," Betts says. "I've got a space where we can come together."

At the last book club meeting of the summer, Jibril Sinclair, 12, of the Bronx, N.Y., is eager to talk about "Letters to a Young Brother." He visits his grandfather in Northwest Washington every summer and heard about the book club from his tutor. "The idea that young African American men read a book and share their thoughts about it is so very, very positive," says his grandfather, Carl A. Grimes.

Tell me something you related to in the book, Betts says.

"The fact that [Hill Harper] grew up with a single parent, and I'm only growing up with my mom," Jibril says.

Ellington Barron, 13, of Bowie likes the fact that Harper was named after his grandfather. "My mom, she really liked Duke Ellington," he says. "I really want to get into the Duke Ellington School of the Arts."

This is the kind of space Dwayne Betts wanted but never had. He has mentors now: He has interned at the Hurston/Wright Foundation, and he has studied with former poet laureate Rita Dove. He quit the bookstore to focus full time on maintaining his grades and figuring out his next school. Glover counsels him to center himself and stay patient.

Betts is trying to make up time. It takes focus and resources and people to help you develop character, he says -- to grow into "who you want to be in the world."

And, Betts says, it takes a space, where it's really okay, cool even, for black boys to read. He offers his own life as parable.

ANTITRUST:

Weyerhaeuser, Safeco Among Big Businesses On High Court's Docket (AP)

AP, October 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court is about to plunge into an agenda laden with business sector issues, including cases involving the Weyerhaeuser Co. and Safeco.

DOJ_NMG_0072773

Of the 38 cases the court has agreed to consider so far in the term that begins today, 17 are business related, "an unusually high fraction," Washington lawyer Roy Englert says.

Chief Justice John Roberts was managing partner of a major law firm that had a very sizable portfolio of business clients and is "comfortable with the issues presented in business cases in ways that Chief Justice William Rehnquist" was not, Pepperdine University law professor Douglas Kmiec says.

The Weyerhaeuser case is one of two antitrust cases set for this term so far. The Bush administration wants the justices to throw out a $79 million verdict against lumber industry giant Weyerhaeuser in a lawsuit brought by a smaller company. At issue is whether "predatory bidding," or paying too much for raw material, is an anti-competitive practice.

In the second antitrust case, the largest phone companies are accused of dividing up the market to protect regional monopolies.

In the realm of consumer rights, two insurance companies are fighting allegations that they should have notified people about adverse information in their credit reports. The consumers say Geico and Safeco denied them insurance or increased premiums based on data in the reports.

Philip Morris USA is fighting an $80 million punitive damage award to the widow of a lung cancer victim who smoked two packs of Marlboros a day.

Duke Energy Corp. is trying to protect its lower court victory enabling aging, refitted generating units to operate at full throttle without costly pollution-control equipment. In this case, the environmental movement is determined to finish a fight begun when the Clinton administration sued Duke.

Companies looking for help from the conservative wing of the court may have their work cut out for them.

For example, liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg and conservative Justice Antonin Scalia are allies when it comes to punitive damages. Scalia says the issue is "the province of state governments," ominous words for Philip Morris' position.

Court Back In Session With Full Docket (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir In Washington

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

The US Supreme Court could be about to rewrite some fundamental rules governing the economy as it begins a new term on Monday with a docket that has an unusually high number of business cases.

Half of the docket so far is business cases – including potential landmark cases involving punitive damages, patent, antitrust and environmental law – and more could be added. “It’s a very important term for business,” says Jonathan Franklin, of the law firm Fulbright & Jaworski.

US companies will be watching closely to see how the reshaped court – with two new justices whose views on many business issues have not been tested – will rule in areas that can mean millions of dollars to individual companies.

The justices will weigh in on the debate over how to punish corporate wrongdoing by considering whether to tighten limits on punitive damage awards, the big fines levied by juries to protest and deter corporate misconduct that are often out of all proportion to actual damages. The case before them involves a $79m (€64m, £41.5m) award won by the widow of a former smoker against Philip Morris, the cigarette maker.

But it reaches far beyond tobacco, and could have big implications for every company that makes or sells products in the US.

The court has tried several times to rein in punitive damage awards, but many lower courts have ignored these rulings. In the Philip Morris case, the punitive award was nearly 100 times the damages awarded to compensate the victim.

The court must decide whether such large awards are constitutional, where the defendant’s conduct was particularly reprehensible (as the Oregon Supreme Court found in the Philip Morris case). The justices will also decide whether juries can award punitive damages for harm to people who are not involved in the lawsuit – for example, all Oregon smokers, as they did in the Philip Morris case.

Both of these issues are crucial for business, but it is far from clear how the court will rule. Both new justices, Chief Justice John Roberts and Samuel Alito, have little record on punitive damages and they face an awkward choice: should they defend the right of business to avoid unconstitutionally excessive awards or should they uphold the right of individual states to protect their citizens by letting the states regulate punitive amounts?

The vote of the new justices could tip the balance.

The justices will also hear a potential watershed patent case, which could set a standard for determining when an invention is too obvious to deserve patent protection.

Legal experts say the decision could affect virtually every patent case, since every patent application must pass the test for "non-obviousness".

Critics of the US patent system say that too many obvious inventions are patented – like the adjustable accelerator pedal at issue in KSR v Teleflex, the case before them.

If they tighten that standard, says Professor Jay Thomas of Georgetown University Law Center, it could effect a "broad transfer from patent owners to the public domain", and many controversial business method patents could be threatened.

Later this week the court will hear another patent case, MedImmune v Genentech, that could determine whether it will be easier in future to challenge questionable patents in court. "This is a technical case but one of very great importance to the business community," says Kenneth Starr, former Whitewater special prosecutor and a Supreme Court expert at the law firm Kirkland & Ellis.

"The court seems to have the feeling that something is wrong with US patent law. They don't know what it is and they don't know how to fix it, but they are looking for the right case," says Mr Franklin.

Competition law is another newfound interest of the justices: they will hear a case, Bell v Twombly, that could set a new standard for alleging conspiracy in antitrust cases.

Roy Englert, Supreme Court litigator at the law firm Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck and Untereiner, describes the case as "a pitched battle between the business community and the class action bar" because of its potential to alter the power of lawyers to strongarm companies to settle such cases.

The court will also hear a duo of important environmental cases, including one that tests whether the Environmental Protection Agency has the right to refuse to regulate greenhouse gas emissions. That case could also affect the power of interest groups to challenge the Bush administration's controversial environmental policies more broadly.

Group To Buy U.K. Water Firm AWG (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 2, 2006

An investment group consisting mainly of pension funds plans to announce today that it has agreed to buy British water utility AWG PLC for about £2.2 billion ($4.12 billion), according to people familiar with the situation.

The group of Australian and Canadian pension funds and British venture-capital and private-equity firm 3i Group PLC have agreed to bid £15.55 ($29.12) a share for AWG, which operates mainly in southeast England and serves about six million industrial, commercial and residential customers. AWG announced it had been approached about a takeover Sept. 14.

The deal comes as three of Britain's largest water utilities are the subjects of potential buyouts. Like power companies across Europe, water providers are attractive takeover targets for private-equity firms -- and similar investment firms, such as pension plans -- because they earn stable returns that can be leveraged with borrowed money to make a buyout potentially lucrative.

Four groups of possible buyers are involved in a process of bidding for Thames Water PLC in a deal that would value the utility that supplies water to London at more than £7 billion. That auction was started when Thames Water's controlling shareholder, German energy giant RWE AG, decided to sell the company earlier this year. A deal isn't expected until the end of the month or later this year.

In addition to 3i of London, the firms involved in the AWG acquisition are CPP Investment Board of Toronto and Colonial First State of Sydney, a division of Commonwealth Bank of Australia, and Industry Funds Management of Melbourne. People close to the matter have said AWG hasn't received an approach from any other group, though other potential bidders are believed to be considering a higher, rival bid.

DOJ_NMG_0072775

An AWG spokesman declined to comment. Representatives from the bidding group couldn't be reached for comment.

AWG said last week that the financial performance of its Anglian Water division was "materially above management's expectations" for the six months through Sept. 30, due in part to strong demand for water as a result of a "very hot, dry summer" in the U.K.

Based in Huntingdon, England, AWG has 9,000 employees and had net profit of £78 million for its fiscal year through March 2006, on sales of £1.55 billion.

Brussels Expands Microsoft Vista Inquiry (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

European antitrust regulators have expanded their probe into Microsoft's Vista operating system, by raising concerns over plans to add encryption and handwriting recognition software to the group's new flagship product.

The new concerns are based on complaints from small European software developers who fear the bundling of these new functions into Vista will undermine their products in this area.

It is understood that the European Commission raised these concerns in a letter to Microsoft in July.

Vista, which is due to replace the group's ubiquitous Windows operating system from next year, is already at the centre of a new antitrust battle between the Commission and Microsoft.

The Brussels-based regulator fears that Vista might raise the same competition problems that led the Commission to issuea landmark ruling againstMicrosoft more than two years ago.

In particular, the regulator is concerned about the "bundling" of new features and programs into the operating system. Brussels fears the addition of an internet search engine and a rangeof software security featureswill undermine competitionfrom companies which sell similar products on a stand-alone basis.

Microsoft said yesterday that handwriting recognition and encryption software would be included only in premium editions of Vista.

These would cost more than the basic edition, thereby giving users a choice of programs from different vendors, the group added.

Though the Commission has made public some of its concerns, it has not issued a formal ruling.

The conflict between Brussels and the software group has taken on a new edge over recent weeks after Microsoft complained that the legal uncertainty hanging over Vista could further delay its launch. The company has also warned that the Commission probe might force it to market Vista without crucial security features.

This sparked an angry reaction from Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, who last week hit out at what she described as a "co-ordinated campaign" against the Commission.

The latest concerns over Vista follow a string of complaints, and people familiar with the investigation say the volume of concerns might create problems for the regulator. They say it will be almost impossible for the Commission to pursue all these complaints in formal antitrust probes.

Should the regulator decide to bring new charges against Microsoft, it would have to narrow down its concerns to a small number of issues.

Financial Regulators Fight EU Merger Reform (FT)

By George Parker In Brussels And Mark Schieritz In Frankfurt

Financial Times, October 2, 2006

Europe's top financial regulators will today attack Brussels' plans to shake up the vetting of cross-border mergers, which aim to speed decisions and tackle national protectionism.

Charlie McCreevy, EU internal market commissioner, proposed the shake-up this month in an attempt to stop national regulators obstructing cross-border takeovers and mergers on bogus grounds. But today Europe's three main regulatory bodies, covering banking, securities and insurance, will claim that Mr McCreevy's plan would force them to work too quickly, compromising their decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0072776

They will warn that they are unwilling to hand over some confidential merger material to Mr McCreevy, potentially preventing him from deciding whether national regulators are acting in good faith.

The warning comes in a letter, seen by the Financial Times, from the chairs of the three European financial services regulatory committees - CEBS, CESR and CEIOPS - representing national regulators in banking, securities and insurance respectively.

The clash comes as Mr McCreevy tries to revise the EU's banking directive to tackle protectionism, which he believes is - hampering the development of pan-European financial services companies.

Last year he fought Antonio Fazio, then governor of Italy's central bank, who tried to scupper two foreign bids for Italian banks, after they had been cleared by the Commission's antitrust directorate.

Mr McCreevy wants to rein in the powers of national regulators, who have to assess the risk to financial stability of a merger. He has proposed five clearly defined conditions under which they can oppose a deal and wants to allow the Commission access to documents to make sure they are sticking to the rules.

But the regulators are gearing up for a fight.

In the joint letter they say Mr McCreevy's proposal that they should have only 30 days to oppose a merger, down from the current three months, could lead to bad decisions.

They propose that "more complex cases" should be assessed within a longer time-frame of "ideally 65 days". "The speed of decision making, while undoubtedly important, should not be the overriding objective," they say.

Perhaps the biggest disagreement is over the regulators' willingness to hand over documents to Brussels, saying the proposal for "absolute and unfettered right of access to all confidential prudential information by the Commission is too vaguely defined".

The regulators add: "The draft proposal is not proportionate if it seeks to ensure that all confidential prudential information in the hands of the competent authorities is open to the Commission."

Their reservations could be the opening shot in a protracted power struggle between national regulators and Brussels.

Mr McCreevy will have to win national government support to push through his plans. Although member states publicly back his commitment to crack down on protectionism, an attachment to "national champions" in the financial sector and elsewhere remains strong.

Midwest Farms Reap Benefits Of Ethanol Boom (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, October 2, 2006

FRIESLAND, Wis. — When he's working on his farm, Jim Casey often glances at the ethanol plant looming over the prairie a half-mile away. “You know you're making money when you see that smoke coming out of the stack,” he says.

Ethanol plants are changing farming across the Midwest. The last time there was such a dramatic shift in agriculture was “when electricity came to the rural people” in the 1930s and '40s, says Dave Hughes, president of the township board and a farmer who invested in the plant.

Casey bought his shares in the ethanol biorefinery for $1,000 each three years ago. They're now worth almost $4,000 each. Like the other 950 shareholders in the cooperative, he has gotten $400 in dividends for each share since the plant opened in April 2005.

That's not the only way his bottom line is being helped. Casey is selling part of his corn crop this fall to the plant for 17 cents a bushel more than he was offered elsewhere. He also saves fuel when he hauls his corn just down the road instead of trucking it to an elevator miles away. Because of the plant's proximity, the value of his land has increased. “When I get old, that'll be pretty nice,” he says.

The United Wisconsin Grain Producers plant here employs 36 people, all but two of them from the area. Hourly workers make about $35,000 a year and get profit sharing, incentive pay and full benefits, CEO Jeff Robertson says.

DOJ_NMG_0072777

Rising gas prices and the push for less dependence on foreign oil have increased demand for ethanol, which is made by converting the starch in corn into sugars that are fermented and distilled. When it's blended with gasoline, ethanol can reduce carbon monoxide emissions. Legislation signed by President Bush last year added urgency: It requires oil refiners to use 4 billion gallons of renewable fuel this year and 7.5 billion gallons by 2012.

Those factors have created a rapidly expanding industry that is centered in the rural Midwest.

There are 105 ethanol plants in operation; almost half are owned by local farmers, according to the Renewable Fuels Association, an industry group. Forty-one more are under construction, and seven are expanding. Capacity is 5 billion gallons a year. When the new plants are running, that number will grow to 7.9 billion.

Many small ethanol producers qualify for federal and state tax credits and loan guarantees.

"I think the boom will continue," says Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association. "The nation needs to have more domestic renewable energy, and ethanol is going to satisfy a big part of that. … Farmers ought to be re-evaluating what they are planting and responding to the market signals."

That's happening here.

Before the plant opened, Casey planted corn on two-thirds of his 1,500 acres and soybeans on the rest. This year, he moved 20% of his soybean acreage into corn.

Even though it can cost more to grow corn than soybeans because of the cost of fertilizer, Hughes also has shifted more of his 740 acres into corn. The plant, he says, "has changed a lot of things. A lot, and they're all positive." Some area farmers who didn't invest in the plant, Hughes says, "are kicking themselves in the fanny."

Friesland's 303 residents have embraced the plant, but not every town is as welcoming. Before settling on the site just off state Highway 33 here, organizers considered locating in Arlington, says Bill Herrmann, president of the United Wisconsin Grain Producers' board. The concerns of residents there about noise, odor and possible effects on a bird sanctuary prompted them to drop those plans.

Bruce Braaksma, owner of Royal Lumber here, says the plant isn't much of a nuisance. The 100 or so trucks that enter the plant daily don't usually go through town, he says. "If it's dead still, you can hear just a little bit of a hum, and the wind has to be just right to smell it. It smells like an old tavern," he says.

Besides, Braaksma says, most people in town have been won over by a decline in property taxes since the plant was built. "When your property taxes go down $200 to $300, everybody's got a smile on their face," he says.

The plant produces about 50 million gallons of ethanol a year. An expansion that will increase production to 80 million by the end of 2007 is underway. "The profitability of the company is such that this is happening earlier than anybody planned," Robertson says.

"The presence of an ethanol plant really does ripple through the entire economy," says Geoff Cooper, ethanol analyst at the National Corn Growers Association. "With the current rate of growth that we're seeing, that's going to continue for the next several years."

There are some doubts that alternative fuels can end the country's dependence on foreign oil.

For years, studies showed that more energy is required to produce ethanol than is saved when it's used in gasoline. A University of Minnesota study released in July concluded that ethanol and biodiesel made from soybeans return more energy than is consumed in growing the grains and distilling them into fuel.

The study estimated that using all corn and soybeans grown in the USA for ethanol and biodiesel would offset only 12% of gasoline demand and 6% of diesel demand. In 2005, the U.S. Agriculture Department says, ethanol accounted for about 3% of the nation's gasoline consumption.

Ray Defenbaugh, president of Big River Resources, a farmer-owned ethanol plant in West Burlington, Iowa, says weaning the nation from foreign oil is important, but his priorities are closer to home.

"We want to create jobs for youth, preserve the community and provide a good return to the investor. The money we make goes right back into the community," he says. "That's the reason we built it."

Casey says his goal is to help himself and other farmers: "It's more about the end product for ourselves, to have a place to sell our corn, so we can stay in business."

A Farmer Fears His Way Of Life Has Dwindled Down To A Final Generation (NYT)

By Charlie Leduff

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

LEBANON, Kan. — The heart of the heartland, the exact geographic middle of the continental United States, is owned by a middle-aged Kansas man named Randall Warner. He exports wheat, beef and soon his second grown son to the city. He stands in his boots in his field and wonders what's become of his way of life.

"I drive through the city and I wonder what all those people do for a living," says Mr. Warner, a sturdy, square-faced man. "I see that, and it makes me sad that my children see it too and think that there is something better there for them."

Lebanon, the nearby town where Mr. Warner learned to read and write, has lost nearly 25 percent of its population over the last 15 years.

Large corporate farmers are taking over. Mr. Warner doesn't understand the ins and outs of the international trade policies and government subsidies that are changing the landscape, only that to make it nowadays "you work harder — sunup past sundown."

Next year, Mr. Warner believes, there will be even fewer farmers here, in part because of fuel costs.

And he wonders what will become of his legacy and his land.

His son Travis, 18, wants to know more people besides his dad and the salesman at the John Deere dealership. The nearest pretty girl is 20 miles away.

He wonders if there isn't something better than stumbling out to the fields with sleep still in your eyes and working past midnight. The summer air here is as stifling as corduroy drapes. Travis hasn't spoken about this to his father, but his father suspects it just the same.

Travis is a state wrestling and hog breeding champion. He is going off to college soon and doesn't know if he'll ever come back. His brother, Dustin, left for good. "I like to work with people, I guess," Travis says. "Be around people. And we come out here every day. It's Dad and myself; that's not working with people."

He says this while sitting in the cab of his blue pickup, a dirty older model, eating the sandwich his mother made him.

His father is far off in the field, unable to hear the gloomy truth of the matter.

"I told my dad he could retire and cash-rent the land to the big farmer, but then what's he going to do with his time? This is all he knows. Come out here and work daylight to dark.

"I don't want that."

The father says he would have to hire an old hand from down the road to help him work his 3,000 acres. He'll have to do that and, if that doesn't work, then start selling off the farm in pieces to the big farmer down the way.

This is how a town like Lebanon dies. The old Lebanon bank has caved in. Main Street is a peeling veneer. It's a common scene across the Great Plains. People are losing their optimism.

Everything about Mr. Warner speaks of work. At 52, he stands erect, with skin as weathered as cattle hide. He is frugal, does not smoke or drink coffee or liquor. His home is average, a stolid two-story ranch at the edge of a wheat field with a barn outside the door. He is hardly ever home, mostly to eat and sleep, taking a half-day off for church. His wife, Linda, complains about the isolation. Is it too much to stop home while supper's warm? Or go to town occasionally to see a motion picture? His wife talks of throwing it in sometimes too.

"My whole life is wrapped up in this," Mr. Warner says while baling hay. "To tell you the truth, it can get a little monotonous. I've had four vacations my whole life."

Still, it is a good life, he says. "The best kind of life there is."

No political party seems to care much about the working man's life, Mr. Warner feels. Stick a Republican and a Democrat in a sack, shake it up, pour it out, and the same rapacious thing crawls out. Creatures from a smoke-filled room.

Mr. Warner, a Pentecostal Christian, believes in miracles. He believes in speaking in tongues. He believes that abortion is taking a life and that gay marriage is an abomination. So he voted Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0072779

What crumbs do the Democrats offer him? Two men in tuxedos on the steps of City Hall with a marriage license in hand? Handouts for those who won't work? Mr. Warner says he could be peeled away from the conservatives if the liberals would talk to him about his values:

"God. Family. Work," he counts them on his fingertips and adds them up. "Heritage."

Do something to stop the corporate takeover of farm country. Give his son a reason to stay and you could have his vote. "F.D.R. was the greatest president this country ever had," Mr. Warner says. "He provided security for the farmer."

Father and son have moved on to spraying fly repellent on the cattle. The sun is going low, the sky is growing golden. The father's gotten to thinking. The boy will soon go away to college.

His voice shows no trace of his natural confidence.

"Do you think you'll come back to rural America? And farm? Raise cattle? Raise pigs?"

He talks obliquely, toward his son.

The son mumbles. "Depends if I find something better in the next couple years."

"What could be better?" the father asks. "What could be better than life on the Great Plains where the wind blows and you catch fresh air every day?"

"That's what I'm going to look for," the boy says.

The boy turns his back. He returns to his work. The father watches after him.

Snakeheads Appear At Home In The Potomac (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, October 2, 2006

The northern snakehead fish seems to be expanding its territory in the Potomac River, government researchers say, after a year in which the toothy Asian transplant has appeared in new places and at higher concentrations across the area.

In the third year that the fish has been studied in the Potomac, scientists are starting to build a portrait of the snakehead at home in the area. Some of the most frightening concerns have been dispelled: The fish turn out to be well-nigh helpless on land (early reports said the snakehead could wriggle short distances out of water), and the creatures haven't gobbled up or driven out the Potomac's famous bass.

But worries remain, because the snakeheads are reproducing rapidly and starting to push outward. The next few weeks will bring a crucial test of the snakeheads' growth, and science's understanding of them, as researchers wait to see if last October's startling mass snakehead migration is repeated.

"It looks like they're becoming pretty solidly entrenched, as far as establishing that beachhead here in the Potomac," said Steve Minkkinen of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

Over the past year, the snakeheads have spread out and become endemic in about 15 miles of the Potomac and some of its tributaries south of Washington from a home base of two creeks in Virginia, he said.

That has switched scientists' focus from eradication to coexistence. "As much as we can, we're just trying to collect information," Minkkinen said.

The story of snakeheads in the Potomac may have begun as early as 1998 or perhaps as late as 2002. The key event, scientists believe, was when a male and female were dumped into the water and found each other in Fairfax County's Dogue Creek. Since then, that stream, along with nearby Little Hunting Creek, has become the epicenter of the Potomac's snakehead population, scientists say.

Now, the two creeks are also the area's premier snakehead laboratory, as researchers seek to understand the life the fish have created in an alien home.

One obvious conclusion: Snakeheads are thriving. Virginia state scientists who use electric current to stun and capture fish in these creeks used to catch one snakehead every five hours. This year, they got 6.9 fish an hour, nearly 35 times more.

But the snakeheads don't appear to have had a serious impact on the river's largemouth or smallmouth bass, which are also top predators in the river. Scientists say they believe this might be because the snakeheads prefer shallower water or different prey.

"A bass is probably more likely to eat one of them" than a snakehead eat a bass, said longtime guide Ken Penrod, who said he hadn't seen any change in the bass fishing. "It's a lot about nothing, I think."

But scientists say they still have a lot to learn. They're unsure how the snakeheads nest, for instance. In their native habitat, they are said to clear out a "doughnut hole" in a thicket of underwater vegetation and lay their eggs there. But this year, a Virginia biologist spotted a cloud of 500-plus snakehead babies -- orange and black, with a minuscule version of the distinctive snakehead mouth -- swirling in Little Hunting Creek.

It was a nest, but there was no doughnut hole.

"The fish aren't behaving here the way they might be expected to behave in Asia," said John Odenkirk, a snakehead expert and a biologist with the Virginia Department of Game and Inland Fisheries.

Researchers are similarly confused about whether the river's snakeheads migrate. One Sunday last fall, Dogue Creek was suddenly full of hundreds of fish heading upstream, so thick that fishermen snatched out at least 80. This may have been a freak event caused by a large rainfall -- or it may have been the first running of an annual ritual. Researchers are keeping watch to see what happens this year.

What little scientists do know about the snakehead's habits was gathered this spring, when Odenkirk inserted small tracking devices into the body cavities of 20 fish. He found them to be mainly homebodies, lurking in the same weedy and shallow spots week after week.

But some strayed farther afield: Fish No. 1204 crossed the deep midsection of the Potomac to visit Maryland's Piscataway Creek. Fish 1301 disappeared completely, meaning that it was perhaps speared by a heron, caught by an angler or just moved so far away that Odenkirk can't get the signal.

"It tells me that some obviously are bucking the trend and being a little more adventurous and crossing the main-stem Potomac," Odenkirk said.

This year's catch of snakeheads has made it clear how widespread the fish have become. In Maryland, the fish have been found across an unprecedented swath of creeks in Prince George's and Charles counties.

On the Virginia side, snakeheads have moved north from their epicenter to a creek near Belle Haven Marina in the Alexandria section of Fairfax. To the south, Odenkirk said, their numbers have increased substantially in the Occoquan River basin, on the border between Prince William and Fairfax counties.

They've also appeared in another place puzzlingly far afield: Kenilworth Park and Aquatic Gardens in the District. In the late spring, more than 500 baby snakeheads and a handful of larger adults were found in ponds there, having eaten almost every other fish in the water.

D.C. officials think that this may be a separate population of snakeheads, descended from fish dumped directly in the aquatic gardens.

But because the ponds share connections with the Anacostia River, there's some chance the D.C. snakeheads might be adventurous specimens from the Potomac.

For all that's known about the snakeheads' expanding reach, much more is still in question. That was obvious Wednesday, when Odenkirk and two assistants set out on the Occoquan in a shallow boat with a spindly metal claw dangling from its front. They were electro-fishing.

After a few minutes in Massey Creek, a tributary of the Occoquan, a mottled green shape thrashed in the water. Nick Lapointe, a Virginia Tech graduate student, scooped a long net, bringing up a roughly seven-inch snakehead.

"Yeah, baby!" Odenkirk exulted.

"I saw those speckles, and I knew exactly what he was," Lapointe said.

"Beady little eyes," said Ryan Saylor, a technician.

In the spring, Odenkirk's team had not found any snakeheads in this inlet. But Wednesday, they found two, which he said were probably siblings born in the creek last year.

So if two were caught, how many more could there be here?

"Hundreds?" Odenkirk speculated. He looked back at an acres-wide expanse of snakehead-friendly shallow water and thick grasses.

When Spinach Isn't Good For You (NYT)

The New York Times, October 2, 2006

Just when many of us thought that eating lots of fresh green leafy vegetables was the key to good health, along comes an outbreak of bacterial contamination in bagged spinach that has frightened consumers and led to a recall of all affected brands. The contamination, detected only in spinach packaged at a particular processing plant in central California, reveals how silly we were to assume that spinach in sealed bags would necessarily be safer than fresh spinach exposed to the environment.
